Until within a few years, the Governor of Upper Louisiana was authorized to make surveys of any extent. In the exercise of this discretionary power, some abuses were committed, and a few small monopolies were created. About three years ago he was restricted in this branch of his duty, since which he has been only authorized to make surveys to emigrants in the following manner: two hundred acres for each man and wife, fifty acres for each child, and twenty acres for each slave. Hence the quantity of land allowed to settlers depended on the number in each family; and for this quantity of land they paid no more than the expense of survey. These surveys were necessary to entitle the settlers to grants; and the Governor, and after him the Intendant at New Orleans, was alone authorized to execute grants, on the receipt of the surveys from the settlers. The administration of the land office is at present under the care of the Intendant of the province.

There are no feudal rights nor noblesse.

It is impossible to ascertain the quantity of lands granted, without calling on the claimants to exhibit their titles; the registry being incomplete, and the maps made by the different surveyors general having been burnt in the fires at New Orleans, of 1788 and 1794, no estimate has been obtained.

All the lands on both sides of the Mississippi, from the distance of sixteen leagues below New Orleans to Baton Rouge, are granted to the depth of forty acres, or near half a league, which is the usual depth of all grants. Some have double and triple grants; that is to say, they have twice or thrice forty acres in depth; and others have grants extending from the Mississippi to the sea or the lakes behind them. In other parts of the country, the people, being generally settled on the banks of creeks or rivers, have a front of from six to forty acres, and the grant almost invariably expresses a depth of forty acres. All the lands ungranted, on the island of New Orleans or on the opposite bank of the Mississippi, are sunken, inundated, and at present unfit for cultivation; but may in part be reclaimed at a future day, by efforts of the rich and enterprising.

CULTIVATION OF SUGAR.

The sugar-cane may be cultivated between the river Iberville and the city, on both sides of the river, and as far back as the swamps. Below the city, however, the lands decline so rapidly, that, beyond fifteen miles, the soil is not well adapted to it. Above the Iberville the cane would be affected by the cold, and its produce would therefore be uncertain. Within these limits, the best planters admit that one-quarter of the cultivated lands of any considerable plantation may be planted in cane, one-quarter left in pasture, and the remaining half employed for provisions, &c. and a reserve for a change of crops. One Parisian arpent, of one hundred and eighty feet square, may be expected to produce, on an average, twelve hundredweight of sugar and fifty gallons of rum.

From the above data, admitting that both sides of the river are planted for ninety miles in extent and about three-fourths of a mile in depth, it will result that the annual product may amount, in round numbers, to twenty-five thousand hogsheads of sugar, with twelve thousand puncheons of rum. Enterprising young planters say that one-third, or even one-half, of the arable land might be planted in cane. It may also be remarked, that a regular supply of provisions from above, at a moderate price, would enable the planter to give his attention to a greater body of land cultivated with cane. The whole of these lands, as may be supposed, are granted; but in the Attakapas country there is undoubtedly a portion, parallel to the sea-coast, fit for the culture of the sugar-cane. There vacant lands are to be found, but the proportion is at present unknown.

In the above remarks, the lands at Terre aux Bœuf, on the Fourche, bayou St. Jean, and other inlets of the Mississippi south of the latitude supposed to divide those which are fit from those which are unfit for the cultivation of the cane, have been entirely kept out of view. Including these, and taking one-third instead of one-fourth of the lands fit for sugar, the produce of the whole would be fifty thousand instead of twenty-five thousand hogsheads of sugar.

The following quantities of sugar, brown, clayed, and refined, have been imported into the United States from Louisiana and the Floridas, viz: In 1799, 773,542 pounds; in 1800, 1,560,865 pounds; in 1801, 967,619 pounds; in 1802, 1,576,933 pounds.

OF THE LAWS.

When the country was first ceded to Spain, she preserved many of the French regulations; but, by almost imperceptible degrees, they have disappeared; and at present the province is governed entirely by the laws of Spain and the ordinances formed expressly for the colony. Various ordinances promulgated by General O'Reilly, its first Governor under Spain, as well as some other laws, are translated and annexed in the Appendix, No. 1.

COURTS OF JUSTICE.

The Governor's court has a civil and military jurisdiction throughout the province; that of the Lieutenant Governor has the same extent in civil cases only.

There are two Alcaldes, whose jurisdiction, civil and criminal, extends through the city of New Orleans and five leagues around it, where the parties have no fuero militar, or military privilege; those who have, can transfer their causes to the Governor.

The tribunal of the Intendant has cognizance of admiralty and fiscal causes, and such suits as are brought for the recovery of money in the King's name, or against him.

The tribunal of the Alcalde Provincial has cognizance of criminal causes, where offences are committed in the country, or when the criminal takes refuge there, and in other specified cases.

The ecclesiastical tribunal has jurisdiction in all matters respecting the church.

The Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Alcaldes, Intendant, Provincial Alcalde, and the Provisor in ecclesiastical causes, are, respectively, sole judges. All sentences affecting the life of the culprit, except those of the Alcalde Provincial, must be ratified by the superior tribunal, or Captain General, according to the nature of the cause, before they are carried into execution. The Governor has not the power of pardoning criminals. An auditor and an assessor, who are doctors of law, are appointed to give counsel to those judges; but for some time past there has been no assessor. If the judges do not consult those officers, or do not follow their opinions, they make themselves responsible for their decisions.

The commandants of districts have also a species of judicial power. They hear and determine all pecuniary causes not exceeding the value of one hundred dollars. When the suit is for a larger sum, they commence the process, collect the proofs, and remit the whole to the Governor, to be decided by the proper tribunal. They can inflict no corporeal punishment except upon slaves, but they have the power of arresting and imprisoning when they think it necessary; advice of which, and their reasons, must be transmitted to the Governor.

Small suits are determined in a summary way, by hearing both parties, viva voce; but, in suits of greater magnitude, the proceedings are carried on by petition and reply, replication and rejoinder, reiterated until the auditor thinks they have nothing new to say. Then all the proofs either party chooses to adduce are taken before the keeper of the records of the court, who is always a notary public.

The parties have now an opportunity of making their remarks upon the evidence, by way of petition, and of bringing forward opposing proofs. When the auditor considers the cause as mature, he issues his decree, which receives its binding force from the Governor's signature, where the cause depends before him.

There is an appeal to Havana, if applied for within five days after the date of the decree, in causes above a certain value. An ulterior appeal lies to the Audience, which formerly sat at St. Domingo, but which is now removed to some part of Cuba; and from thence to the Council of the Indies, in Spain.

Suits are of various durations. In pecuniary matters, the laws encourage summary proceedings. An execution may be had on a bond in four days; and, in the same space, on a note of hand, after the party acknowledged it, or after his signature is proved. Moveable property is sold, after giving nine days' warning, provided it be three times publicly cried in that interval. Landed property must be likewise cried three times, with an interval of nine days between each, and it may then be sold. All property taken in execution must be appraised, and sold for at least half of the appraisement. In pecuniary matters, the Governors decide verbally, without appeal, when the sum does not exceed one hundred dollars. The Alcaldes have the same privilege, when the amount is not above twenty dollars.

In addition to these courts, four years ago there were established four Alcaldes de Barrio, or petty magistrates; one for each of the four quarters of the city, with a view to improve its police. They hear and decide all demands not exceeding ten dollars; exercise the power of committing to prison; and in cases of robbery, riot, or assassination, they can, by calling on a notary, take cognizance of the affair; but, when this is done, they are bound to remit the proceedings to some of the other judges, and, in all cases whatever, to give them information when they have committed any person to prison.

Most of the suits are on personal contracts, rights to dower, inheritances, and titles to land. Those arising from personal quarrels are generally decided in a summary way. The inhabitants are said not to be litigious.

LAWYERS, AND COSTS OF THE COURTS, AND THEIR OFFICERS.

The number of lawyers is small, not exceeding three or four attorneys. Their fees are small. Suits are carried on in writings, called escritos, which may be drawn up by the parties themselves, if they please, but they must be presented by the escribano, or notary, who is the keeper of the records of the court.

The fees of the judges are twenty-five cents for every half signature or flourish, (which is usually affixed on common occasions;) fifty cents for every whole signature; and two dollars and three-fourths for every attendance, as at a sale, or the taking of evidence.

The fees of the Abogado, or person consulted by the judges on law points, are twelve and a half cents for every leaf of which the process consists, and four dollars for every point of law cited. Those of the attorney, when employed, are sixty-two and a half cents for a simple petition, or escrito; but, if it should be necessary to read a process in order to form his petition, and it should require much time and labor, he is compensated in proportion, besides twelve and a half cents per leaf for perusing the papers. For attendance on any business, he is allowed one dollar and fifty cents for the assistance of two and a half hours. The notary has fifty cents for each decree, or order of the judge; twenty-five cents for a notification in his office; and fifty cents for one out of it, but within the city; one dollar and seven-eighths for every attendance of two and a half hours on business, and twenty-five cents additional for every leaf of paper written by him.

A counsellor or two have sometimes resided at New Orleans, but being generally found obnoxious to the officers of the Government, they have not continued there. The counsellor values his own services, and in general exacts large sums. The attorney generally receives from the party who employs him more than is allowed by law.

CRIMES, CRIMINAL JURISPRUDENCE, AND PUNISHMENTS.

In cases of petty crimes, the cognizance of the proper court may be said to be final, and without appeal; and most commonly such causes are decided in a summary way. With respect to crimes of deeper dye, more solemnity is used. A person skilled in the laws is always nominated by the court to defend the accused. The trial is not public; but examinations and depositions in writing are taken privately by the auditor, at any time most convenient to himself, at which, nevertheless, the counsel of the accused is admitted to be present. He has also every kind of privilege granted to him in making his defence. Such suits are generally very tedious and expensive, when he is wealthy. The condemned is entitled to an appeal, as in civil cases, provided he gives security for the payment of the future costs. There appears, however, to be a virtual appeal in every capital condemnation, because a stay of execution takes place until the confirmation of the sentence returns from St. Jago de Cuba, where there is a grand tribunal established consisting of five judges, before whom counsellors plead, as in our courts.

Crimes of great atrocity are very rare. Murder, by stabbing, seems to be confined to the Spanish soldiers and sailors. The terror of the magistrate's power restrains assaults, batteries, riots, &c.

Punishments are generally mild. They mostly consist of imprisonment and payment of costs; sometimes the stocks. White men, not military, are rarely, perhaps never, degraded by whipping, and in no case do any fines go into the public treasury. Murder, arson, and aggravated robbery of the King's treasury or effects, are punished with death. Robbery of private persons, to any amount, is never punished with death, but by restitution, imprisonment, and sometimes enormous costs. Crimes against the King's revenue, such as contraband trade, are punished with hard labor for life, or a term of years, on board the galleys, in the mines, or on the public works.

LEARNING.

There are no colleges, and but one public school, which is at New Orleans. The masters of this are paid by the King. They teach the Spanish language only. There are a few private schools for children. Not more than half of the inhabitants are supposed to be able to read and write; of whom not more than two hundred, perhaps, are able to do it well. In general, the learning of the inhabitants does not extend beyond those two arts, though they seem to be endowed with a good natural genius, and an uncommon facility of learning whatever they undertake.

THE CHURCH.

The clergy consists of a bishop, who does not reside in the province, and whose salary, of four thousand dollars, is charged on the revenue of certain bishoprics in Mexico and Cuba; two canons, having each a salary of six hundred dollars; and twenty-five curates, five for the city of New Orleans, and twenty for as many country parishes, who receive each from three hundred and sixty to four hundred and eighty dollars a year. Those salaries, except that of the bishop, together with an allowance for sacristans and chapel expenses, are paid by the treasury at New Orleans, and amount annually to thirteen thousand dollars.

There is also at that place a convent of Ursulines, to which is attached about a thousand acres of land, rented out into three plantations. The nuns are now in number not more than ten or twelve, and are all French. There were formerly about the same number of Spanish ladies belonging to the order; but they retired to Havana during the period when it was expected that the province would be transferred to France. The remaining nuns receive young ladies as boarders, and instruct them in reading, writing, and needle-work.

They have always acted with great propriety, and are generally respected and beloved throughout the province. With the assistance of an annual allowance of six hundred dollars from the treasury, they always support and educate twelve female orphans.

OF THE OFFICERS OF GOVERNMENT.

The officers, who are merely judicial, have been already mentioned, and therefore some of them will be altogether omitted in this place. The executive officers, appointed by the Governor, for each division of the province, and called Commandants, are generally taken from the army, or the militia. When the settlement is small, some respectable character is appointed to the civil command, and the militia officer has the direction of military matters. Where there is a garrison, the commandant is sub-delegate of the Intendant, and draws upon him for all expenses incurred. In that case he has the charge of all matters relating to the revenue, within his district.

The duty of commandants is to superintend the police, preserve the peace of the district, examine the passports of travellers, and to suffer no strangers to settle within the limits of their command, without regular leave obtained from Government. They are to prevent smuggling; to certify that all lands, petitioned for by the inhabitants, are vacant before they are granted; and, when required, to put the owner in possession. They are besides notaries public; and in their offices it is necessary to register all sales of lands and slaves, and even to make the contracts for those purposes before them. They act as sheriffs, levy executions on property, attend and certify the sale, and collect the proceeds. They also take inventories of the property of intestates. By an ordinance of Baron Carondelet, syndics are established every three leagues, who are subordinate to the commandant, decide small causes, and have the police of roads, levies, travellers, and negroes.

The officers of the General Government are the following: Besides his judicial powers, the GOVERNOR is chief of the army and militia, and the head of the civil Government. He is also President of the Cabildo, or Provincial Council. He appoints and removes, at pleasure, the commandants of districts. He appoints the officers of the militia, who are, nevertheless, commissioned by the King, and he recommends military officers for preferment. He is superintendent of Indian affairs. He promulgates ordinances for the good government and improvement of the province, but he has no power to assess taxes upon the inhabitants without their consent. Until the year 1798, he possessed the sole power of granting lands; but it then passed into the hands of the Intendant.

The CABILDO is an hereditary council of twelve, chosen originally from the most wealthy and respectable families. The Governor presides over their meetings. Their office is very honorable, but it is acquired by purchase. They have a right to represent, and even to remonstrate to the Governor, in respect to the interior government of the province. The police of the city is under their control and direction. In it they regulate the admission of physicians and surgeons to practise. Two members of the Cabildo serve by turn monthly, and take upon themselves the immediate superintendence of markets, bakers, streets, bridges, and the general police of the city. This council distributes among its members several important offices, such as Alguazil Mayor, or High Sheriff, Alcalde Provincial, Procureur General, &c. The last mentioned is a very important charge. The person who holds it is not merely the King's attorney, but an officer peculiar to the civil law. He does not always prosecute; but, after conviction, he indicates the punishment annexed by law to the crime, and which may be, and is mitigated by the court. Like the chancellor in the English system, he is the curator and protector of orphans, &c.; and, finally, he is the expounder of the law, the defender of the privileges belonging to the town, province, or colony, and the accuser of every public officer that infringes them. The Cabildo is also vested with a species of judicial authority, for which, and for a further elucidation of its constitution, and the functions of the officers springing from it, see the appendix No. 1.

The INTENDANT is chief of the departments of finance and commerce, and exercises the judicial powers already mentioned. He is entirely independent of the Governor, and no public moneys can be issued without his express order. The land office is under his direction.

The Contador, Treasurer, and Interventor, are officers subordinate to the Intendant. The first has four clerks under him, and keeps all accounts and documents respecting the receipt and expenditure of the revenue; and is, therefore, a check upon the Intendant. The treasurer is properly no more than a cashier, and is allowed one clerk. The interventor superintends all public purchases and bargains. The administrador is also subordinate to the Intendant, and, with a number of inferior officers, manages every thing respecting the custom-house. Every clerk in these offices receives his commission from the King.

The AUDITOR is the King's counsel, who is to furnish the Governor with legal advice in all cases of judicial proceedings, whether civil or military.

The ASSESSOR's functions are similar to those of the auditor, and are properly applicable to the Intendant's department.

Both of the officers last mentioned are also the counsellors of some of the other tribunals, as before intimated.

A SECRETARY of the Government, and another of the Intendancy.

A SURVEYOR GENERAL.

A HARBORMASTER.

A STOREKEEPER, who takes charge of all public moveable property.

An INTERPRETER of the French and Spanish languages, and a number of other inferior officers.

All appointments in the province, with a salary of more than thirty dollars per month, are made by the King; and most of those with a lower salary, by the Governor or Intendant, as belongs to their respective departments. There are no officers chosen by the people.

The salaries and perquisites of the principal officers are as follows:

Governor, annually,	-	-	-	6,000 salary,	2,000 perquisites.
Intendant,	-	-	-	4,000	none.
Auditor,	-	-	-	2,000	2,000
Contador,	-	-	-	2,000	none.
Assessor,	-	-	-	1,200	1,000
Treasurer,	-	-	-	1,200	none.
Administrador,	-	-	-	1,200	none.
Secretary of Government,	-	-	-	600	2,000

The commandants of districts receive each one hundred dollars from the King annually, unless they are possessed of a military employment or pension.

TAXES AND DUTIES.

Instead of paying local taxes, each inhabitant is bound to make and repair roads, bridges, and embankments through his own land.

A duty of six per cent. is payable at the custom house on the transfer of shipping. It is ascertained upon the sum the buyer and seller declare to be the real consideration. As no oath is required from either, they seldom report more than half the price.

The following taxes are also payable in the province:

Two per cent. on legacies and inheritances, coming from collaterals, and exceeding two thousand dollars.

Four per cent. on legacies, given to persons who are not relatives of the testator.

A tax on civil employments, the salaries of which exceed three hundred dollars annually, called media annata, amounting to half of the first year's salary. By certain officers it is to be paid in two annual instalments, and by others in four. The first person appointed to a newly created office pays nothing, but the tax is levied on all who succeed him.

Seven dollars is deducted from the sum of twenty, paid as pilotage by every vessel entering or leaving the Mississippi; but the treasury provides the boats, and pays the salary of the pilots and sailors employed at the Balise. The remainder of the twenty dollars is thus distributed: to the head pilot four dollars, to the pilot who is in the vessel four dollars, and five dollars to the crew of the row-boat that goes out to put the pilot on board, or take him ashore.

A tax of forty dollars per annum for licenses to sell liquors.

A tax on certain places when sold, such as those of regidor, notary, attorney, &c.

But the principal tax is that of six per cent. levied on all imports and exports, according to a low tariff. The proceeds of which nett about one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, whilst all the other taxes are said not to yield more than five or six thousand dollars annually.

EXPENSES AND DEBT.

The expenses of the present Government, comprehending the pay and support of the regiment of Louisiana, part of a battalion of the regiment of Mexico, a company of dragoons, and one of artillery, which form the garrison of the country, including Mobile, the repairs of public buildings and fortifications, the maintenance of a few galleys to convey troops and stores throughout the province, Indian presents, and salaries of officers, clergy, and persons employed for public purposes, amount to about six hundred and fifty thousand dollars. A sum, in specie, which does not generally exceed four hundred thousand dollars, is annually sent from Vera Cruz; but this, together with the amount of duties and taxes collected in the province, leaves usually a deficiency of one hundred or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for which certificates are issued to the persons who may have furnished supplies, or to officers and workmen for their salaries. Hence a debt has accumulated, which, it is said, amounts at present to about four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It bears no interest, and is now depreciated thirty per cent. The latter circumstance has taken place not from want of confidence in the eventual payment of the certificates, but from the uncertainty of the time when, and the want and general value of specie. The whole of this debt is said to be due to the inhabitants, and to American residents. It would have been long since paid off, but for a diversion of the funds, destined for that purpose, to different and external objects.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

The productions of Louisiana are, sugar, cotton, indigo, rice, furs and peltry, lumber, tar, pitch, lead, flour, horses and cattle. Population alone is wanting to multiply them to an astonishing degree. The soil is fertile, the climate salubrious, and the means of communication between most parts of the province certain, and by water.

The following has been received as a sketch of the present exports of Louisiana, viz:

20,000 bales of cotton, of three cwt. each, at twenty cents per pound,	-	$1,344,000, increasing.
45,000 casks of sugar, ten cwt. each, at six cents per pound,	-	302,400, increasing.
800 casks of molasses, one hundred gallons each,	-	32,000, increasing.
Indigo,	-	100,000, diminish'g rapidly.
Peltry,	-	200,000
Lumber,	-	80,000
Lead, corn, horses, and cattle, uncertain.	-
All other articles, suppose,	-	100,000
		$2,158,000

According to official returns in the Treasury of the United States, there were imported into our territory from Louisiana and the Floridas merchandise to the following amounts, in the several years prefixed:

In 1799 to the value of	-	-	-	-	-	$507,132
In 1800 to the value of	-	-	-	-	-	904,322
In 1801 to the value of	-	-	-	-	-	956,635
In 1802 to the value of	-	-	-	-	-	1,006,214

According to the same authority, which makes the total of the exports to amount to two million one hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars, the imports, in merchandise, plantation utensils, slaves, &c. amount to two and a half millions; the difference being made up by the money introduced by the Government to pay the expenses of governing and protecting the colony.

According to the returns in the Treasury of the United States, exports have been made to Louisiana and the Floridas to the following amount, in the years prefixed:

In 1799 to the value of	-	-	-	-	-	$3,056,268 in foreign articles.
In 1799 to the value of	-	-	-	-	-	447,824 in domestic articles.
						$3,504,092
In 1800,	-	-	-	-	-	$1,795,127 in foreign articles.
In 1800,	-	-	-	-	-	240,662 in domestic articles.
						$2,035,789
In 1801,	-	-	-	-	-	$1,770,794 in foreign articles.
In 1801,	-	-	-	-	-	137,204 in domestic articles.
						$1,907,998
In 1802,	-	-	-	-	-	$1,054,600 in foreign articles.
In 1802,	-	-	-	-	-	170,110 in domestic articles.
						$1,224,710

It is to be observed, that if the total of the imports and exports into and from these provinces, (of which the two Floridas are but a very unimportant part, with respect to both,) be as above supposed, viz:

Imports,	-	-	-	-	-	$2,500,000
Exports,	-	-	-	-	-	2,158,000
						$4,658,000
Making, together,						-

The duty of six per cent. ought alone to produce the gross sum of two hundred and seventy-nine thousand four hundred and eighty dollars; and that the difference between that sum and its actual nett produce arises partly from the imperfect tariff by which the value of merchandise is ascertained, but principally from the smuggling, which is openly countenanced by most of the revenue officers.

MANUFACTURERS.

There are but few domestic manufactures. The Acadians manufacture a little cotton into quilts and cottonades; and in the remote parts of the province the poorer planters spin and weave some negro cloths of cotton and wool mixed. There is one machine for spinning cotton in the parish of Iberville, and another in the Opelousas, but they do little or nothing. In the city, besides the trades which are absolutely necessary, there is a considerable manufacture of cordage, and some small ones of shot and hair powder. There are likewise in, and within a few leagues of the town, twelve distilleries for making taffia, which are said to distil annually a very considerable quantity; and one sugar refinery, said to make about two hundred thousand pounds of loaf sugar.

NAVIGATION EMPLOYED IN THE TRADE OF THE PROVINCE.

In the year 1802, there entered the Mississippi two hundred and sixty-eight vessels of all descriptions, eighteen of which were public armed vessels, and the remainder merchantmen, as follows, viz:

	American.	Spanish.	French.
Ships, -	48	14
Brigs, -	63	17	1
Polacres,	-	4
Schooners,	50	61
Sloops,	9	1
	170	97	1

Of the number of American vessels, twenty-three ships, twenty-five brigs, nineteen schooners, and five sloops came in ballast, the remainder were wholly or in part laden.

Five Spanish ships and seven schooners came in ballast. The united tonnage of all the shipping that entered the river, exclusive of the public armed vessels, was thirty-three thousand seven hundred and twenty-five register tons.

In the same year there sailed from the Mississippi two hundred and sixty-five sail, viz:

				American.	Tons.	Spanish.	Tons.
Ships,	-	-	-	40*	8,972	18	3,714
Brigs,	-	-	-	58	7,546	22*	1,944

				Spanish,	-	104	9,753

				Grand total,	-	265 sail,	31,241

The tonnage of the vessels which went away in ballast, and that of the public armed ships, are not included in the foregoing account; these latter carried away masts, yards, spars, pitch, tar, &c., at least one thousand tons.

In the first six months of the present year, there entered the Mississippi one hundred and seventy-three sail, of all nations, four of which were public armed vessels, viz: two French and two Spanish, whose tonnage is not enumerated.

In the same six months there sailed from the Mississippi one hundred and fifty-six vessels, viz:

COASTING TRADE.

There is a considerable coasting trade from Pensacola, Mobile, and the creeks and rivers falling into, and in the neighborhood of, Lake Pontchartrain, from whence New Orleans is principally supplied with ship timber, charcoal, lime, pitch, and tar, and partly with cattle; and the places before named are supplied with articles of foreign growth and produce in the same way from Orleans. The vessels employed are sloops and schooners, some of which are but half-decked, from eight to fifty tons; five hundred of which, including their repeated voyages, and thirteen galleys and gunboats, entered the bayou St. Jean last year. There is likewise a small coasting trade between the Attakapas and Opelousas, and New Orleans, by way of the Balise, which would much increase if there was any encouragement given by Government, to clear away a few obstructions, chiefly caused by fallen timber, in the small rivers and creeks leading to them.

REPRINTING OF THE LAWS, JOURNALS, AND OTHER DOCUMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 14, 1803.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred, on the 29th ultimo, the resolution of the House directing an inquiry to be made as to the expediency of reprinting the laws, journals, and other public documents, have, according to order, taken the same into consideration, and prepared thereon a report, which they respectfully submit to the consideration of the House.

First, of the statutes. It appears that there are on hand in the Department of State only seventy-seven entire sets of the first five volumes; of the four first of those there are also a few sets, but they are irregular. There are no copies left of the laws of the seventh Congress, that is, of the acts of the two last sessions, but such as are subject to legal appropriations. It was upon the reason of the case only that new members of the Legislature have been furnished with complete copies of the printed laws. Such copies have latterly been purchased by the Department of State, and paid for out of the money appropriated for the contingencies of that office. As far as can be judged, the copies are becoming scarce in the market, and, in a very short time, it will be impossible to buy them. It does not appear to the committee that any law at present exists which would authorize a new edition of the statutes at the public expense. The act for the more general promulgation of the laws, passed 3d March, 1795, is inoperative as to this object at present.

That there must be provision made for a republication of the laws of the United States, is too evident to be urged upon the consideration of the House. It may, nevertheless, be not unseasonable to submit a few considerations on the manner of executing this edition. There is a great deficiency in the three first volumes, inasmuch as statutes which are repealed or have expired are printed only by their titles. If the statute-book, published by authority, is to contain the whole body of legislative acts of Congress, which it might be expected to do, then every law and resolve which has passed the two Houses, and received the Presidential approbation, ought to be reprinted in its time and order, whether now in force or not. Thus the nation would be furnished with, what some would deem a great desideratum, the statutes at large. To these should be prefixed the constitution and amendments; and all the treaties and conventions subjoined in chronological series, with marginal abstracts, tables of contents, and indexes.

The expense of this new edition, especially if executed upon this enlarged plan, will considerably exceed the cost of the former edition, printed by Follwell, in Philadelphia. The price paid for five thousand copies of the three volumes then published, was fifteen thousand four hundred dollars, as appears by the charge on the books of the Register of the Treasury. The price for a new edition of those three volumes, and the additional three which contain the laws which have been enacted since that time, would be increased to a sum at least double that amount: and this even upon the estimate that none of the repealed, expired, or private acts were to be inserted. It is estimated that ten thousand copies will be wanted for public use. These ten thousand copies, if printed on a type like that of the present fifth volume, are estimated to cost thirty-one thousand six hundred and forty-eight dollars, in sheets; to this must be added the price of binding, which, upon the average between boards, sheep, and calf, is estimated at forty-five cents per book. To which must be added somewhat of extra charge, for printing treaties in foreign tongues, and setting the indexes in smaller type, amounting, however, to no great matter of difference. The binding of fifty thousand books thus coming to twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars, and added to the price of the printed sheets, will amount to a sum of fifty-four thousand one hundred and forty-eight dollars for ten thousand copies of the laws, as they now stand in our books, supposing no augmentation of matter to be made.

On investigating this subject, three modes of publication have successively been contemplated by the committee:

1st. The publication of the statutes at large; 2d. A digest of the laws of the United States; 3d. An edition of the public acts only, now in force, and which constitute the actual supreme law of the land. The latter of these recommends itself by the qualities of conciseness, clearness, economy, and despatch. For obvious reasons, the superintendence of the edition, the correctness of the proof-sheets, and the employment of a printer to execute the work, with authority to conduct all the details of the undertaking, ought to be vested in the Secretary of State, who is the keeper of the enrolled originals, and the publisher of their contents to the nation. To carry into effect this object, the following proposition is submitted:

Resolved, That the Secretary for the Department of State shall, after the end of the next session of Congress, cause to be printed and collated, at the public expense, a complete edition of laws of the United States, to consist of _____ copies, comprising the constitution, public acts in force, and treaties, together with marginal abstracts, tables of contents, and indexes, to be distributed as Congress shall direct.

Secondly, of the journals. The committee submit herewith a correct list of the journals of the different sessions of Congress, since their first publication under our present happy federal constitution. By this it appears that but a single complete set of these national records remains among our archives. All the rest are broken, and are lying in very different numbers on the shelves of the Capitol. It would be highly desirable to multiply and perpetuate these memorandums of our Congressional history, and to diffuse them through the States. Although not replete with every thing that the historical inquirer searches for, they have nevertheless a substantial use and value, and show the progress of legislation and laws in this new and unexampled Government.

Pressed as Congress is at this time, by demands upon the Treasury of a more serious nature, it does not appear that the reprinting the journals would, at this time, be seasonable. The following resolution is thereupon submitted to the House:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at present, to reprint the journals of the House.

Thirdly, of other public documents. With concern the committee find that several State papers, belonging to this class, are already become very scarce. Certain of the early reports from the heads of Departments, which may be considered as the germs whence our system of laws have sprouted, are already dissipated and gone; so that none but office copies are to be found, and even those extremely few. The more excellent of these appear worthy of republication. A list of them is herewith submitted, consisting of select reports, made soon after the establishment of the Government, by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General.

But, desirable as it is to multiply copies of these valuable documents, the committee are unwilling to press the House for an immediate order for printing them. They, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the further consideration of reprinting the other public documents be postponed until the next session of Congress.

[1st SESSION.]

ARREST OF ZACHARIAH COX BY THE GOVERNOR OF THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 24, 1803.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

NOVEMBER 24, 1803.

In conformity with the desire, expressed in the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th instant, I now lay before them copies of such documents as are in possession of the Executive, relative to the arrest and confinement of Zachariah Cox, by officers in the service of the United States, in the year 1798. From the nature of the transaction, some documents relative to it might have been expected from the War Office; but if any ever existed there, they were probably lost when the office and its papers were consumed by fire.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract of a letter from Governor Sargent to the Secretary of State, dated

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, August 20, 1798.

To one act I have been constrained since my arrival, which will be explained to you fully] by the enclosures marked A, B, C, D, E, F, upon which I request immediate instructions. Mr. Cox was at large within the Territory, and an armed party at his command. Before my arrival his coming was talked of amongst some few disaffected persons here, and that he was to assume the Government for the State of Georgia. He is now in close confinement, but with every indulgence that a State prisoner could expect; for I am not disposed to torture even a criminal. I wish ardently for the President's instruction in this business as early as possible, for until I may receive it, Mr. Cox will be continued a prisoner.

DEAR SIR:

HEAD-QUARTERS, MASSAC, August 2, 1798.

I arrived here yesterday, and find that subsequent to your departure, but previous to my arrival, Mr. Cox had contrived, through the agency of a Colonel Shelby, of Kentucky, (who it seems has taken part in his usurpa-tions) to obtain leave to pass this post, with his boats and thirty-five men; but he at the same time secretly, and in violation of the act to regulate trade, &c., with the Indians, landed an armed force near the mouth of the Tennessee river, and marched them across the country, to rendezvous below this place, where they were embarked.

Without making question of the latent views of this usurper, it will suffice to justify his arrest, that he has taken a position on the lands guaranteed to the Indians by the treaty of Holston and Hopewell, and that he has there assembled, organized, and arrayed an armed force, enlisted for twelve months; and that he has created tribunals, which have proceeded to inflict punishments unknown to the nation.

But, sir, when with these lawless acts we combine the present critical state of our country, and take into consideration the powers which an armed rabble will have to perpetrate mischief at this distance from the seat of Government and our military resources, prudential considerations and national expediency imperiously prescribe to us the adoption of the necessary means of prevention. The interests of the occasion will excuse the unreserve of my style to your excellency, whose more matured judgment will correct the errors of my opinions.

I have strong evidence of an extensive confederacy in this business, from Georgia to the Monongahela, which it is expected will be matured for efficient operation by December; we must stifle the monster in embryo, or extensive calamities may ensue; Cox's followers begin to doubt his stability, but are reluctant to let go the lure by which he has attracted them; to unmask the monster, and blow up the whole combination, it is only necessary to seize this chief actor, and to hold him in safe custody.

From very many, I enclose to you a few documents to exhibit to you the treasonable course which things had taken in this quarter; and on the facts which I have stated, I conceive you will find ample ground for Mr. Cox's arrest, in the law of the 19th May, 1796, to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians, &c., which also subjects military to your will in such case.

I make this communication to you by express, in the hope it may reach you before Cox passes Natchez, and by the same conveyance shall warn the Spanish officers that his movements are unauthorized by, and his designs unknown to the United States.

I shall look for the pleasure of taking you by the hand in about thirty days; and, in the mean time, with my best wishes for your health,

I have the honor to be, with much respect and esteem, your excellency's most obedient servant,

JAS. WILKINSON.

His Excellency W. SARGENT.

SIR:

FORT MASSAC, August 1, 1798.

In pursuance of your excellency's commands, I went on the 30th July last to the town newly formed on the Ohio, between the rivers Cumberland and Tennessee, called Smithland. There I saw a gentleman by the name of Major Guest, who commands at that place, from whom I obtained the following particulars:

That there were six companies of militia organized according to the laws of Kentucky; but I could not learn their exact strength, neither could I learn the reason for their arming and fortifying themselves, unless it was to defend themselves against the Indians; but he informed me, that from the conduct of the officers in the service of the United States, it appeared to him that it was the intention of the Executive to drive the proprietors into the commission of some act that would prove a pretext to forfeit the laws; and he moreover declared that he would, in case any attempt was made on behalf of the United States to drive them from thence, defend the place as long as he had a man able to fire a gun.

That the Indian line does not, according to him, come within a mile and a half of the town in the highest place; and that, following the courses of the Ohio, it does not come within six miles.

That Colonel Cox has gone down the Mississippi, as well on commercial business as to procure meat for the support of the settlement.

That he was permitted to pass Fort Massac with thirty-five men, only one-third of whom were armed; but that seventy-five men more went by land, by permission of Colonel Shelby, of Christian county militia, who at some small distance below, and out of view of the fort, joined and embarked with him. And that in case Major Kingsbury had the last time he was applied to for the purpose refused him, Colonel Cox, permission to pass, he was determined to force his passage down; and that if he was fired on from the garrison or galley, to return the fire, and to fight as long as he had a man to stand by him; and that if he should have proved too strong for the garrison, to destroy it entirely; and that he, Major Guest, told some of the officers so himself.

I was informed by some of the inhabitants, that the terms given the settlers are, a town lot of a quarter of an acre, and one thousand acres of land in the big bend of the Tennessee or Muscle Shoals. One of the inhabitants told Mr. Gregory that they were all sworn to secrecy as to the nature of Colonel Cox's expedition, and that they shortly expected eight six pounders down the Tennessee.

The town of Smithland is situated about three miles below the mouth of Cumberland river, and extends itself about five hundred yards along the Ohio, and about three-quarters of a mile below the first high lands from the Cumberland. Two eminences, being two points of a hill, extend themselves into the town, and which, at the distance of about three hundred and fifty yards back from the shore of the Ohio, meet together in one ridge.

Timber is cut for two block-houses, one of which is to be built on the upper eminence, and the other on a piece of ground a little below the point of the lower eminence, and which in time of high water is surrounded by a small channel from the Ohio.

I am, with the greatest respect and esteem, your excellency's most obliged, humble servant,

R. BUNTIN.

SIR:

SMITHLAND, May 30, 1798.

After my compliments to a gentleman to whom I am an utter stranger, I beg leave to inform your honor that I have the honor to command at this place and settlement, founded by Colonel Zachariah Cox, formerly of Georgia. We first landed in the woods on the 18th of February last, with twelve men. We are now about three hundred and fifty strong; two hundred and twenty-five are effective men; our efforts will be agriculture and commerce, and a friendly intercourse with all our neighbors, of whom we conceive you an interesting one.

Therefore have sent the bearer, Mr. Hiller, who will join himself with some families of the name of Mason, whom we have banished, and are men of bad character wherever they are known. Hiller's business will be to know their intentions, and inform you of them. You may depend on this information.

And I conclude myself, with esteem and regard, your humble servant,

THOMAS GIRT.

The COMMANDANT OF NEW MADRID.

SIR: JULY 5, 1798.

You are hereby authorized to call your company to muster, when you think proper, and keep good order. Also, in all cases of invasion or insurrection you will hold yourself in readiness to pursue the enemies of the regiment; at all times holding yourself amenable to the laws of the State of Kentucky, and under my immediate orders.

SMITHLAND, JUNE 1, 1798.

Reposing special confidence in the courage and fidelity of Jeremiah Wheler, do appoint him second sergeant in my company of emigrants, associating at this place; and he is to be respected accordingly, so long as he conducts himself like a good citizen, consistent with the laws of the United States. I also allow him five hundred acres of land over and above the common allowance for emigrants in that part which is set apart for emigrants on the great bend of the Tennessee river.

M. MITCHELL.

Governor Sargent's precept for apprehending and securing Zachariah Cox, (enclosure F.)

SIR: CONCORD HOUSE, NEAR NATCHEZ, MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, August 18, 1798.

I have to request that you cause Zachariah Cox, said to be in the town of Natchez, to be immediately apprehended, and held in close custody in the fort under your command, until you may receive further instructions in the case from me, or he shall be liberated by the sovereign authority of the United States. For all which this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand and seal, day and place before mentioned.

W. SARGENT.

Mr. Cox may receive provisions for his use from the public, but he can have no attendant in whom you have not the most perfect confidence; and communications to and from him must be through the medium of a commissioned officer.

Captain COMM'T GUIAN.

SIR: NATCHEZ, September 28, 1798.

Presuming upon that "inviolable peace and sincere friendship" so happily established between His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, I hesitate not to request of your excellency that Zachariah Cox, who has been imprisoned within this Territory for the most atrocious misdemeanors, some of them tending to involve the United States in a war with Spain, and who made his escape on the night of the 20th instant, under circumstances so base as extremely to aggravate his guilt to men of honor, and who is said to have taken the way to New Orleans, may be arrested if he is to be found within your excellency's Government, and delivered over to a military escort from the troops of the United States, which General Wilkinson has assured me he will order to be at the national boundary to receive him, whenever it may best suit your excellency's convenience and pleasure.

The compact, sir, subsisting between our nations has most happily provided for rendering ample justice at their respective tribunals, to the subjects and citizens of either, in the recovery of the smallest property, payments of even trifling debts, and damages of what nature soever, that may have been sustained by either party, whether the causes of complaint be against our own citizens or subjects, or foreigners who may have taken refuge within our domains.

With such generous, such liberal provision, for matters which most certainly can be of no very great national concern, we must necessarily infer that our sovereigns have never intended any asylum for criminals within the realm. Mr. Cox's conduct cannot be investigated but in the Territory of the United States; if, therefore, your excellency should decline to give him up, (which I cannot believe possible,) it might have the fatal tendency to countenance and encourage every species of villainy within our respective Governments; for it would foster the hope of impunity amongst the most abandoned men.

To establish as sacred and immutable truth that first article of the treaty now subsisting between our nations, I fondly hope your excellency and myself shall pass no occasion of cementing the public amity, by the mutual exchange of good offices. The delivering up of Mr. Cox will rank high in this order, and be considered as rendering very eminent service to the United States and all good government. On my part, I shall but wait an opportunity to demonstrate equal accommodation, and follow the example of your excellency.

If Mr. Cox, sir, who is the subject of the enclosed, should not be within your excellency's Government, or if from any cause I am to fail of success in my present application, I have to request the same may be received in confidence, as an unnecessary alarm to him could produce no good effects whatever.

I am, most respectfully, your excellency's most obedient servant,

WINTHROP SARGENT.

NATCHEZ, MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, November 7, A. D. 1798.

Three hundred dollars reward, for apprehending and delivering to the undersigned, or to the commanding officer at Fort Sargent, in the town of Natchez, Mississippi Territory, at any time within the present year, Zachariah Cox, who was confined in said fort for high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States, and made his escape therefrom upon the twenty-sixth of September ultimo.

WINTHROP SARGENT.

DECEMBER 10, 1798.

The proceedings of Zachariah Cox, and his followers, as stated by General Wilkinson's communications, appearing to be aggressions on the Indian land, and consequently breaches of the law for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, subject them to arrest and punishment by that law in any State or Territory of the Union where they may be apprehended. The only question that occurs is, whether the warrant of arrest was issued on adequate proof of the offence? Proof for their conviction, it is hoped, will be timely found.

No. 167.

[1st SESSION.

ARREST OF ZACHARIAH COX BY THE GOVERNOR OF THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 28, 1803.

Mr. EARLY, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial and petition of Zachariah Cox, made the following report:

That they have examined the subject-matter of said memorial and petition, so far as the proofs before them have enabled them; that, from the documents referred to them, it does appear that the memorialist was arrested and confined at Natchez, at the time by him stated, by virtue of a warrant from Winthrop Sargent, then Governor of the Mississippi Territory, but in which warrant there is no charge stated, nor any cause assigned. It appears, however, that, previously to the issuing of said warrant, a letter had been written by Brigadier General Wilkinson to Governor Sargent, charging the memorialist, in general terms, with views hostile to the peace and interest of the United States, and in particular with having violated the law regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, in taking a position upon their land; to substantiate which charge some documents were transmitted with the letter, but which documents, in the opinion of the committee, fall very far short of proof. And from other evidence before the committee, and which accompany this report, it appears that the position complained of was not upon Indian land; and so far as the proofs inpossession of the committee have enabled them to judge, they are of opinion that the arrest and confinement were irregular and oppressive; but whilst this statement and the expression of this opinion appear to have been due to the reputation and feelings of the memorialist, the committee have not been able to discover any principle upon which the Government of the United States should be bound to compensate him for the losses stated by him to have been sustained: his redress must be from a court of justice. The committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialist cannot be granted.

WASHINGTON, November 26, 1803.

Mr. Z. Cox having mentioned to me that the committee on his petitions wish to be informed respecting the situation of Smithland, in Kentucky, as it respects the Indian boundary, I am well acquainted with Smithland, living but about twenty miles therefrom; the whole of the settlement made by Mr. Cox there, which is very considerable and respectable, is on this side of the marked line of the Indian boundary on the river Ohio, I should judge five miles; and it is my opinion that line no where comes nearer than that distance to Smithland. Since Mr. Cox left that country, the lands between his settlement and the Indian line have been settled by respectable people; such have been the inhabitants of Smithland since I have become acquainted there.

M. LYON.

To the Committee on the petition of Z. Cox.

WASHINGTON, November 1, 1803.

To the honorable the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. The remonstrance and memorial of Zachariah Cox respectfully represents:

That your memorialist, in the month of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, was passing down the river Mississippi, on a voyage to New Orleans, with a cargo of merchandise, conformable, in every respect, to the character and duty of a good citizen, and to the laws and treaties of the United States. On the eleventh day of the same month he arrived at Natchez with his cargo; he continued there until the eighteenth day of that month, demeaning himself with unquestionable order and propriety. In the night of that day, and about the middle of the night, his lodgings were surrounded by a body of armed men, belonging to the army of the United States, and commanded by officers in the service of the United States; he was made a prisoner, and taken into their custody. Your memorialist earnestly demanded the cause for which he was thus seized, but satisfaction was denied him. He was put into close confinement in a block-house, the lower part of which contained six or seven horse thieves, and communicated by a trap-door with that into which your memorialist was thrust. In this miserable situation was your memorialist kept for ten days and ten nights, without being allowed, during the whole of that time, to go out of the loft of the said block-house. In this period, his health beginning to impair, so much relaxation was obtained as to permit him to walk in the day time; but, excepting this indulgence, he was detained in the same close confinement for thirty-nine days and nights. Repeated applications were made by him to know the cause of his confinement, and answered only by repeated disdain. All access and communication from his friends without were denied him. Some of the most respectable characters in that quarter of the Union interested themselves, as he was afterwards informed, in his sufferings; among these were General George Matthews, Colonel Joseph Pannoll, and Doctor James White. To see him, or to know the cause of his confinement, were refused them with contempt; the best security which could be desired for the appearance in person of your memorialist, on any occasion, and before any tribunal that could be named, was tendered and rejected.

Such, legislators of the Union! was the treatment of a freeman, of an American citizen, within American territory, by American officers; and of a citizen who will challenge the world to prove, with respect to him, a single deviation from rectitude of conduct.

Deprived of every hope, your memorialist languished in this solitude and oppression until the twenty-sixth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight. On that day, an accident occurred which enabled him to effect his own escape; and, entertaining no hesitation in extricating himself, if possible, from the grasp of his merciless persecutors, he determined to avail himself of it, and fled for refuge to New Orleans.

He deemed it his first duty, on his arrival there, to make himself immediately known to the political authority of the place. On presenting himself to His Excellency Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos, then Governor of the province of Louisiana, that officer was struck with astonishment, and remained silent some minutes; at length he said: "Sir, how, in the name of God, did you come here? I have just received information, from General Wilkinson and others, that one Zachariah Cox, at the head of a lawless banditti, is now invading this province, with no other object than to harass and plunder the inhabitants; and here is my proclamation, warning them of their danger, and calling the militia to be in readiness. The letter which you hand me from the commander of New Madrid explains the error; but how is it possible that General Wilkinson should have given me such information?"

The impartial will judge of the embarrassment of your memorialist when he found the extent of his calumny, and the power of his calumniators; relying, however, in conscious rectitude, he trusted to the good sense of the Spanish officers, and met with justice, honor, and humanity.

Some days after your memorialist had been in New Orleans, a demand of his person was made on the Governor, in the name of General Wilkinson and Winthrop Sargent. Sensible of the gratitude he owed to that officer, your memorialist offered to him, if he considered his public duty required it, voluntarily to surrender himself at Natchez. The answer he received to this proposition was the following, in substance: "The treaty with the United States does not compel me to comply with any such demand; I should conceive it an indignity; the laws of Spain are competent to determine justice. You are now in His Catholic Majesty's dominions, and under my protection; if you have acted improperly, you must abide by the consequences; you are at liberty to stay here as long as you think proper, and to return to the United States when you please; and I feel bound to afford you every aid in my power, so far as my jurisdiction extends."

Words cannot express the grateful impression made on the mind of your memorialist by this magnanimous language and conduct of Governor Gayoso. The malice of his persecutors proved completely abortive.

Having finished his business at New Orleans, your memorialist returned into the United States by the way of the river Mobile. In passing through the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, your memorialist found that a considerable pecuniary reward was offered to those Indians to molest him. On arriving at Nashville, an officer of the army made an affidavit that your memorialist had escaped from confinement at the Natchez; and, on this, a federal judge issued a warrant to arrest him, and your memorialist was detained a further time of two months and twenty-two days, and then discharged, without any charge, crime, or offence being alleged against him.

The merchandise which your memorialist had with him, of considerable value, his barge, his negro servant, for whom he had paid five hundred dollars, with a variety of other articles, fell into the hands of his enemies, the federal officers. The losses of your memorialist, by occasion of this treatment, on a moderate estimate, are not less than nine thousand dollars.

Thus has your memorialist, from a state of affluence, by unjust persecution, been reduced to abject indigence, and deprived of his fame and credit.

The resources of your memorialist would not enable him to reach your honorable body with his complaint previous to the present time; he now comes forward and asks for redress at the bar of his injured country; he prays that an investigation of these transactions may be had; that punishment may reach the guilty; that the fame of your memorialist may be vindicated; and that his pecuniary losses may be made good to him. He is persuaded he will show to his country that he has been uniformly faithful to her, and to her laws; and he trusts that his country will show to him that, however high or potent his enemies, she has both the will and the power to protect him.

DIGEST OF THE LAWS OF LOUISIANA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 29, 1803.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

NOVEMBER 29, 1803.

I now communicate an appendix to the information heretofore given on the subject of Louisiana. You will be sensible, from the face of these papers, as well as of those to which they are a sequel, that they are not and could not be official, but are furnished by different individuals as the result of the best inquiries they had been able to make, and now given, as received from them; only digested under heads to prevent repetitions.

TH: JEFFERSON.

APPENDIX No. 1.

Don Alexander O'Reilly, commander of Benfayou, of the order of Alcantara, Lieutenant General of the armies of His Majesty, Inspector General of Infantry, and, by commission, Governor and Captain-General of the province of Louisiana.

The process which has been had in consequence of the insurrection which has taken place in this colony, having fully demonstrated the part and influence which the council have taken in those proceedings, countenancing, contrary to duty, the most criminal actions, when their whole care should have been directed to maintaining the people in the fidelity and subordination which are due to their Sovereign; for these reasons, and with a view to prevent hereafter evils of such magnitude, it is indispensable to abolish the said council, and to establish in their stead that form of political Government and administration of justice prescribed by our wise laws, and by which all the states of His Majesty in America have been maintained in the most perfect tranquillity, content, and subordination. For these causes, in pursuance of the power which our Lord the King (whom God preserve) has been pleased to confide to us by his patent, issued at Aranjuez, the 16th April, of the present year, to establish in the military police, and in the administration of justice and of his finances that form of government, dependence, and subordination, which should accord with the good of his service and the happiness of his subjects in this colony: We establish, in his royal name, a city council or cabildo, for the administration of justice and preservation of order in this city, with the number of six perpetual regidores, conformably to the second statute, title 10, book 5, of the Recopilation des Indes; among whom shall be distributed the offices of alferes royal, alcaid mayor provincial, alguazil mayor, depository general, and receiver of penas de camara, or fines for the use of the royal treasury; these shall elect, on the first day of every year, two judges, who shall be styled alcaids ordinary, a syndic procureur general, and a manager of the rents and taxes of the city; such as the laws have established for good government and the faithful administration of justice. And as the want of advocates in this country, and the little knowledge which his new subjects possess of the Spanish laws might render a strict observance of them difficult, and as every abuse is contrary to the intentions of His Majesty, we have thought it useful, and even necessary, to form an abstract or regulation drawn from the said statutes, which may serve for instruction and elementary formulary in the administration of justice and economical government of this city, until a more general knowledge of the Spanish language may enable every one, by the perusal of the aforesaid statutes, to extend his information to every point thereof. In consequence thereof, and with the reserve of His Majesty's good pleasure, we order and command the justices, cabildo, and their officers, to conform punctually to what is required by the following articles:

SECTION I.

OF THE CABILDO.

1. The cabildo, at which the Governor shall preside, or, in his absence, the alcaid ordinary, who shall have the first voice, shall assemble at the city hotel (1) on the first day of every year, and proceed to the election of alcaids ordinary and the other officers above mentioned; it shall also assemble every Friday, for the purpose of deliberating on all that may concern the public welfare. The syndic procureur-general shall propose in these assemblies what may appear to him for the welfare of the republic. One or two regidores shall immediately after inform the Governor, if he has not presided, of the resolutions that may have been taken; and, except in pressing cases when the cabildo for very important reasons may assemble at the Governor's dwelling, it shall not assemble in any other place than the city hotel; (2) under the penalty, to the officers who compose it, of being deprived of their employments.

2. In urgent cases, which cannot be deferred until the usual day of meeting, the regidores may hold an extraordinary sitting; they shall be notified to that effect by one of the door-keepers of the cabildo; (3) and if any one of the members shall not have been notified, the resolutions which may have been taken shall, if he shall challenge the same, be void; (4) as also in case the majority should not have been notified, even if those who have not been notified shall not object thereto. No assembly shall ever be held but by order of the Governor, and the assistants shall keep a profound silence in respect to the subject upon which the assembly may have deliberated.

3. The regidores shall have an active voice in the elections, as well as the alcaids of the preceding year, who shall remain in the cabildo until the election of their successors shall be confirmed, and they shall have been received. (5) The alcaid, however, who, in the absence of the Governor, shall exercise the functions of president, (6) shall not have an active voice; and so soon as the elections shall have been determined, the secretary of the cabildo shall give information thereof to the Governor, (7) who alone may decide on the validity of the opposition made by any member to the persons elected to the municipal offices, and confirm the alcaids and other officers.

4. The office of alcaid should be given to capable persons who may have the information necessary to fill worthily a charge so important. (8.) They shall have a house in the city, and shall reside therein. Those who are employed in the militia (9) may be named to those offices; and they may also be given to the regidores, whose employments may not be incompatible with those places. (10)

5. The alcaids, and the other elective officers of the cabildo, cannot be continued in their employments but when all the members without exception shall have given their votes for their continuation. (11) Without this condition, they cannot be re-elected until two years after they shall have quitted the distinguishing badge of their office. (12)

6. Neither the officers of the finances, (13) those who are indebted to the said finances, (14) the sureties of either the one or the other, (15) those who have not attained the age of twenty-six years, (16) nor the new converts to our holy faith, (17) can be elected to the said offices.

7. The election being confirmed by the Governor, the door-keepers shall deliver tickets from the scrivener to the elected, notifying them to attend at the hall of the assembly, in order to take the oath prescribed by law; (18) the form of which will be found annexed to this regulation, and to be received and put in possession of their offices.

8. The scrivener of the Government will keep a book entitled "Resolutions," in which he shall record the elections and the decisions of the assemblies, ordinary and extraordinary; and which shall be signed by all the judges and members who may have assisted thereat. (19.)

9. The regidores cannot give their votes for the said offices in favor of their father, son, brother, step-father, son-in-law, step-son, or step-brother of their wives, (20) although they may be elected by all those who shall be entitled to vote.

10. Whenever the cabildo shall deliberate upon an affair which may personally regard a regidor, or other officer of the cabildo, or even any one of his kindred, or for other particular reasons which might induce a suspicion of partiality, he shall withdraw immediately, and shall not return until the affair shall have been decided. (21.)

11. All decrees, royal provisions, and despatches, which may be addressed to the corporation either by the Governor or other authorized minister, shall be opened in the cabildo only, where they shall be recorded, and the originals preserved in the archives of the said cabildo. (22.)

12. In case of the death or absence of one of the alcaids ordinary, the alferes royal shall exercise the duties of that office during the time that may be wanting to complete the year of him who may be deceased or absent; and, if two alcaids should be wanting at the same time, the other place shall fall of right to the senior regidor, provided he does not hold in the cabildo any office incompatible with that employment, (23) as is specified in the present regulation, under the heads of those several offices.

13. Whenever the regidores may assist in a body, they shall preserve the order following, as also in the cabildo, viz: the alferes royal shall take the first place; (24) the alcaid mayor provincial the next; the alguazil mayor, and the other regidores according to their rank and their seniority.

14. Each regidor, according to his rank, and by turns, shall be charged with the maintenance of the municipal ordinances, and the other dispositions of government for the public good. He shall attend to the prices of provisions, exacting the fines, and putting in force the penalties incurred by the delinquents.

15. Whenever there shall be the question of augmenting the price of meat, with which this city is abundantly and constantly supplied, the cabildo, at a public bidding, shall adjudge the contract to him who shall oblige himself to furnish it on the best terms and for the greatest advantage of the public.

16. The cabildo shall have cognizance of appeals from sentences pronounced either by the Governor, or by the alcaids ordinary where the sum does not exceed 90,000 maravedis; (25) which must be understood as extending only to causes wholly civil, for in criminal cases the appeal must be made to the superior tribunal, which His Majesty will have the goodness to appoint, in consequence of my representations to him on that subject.

17. To legalize similar appeals, the cabildo shall name two regidores, who, in quality of commissioners, and after having taken the oath, shall decide on the justice or injustice of the sentence from which an appeal is made, conjointly with the judge who may have pronounced the same. (26) This nomination shall be made so soon as the cabildo shall be required thereto by the appellant; the form of which, and of the institution of the said appeal, will be detailed in their places.

18. In the first ordinary assembly which may be held after that for the elections of each year, the cabildo shall name two regidores to receive the accounts of the mayordome de propios of the preceding year of the sums which he may have received for account of the city, and of the expenditures by order of the cabildo for the objects to which those sums are destined. They shall have those accounts rendered with the greatest exactitude, and shall oblige the said mayordome to deliver up immediately to his successor the residue of the said account; the said regidores being responsible for the total thereof when the said accounts shall be settled by one of the principal officers of finance. (27)

19. Although the application and expenditure of the propios for the objects to which they are destined belongs to the cabildo, it cannot, even in extraordinary cases, dispose of more than 3,000 maravedis thereof; and when a greater expenditure may be necessary, the consent of the Governor must be previously obtained, without which the said cabildo cannot assign either salary or allowance upon any occasion whatsoever. (28.)

20. The electors in the two jurisdictions being responsible for the injury and detriment which the public may sustain by the bad conduct and incapacity of the elected for the administration of justice and the management of the public interests, should have for their only objects in the election of alcaids ordinary and the other officers the service of God, the King, and the republic; and, to prevent an abuse of that great trust, their choice should be directed to those persons who shall appear most suitable for those offices, by the proofs they may possess of their affection for the King, their disinterestedness, and their zeal for the public welfare.

21. The cabildo is hereby informed that it should exact from the Governors, previous to their taking possession, a good and sufficient surety and a full assurance that they will submit to the necessary inquiries and examinations during the time they may exercise their employments; and that they will pay what may be adjudged and determined in that respect. (29) This article merits the most serious attention of the cabildo, who is responsible for the consequences which may result from an omission or neglect of exacting those securities from the Governor.

22. The offices of regidor and scrivener of the cabildo may be sold; those officers shall also be allowed to assign them in the manner prescribed by the laws of this kingdom. In acknowledgment of this favor, and in consideration of the value that these offices will acquire by the facility of assigning them, by which they will be effectively transferred from one person to another, there shall be paid into the royal treasury, for the first assignment, one-half the sum at which the said offices may be rated, and one-third of the same for every subsequent assignment thereof, exclusive of the royal custom of half annats, (receivable without any deduction in Spain;) (30) which custom shall also be paid by the alcaids ordinary who may be yearly elected to those offices.

23. To render these assignments valid, the assigner should survive the same the term of twenty days, computing from the date thereof; and the assignee should present himself to the Governor within seventy days from the date of the same, provided with an authentic act substantiating the said assignment, as likewise the abovementioned twenty days that the assigner shall have survived the same. Should neither of those precautions be taken, the assigner shall forfeit the said office, which shall be deemed vacant to the profit of the King's demesne; and neither he nor his heirs may lay claim to any portion of the price at which the same may be sold. (31.)

24. The said assignments shall not be valid, unless made in favor of persons known to be capable, (32) of the age of twenty-six years, and possessing the capacity and talents necessary to the common good of the republic, and worthy of the cabildo, on account of the injury which would result therefrom should those officers be deficient in these qualifications. (33) The said assignments shall be carefully executed and preserved by a public notary of the place at which they may be made. (34)

SECTION II.

OF THE ALCAIDS ORDINARY.

1. The alcaids ordinary shall have cognizance of all matters in dispute, either civil or criminal, between inhabitants residing within their jurisdiction, which shall extend throughout the city and the dependencies thereof, excepting those which may come within the cognizance of the ecclesiastical, military, or other special court. (1)

2. The alcaids ordinary cannot interfere in affairs of Government, which come exclusively within the jurisdiction and competency of the governor. (2)

3. In all matters on which the cabildo may deliberate, the alcaids ordinary, who may assist thereat, shall, during their year of office, have an equal vote with the regidores. (3)

4. The alcaids shall appear in public with decency and modesty, bearing the wand of royal justice—a badge provided by law to distinguish the judges. (4) When administering justice they shall hear mildly those who may present themselves, and shall fix the hour and the place of audience, which should be at 10 o'clock in the morning, at the city hotel; (5) and for the decision of verbal causes, in the evening between 7 and 8 o'clock, at their own dwellings, and in none other.

5. One of the principal objects of justice being to prevent, effectually, those disorders which take place during the night, one of the alcaids, assisted by his alguazils and the scrivener, should go the rounds of the city; and, in case a greater force should be necessary, they may not only demand it from those persons who may be present, but also from the corps-de-garde nearest thereto.

6. It is also the duty of the alcaids ordinary to keep a watchful eye upon fornication, and to punish the same, and all other public offences, conformably to the laws; of which a sufficient detail will be given herein.

7. The alcaids may hear and decide verbally in civil causes, when the demand shall not exceed twenty piasters, (6) as also in criminal causes of little importance. They may also hear and decide verbally those which may exceed that sum, in case the parties interested shall consent thereto.

8. Causes legally brought before one of the judges shall be continued and determined in his tribunal, and neither the governor nor any other shall deprive him of the cognizance thereof. (7.) The governor, however, being required thereto by the parties, may, by an order in writing, and suitable to the case, require and summon the alcaid to render speedy justice, conformably to law.

9. In cases of controversy, with respect to jurisdiction, between the governor and one of the alcaids, or between these last, where one of them may claim the cognizance of a cause instituted with the other, either by reason of the said cause having been also instituted in his tribunal, or his supposing the same exclusively within his jurisdiction, they shall draw up a procès-verbal of the said controversy, in which they shall set forth their pretensions in a grave and judiciary style. The case shall remain in suspense until the decision of the superior, whom they shall be bound to consult, and to whom they shall deliver an exact copy of the proceeding, unless one of the judges may give way to the claim of the other, and thereby put an end to the said controversy. If, however, in the interval of the decision, one of the judges should proceed in, or take the least cognizance of, the aforesaid cause, he shall forfeit his claim to the same, which shall be immediately vested in the other. (8.)

10. If one of the parties pleading shall except against the alcaid who may have already taken cognizance of a cause, he may not continue the same but in conjunction with the other; and, if this last should also be excepted against, he shall associate himself with a regidor, who shall take an oath to do his duty impartially, and to terminate the cause according to law, and as speedily as possible. Whatever may be done by the alcaid alone, after he may have been excepted against, shall be void and of non-effect. The oath taken by the party to the written act of exception, that he is mistrustful of the alcaid, shall be sufficient to render the same valid; but, if the party shall purpose to exclude him entirely from the hearing of the cause, besides the aforesaid oath, he shall make known and substantiate the ground on which he relies for the support of his pretensions. If the judge should be related, even in the fourth degree, to the adverse party, or in such habits of friendship with him as to excite a suspicion of partiality, or prepossessed against the exceptor, in all these cases he shall be excluded from the hearing of the cause in controversy, which shall be committed to the other alcaid.

11. Two referees appointed, one by the alcaid, and the other by the exceptor, after being sworn to execute their office impartially, shall determine whether the case be of the nature before mentioned; and, if of the said nature, they shall exact the entire exclusion of the alcaid therefrom; and, if a difference should arise between the referees, a third, named by the judge, shall decide therein; which decision shall be indispensably binding.

12. The diversity of cases not permitting a special detail of the forms of proceeding therein, the alcaids shall be guided by the formulary hereunto annexed; and shall consult with the counsellor, to be appointed for that purpose, upon all doubtful cases which may occur in their practice, or which may not be provided for by the said formulary; and shall approach, as nearly as possible, to the spirit of our laws for the administration of justice.

13. The alcaids ordinary, accompanied by the alguazil mayor, and the scrivener, shall, every Friday, make the visitation of the prison. They shall examine the prisoners, the causes of their detention, and the time of their imprisonment. (9) They shall release the poor who may be detained for their expenses, or for small debts; and the jailer shall not exact from them any releasement fee. (10) The alcaids may not set at liberty any of the prisoners detained by order of the governor, or of any other judge, without their express consent.

14. They may not release those who are imprisoned for debts due to the domain; (11) nor for fines imposed by law, unless the sum due shall be previously deposited. (12)

15. The governor, with the alcaids, the alguazil mayor, and the scrivener, shall, yearly, on the eves of Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost, make a general visitation of the prisons, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the Indies. (13) They shall release those who have been arrested for criminal causes of little importance, or for debts, when the debtors are known to be insolvent; and shall allow them a sufficient term for the payment of their creditors.

SECTION III.

OF THE ALCAID MAYOR PROVINCIAL.

1. The regidor alcaid mayor provincial shall bear the rod of justice, and shall have cognizance of crimes committed in the inhabited places without the cities and villages. (14) Thefts, robberies, carrying away of property by force, rapes, as also treason, malice, accompanied by wounds, or followed by death, setting fire to or burning down of houses or crops, and other crimes of this nature, shall be within the competency of the said alcaid mayor provincial.

2. He may also take cognizance of the aforesaid crimes, although committed in cities, when the offenders have quitted the same, and have withdrawn to the country with their plunder; as also of murders or assaults committed on their officers while in the exercise of their duties, or in the interval thereof, if the same are the effect of malice. (1) If, however, the governor, or one of the judges ordinary of the city, shall have previously taken cognizance thereof, the alcaid mayor provincial shall not interfere therein, by reason that the jurisdiction of the same is vested in the alcaid ordinary. (2) The judge, however, who shall have apprehended the offender, shall have the preference therein, even if the others should have preceded him. (3)

3. Whenever it shall be known that the crime does not concern the tribunal of the Saint Hermandad, the alcaid mayor provincial shall refer the cognizance of the same to one of the alcalds ordinary, without waiting until he may be required thereto. (4)

4. The alcaid mayor provincial shall see that travellers are furnished with provisions at reasonable prices, as well by the proprietors of plantations as by the inhabitants of the places through which they may pass. (5)

5. The principal object in the institution of the tribunal of the St. Hermandad being to repress disorders, and to prevent the robberies and assassinations committed in unfrequented places by vagabonds and delinquents, who conceal themselves in the woods and attack travellers and the adjacent inhabitants, the alcaid mayor provincial should assemble a sufficient number of the commissaries or brothers of the St. Hermandad to clear his jurisdiction of those kinds of people, by pursuing them with spirit, seizing or putting them to flight. (6)

6. For the purpose aforesaid, and conformably to the usage of the other India provinces within the domain of His Majesty, the alcalds mayors provinciaux, their commissaries, and the brothers of the St. Hermandad, shall have the right of arresting, either within or without the city, all runaway negroes and fugitives, and may exact a reasonable fee therefor; which right shall not be vested in any other person save the master of the fugitive slave.

The said fee is so much the more just, inasmuch as the alcaid mayor provincial, to comply with his duty, must, at his own expense, travel through the unfrequented places, for the benefit of the inhabitants.

7. The said officer shall render speedy justice in all matters within his competency, (7) and from his judgment there shall be no appeal; (8) otherwise it would be impossible to remedy the injurious consequences that would result therefrom. But, on the other hand, his judgments shall be pronounced in strict conformity with the spirit of the laws, to which end he shall consult some lawyer; but, in the interim, he shall be guided by the instructions herein contained, which relate to the administration of justice and the forms of proceeding.

8. This office of the Hermandad being created with a view to prevent those disorders which may be committed in unfrequented places, the alcaid mayor should make frequent excursions from the city. This duty consequently renders his employment incompatible with that of alcaid ordinary, to which he cannot be elected, unless he shall have previously obtained permission of the King, to commit to a lieutenant, appointed by himself, the duties of the St. Hermandad.

9. The said officer, and his lieutenants, should take an oath, of the form annexed to this abridgment; he shall account to the governor for the appointments he may have made, and shall notify him of the judgments he may have pronounced, to the end that the same may be put into execution. Although this formality is not prescribed by any law, yet it is necessary for the purpose of preserving harmony and subordination, and for the facility of procuring assistance.

10. In all controversies, with respect to jurisdiction, which may occur between the tribunal of the St. Hermandad, and any other tribunal of the province, the parties shall conform punctually to the instructions which have been given in the particular article which relates to the alcalds ordinary. The instructions which have been given in relation to exceptions against judges, should also be strictly followed, as no altercation should take place on that subject between these officers.

SECTION IV.

OF THE ALGUAZIL MAYOR.

1. The alguazil mayor is an officer charged with the execution of sentences and judgments rendered, as well for payments ordered, taking possession of goods for sale, and imprisonments, as for the punishment of crimes. He cannot be elected alcaid ordinary, (9) unless he shall have appointed a lieutenant to discharge his duties, in the manner prescribed to the alcaid mayor provincial. (10)

2. Recovery of moneys upon writs of execution, orders for taking possession of goods, and seizures of real property, shall be carefully executed by the alguazil mayor, taking the fees allowed by law, (11) and fixed by the tariff included in the present regulation.

3. The alguazil mayor shall also have the superintendance of the prisons, shall commission the jailers, (12) and keepers of prisons, after having presented them to the governor, that he may judge of their capacity for those offices, (13) under the penalty of being deprived, for one year, of the right of nominating the same; which shall, for that term, be vested in the governor. All the jail fees which the prisoners may pay shall be for the use of the alguazil mayor.

4. The said officer cannot appoint as lieutenants any persons but such as are known to be suitable for those employments, (14) who are young, and do not exercise any mechanical profession; they shall be presented to the governor, and approved by him, and shall take the oath required. (15) The alguazil mayor may not appoint to the said office either the relations or domestics of the judges and officers, (16) but he shall be allowed to change the said lieutenants when he may have just reasons therefor. (17)

5. The alguazil mayor and his lieutenants shall go the rounds, and shall visit the public places, both by night and day, to prevent noises and disputes, (18) under the penalty of being suspended in their offices, and payment of the damages that may result from their negligence. (19) They shall arrest, without other authority, the offenders, and shall give immediate information thereof to the alcalds. (20) They shall not tolerate unlawful games, nor public and scandalous offences. (1) They are also hereby informed that, although they have the power of arresting any one without other authority, they may not release the same, under the penalty of being deprived of their offices, and of being declared incapable of holding any other. (2)

6. The alguazil mayor shall conform strictly to the articles which relate to the prisons, and to the tariff which specifies the fees which are demandable. He shall also assist with the judges ordinary in the visitations of the prisons, which shall be made at the times prescribed by this regulation.

SECTION V.

OF THE DEPOSITARY GENERAL.

1. The depositary general whose duties are incompatible with those of a judge cannot be elected alcaid ordinary, unless he may name a lieutenant, who may be charged with the care of the deposits.

2. Before entering upon the said office, the depositary general shall give good and sufficient sureties, who shall answer for the safety of the deposits, and who shall be approved by the governor, the alcalds, and the cabildo. (3) This warranty shall be recorded in the book to be kept by the scrivener of the cabildo, for the recording of the deposits; (4) in which he shall inscribe the day, month, and year, of the said warranty.

3. The governor, the alcalds, and the cabildo, shall carefully examine the books which exhibit the sureties of the depositary general, the state of his property, and that of the said sureties, which shall be certified by the scrivener of the cabildo, in order that the same may be verified the succeeding year, and the necessary order taken thereon. (5)

4. If, by the said examination, it shall be found that the situation of the depositary general, or of his sureties, be such as to excite apprehension, they shall prevent him from exercising the duties of his office, until he shall have rendered his accounts, and given a better security. (6)

5. The depositary general shall deliver on the first order the sums which may have been deposited with him, in the same coin in which he received them; to which the judges, and other officers competent thereto, should pay particular attention. (7)

6. The depositary general shall record the deposits in a book similar to that of the scrivener of the cabildo; (8) he shall receive for the same, and for deposit fees, three per cent., as explained in the commission which he has received for the exercise of his office.

SECTION VI.

OF THE RECEIVER OF FINES.

1. The receiver of fines (whose duties are incompatible with those of alcaid ordinary) shall have cognizance of all matters in relation thereto, as also of those imposed by the judge; (9) of which last he shall keep and render an account, having for that purpose a book similar to that kept by the scrivener for the same object; in which they shall be entered according to date.

2. For the security of the balance of the account rendered by the receiver of fines, he shall give good and sufficient sureties, (10) in the same manner as the depositary general. Examination shall yearly be made into the situation of the said sureties, which shall be changed if become less substantial.

3. To the end that the receiver may fully discharge the duties of his office, and a certain knowledge be acquired of the funds in his possession, the scrivener, in whose presence the fines will have been laid, shall advise the scrivener of the cabildo of the same, who shall enter them in a book, the leaves of which shall be marked by the governor. (11) After which the scrivener of the cabildo shall inform the receiver thereof, who, by these means, will at once perceive the amount of the sums which he should receive; and the book of the cabildo will serve to make him render an account of the sums which are entered therein.

4. The receiver of fines cannot employ the proceeds thereof without the order or permission of His Majesty, by reason that the same being the property of His Majesty cannot be removed without his approbation. He shall dispose of that portion of them only which have been imposed by the judges (12) in conformity to the orders he may receive, and not otherwise.

5. The receiver shall discharge, out of the aforesaid portion of fines, the drafts which may be drawn by the governor, the alcalds, and the other judges, who shall restrain themselves to the sums which may be necessary. (13)

6. The said receiver shall render a yearly account of the sums he may have received and paid in the execution of his office. His account shall be settled by the officers of finance appointed thereto in this province. (14)

7. He shall be allowed a commission of ten per cent. on all sums which may be recovered and received by himself, or by those commissioned by him, for the recovery thereof. (15)

SECTION VII.

OF THE PROCUREUR GENERAL.

1. The procureur general of the republic is an officer appointed to assist the public in all their concerns, to defend them, pursue their rights and obtain justice, and to pursue all other claims which have relation to the public cause. (16)

2. In consequence thereof, the procureur general, who is appointed solely for the public good, shall see that the municipal ordinances are strictly observed, and shall endeavor to prevent every matter or thing by which the said public might suffer.

3. For these purposes he shall apply to the tribunals competent thereto, for the recovery of debts and revenues due to the city funds, in quality of attorney for the city. He shall pursue causes with the activity and diligence necessary to discharge him from the responsibility in which he would be placed by the slightest omission.

4. He shall see that the other officers of the council or cabildo discharge strictly the duties of their offices; that the depositary general, the receiver of fines, and all those who are to give sureties, shall give such as are good and sufficient; and in case of decadency therein, he shall demand the renewal thereof, conformably to law.

5. He shall be present at, and shall interpose in, the division of lands, and other public matters (17) to the end that nothing unsuitable or injurious may occur in the distribution of the same.

SECTION VIII.

OF THE MAYORDOME DES PROPRES.

1. The mayordome des propres shall have the management of, and shall receive all that is comprised within the denomination of city funds; he shall give receipts to debtors, and shall record all sums which he may receive, as also the expenditures he may make for account of the cabildo, in order that he may be able to render his accounts so soon as his year of office shall expire.

2. He shall discharge the drafts of the cabildo, upon the rents of the city, and none other. He shall abstain from furnishing or lending any sums to any individual whomsoever, under the penalty of being responsible therefor, and of being declared incapable of holding any office under the republic.

3. The construction and keeping in repair of bridges, within and without the city, shall not be defrayed out of the city funds; this expense shall be borne by those who shall enjoy the benefit thereof, amongst whom the same shall be proportioned in the manner pointed out by stat. 1, tit. 16, book 4, of the Recopilation des Indes.

4. Whenever any public work shall be undertaken, either by the cabildo or by individuals, care shall be taken that the same may be substantial and durable. (1) A regidor shall be named for that purpose, who, without any requital, shall inspect the said undertaking. (2)

5. The expense of public mourning for the royal family shall be defrayed from the city funds, with all the economy which the cabildo can adapt to these circumstances. (3)

SECTION IX.

OF THE SCRIVENER OF THE CABILDO.

1. This officer shall preserve in his archives all the papers which may concern the cabildo, or its proceedings. He shall inscribe in a book all the securities and deposits which have relation to the depositary general; and, in another book, those which relate to the receiver of fines. He shall, also, keep a third book for guardians and their sureties, ordinary and extraordinary, in which he shall also record the patents and commissions by His Majesty, (4) and shall take care to preserve the originals in the archives of the cabildo.

2. The scrivener of the cabildo shall never suffer any paper or act to be removed from his archives, and if the judges should be obliged to have recourse to the same, he shall furnish them a correct copy thereof, but shall never part with the original. (5)

3. The said scrivener of the cabildo, and of the Government, shall note, at the foot of all acts and instruments of writing, and copies of the same which he may deliver, the fees which he has received therefor, under the penalty of forfeiting the same, and of incurring the other penalties established, to prevent him from exacting more than is allowed by the tariff. (6)

4. The scrivener of the cabildo and of the Government shall inscribe, in a separate book, the mortgages upon all contracts which may be made before him or any other; he shall certify, at the foot of each deed, the charge or mortgage under which the sale or the obligation may have been made, conformably to the intention of the law, in order to prevent the abuses and frauds which usually result therefrom.

5. The regidors, the scrivener, and all those who may succeed to any of the venal offices established by the India laws, are hereby informed that the royal ordinances require, that within the term of five years, computing from the date of their commission, they must obtain His Majesty's confirmation, and present the same to the governor of the city or province in which they reside, under the penalty of being deprived of the said offices.

SECTION X.

OF THE JAILER AND THE PRISONS.

1. The jailer shall be appointed by the alguazil mayor, and approved by the governor, before entering on the duties of his office. He shall also be presented to the cabildo to be received, and to take an oath to discharge faithfully the duties of the said office, to guard the prisoners, and to observe the laws and ordinances established in this respect, under the penalties therein declared. (7)

2. The said jailer may not enter upon the duties of the said office, until he shall have given good and sufficient sureties in the sum of two hundred piasters, which surety shall warrant that no prisoner detained for debt shall be released without an order from the judge competent thereto. (8)

3. The jailer shall keep a book in which he shall inscribe the names of all the prisoners, that of the judge by whose order they have been arrested, the cause for which they are detained, and the names of those who may have arrested them. (9) He shall reside in prison, and for each considerable fault committed by him he shall pay sixty piasters, applicable one half to the royal chamber, and the other to the informer. (10)

4. It is the duty of the jailer to keep the prison clean and healthy, to supply it with water for the use of the prisoners, (11) to visit them in the evening, (12) to prevent them from gaming or disputing, (13) to treat them well, and to avoid insulting or offending them. (14)

5. It is likewise the duty of the jailer to take care that the female prisoners are separate from the men; (15) that both of them are kept in their respective apartments, and that they are not worse treated than their offence deserves, or than is prescribed by the judges. (16)

6. With respect to his fees, the said jailer shall confine himself strictly to those which are established; he shall take none from the poor under a penalty of the value of the same. (17) He may not, without incurring the same penalty, receive any gratification either in money or goods. (18) He shall avoid entirely either playing, eating, or forming any intimacy with the prisoners, (19) under the penalty of sixty piasters, applicable one-third to the royal chamber, one-third to the informer, and the remaining third to the poor prisoners.

I also swear to obey the royal ordinances and the decrees of His Majesty, faithfully to discharge the duties of my office, to decide according to law in all cases which may come before my tribunal; and for the more certain attainment thereto, I promise to consult with such as are well informed in the law, whenever opportunities may occur in this city; and, lastly, I swear that I will never exact other fees than those fixed by the tariff, and that I will never take any from the poor.

Don Manuel Joseph de Urrustia and the counsellor Don Felix Rey, by order of his excellency Don Alexander O'Reilly, Governor and Captain General of this province, by special commission of His Majesty.*

SECTION I.

OF CIVIL JUDGMENTS IN GENERAL.

It must, in the first place, be observed that in causes civil or criminal, of any nature whatsoever, persons belonging to any religious order may neither appear, nor make any demand without the permission of their superior. This permission is equally necessary to the son, whose father be living, and whose consent must be obtained; to the slave, who may not act without the consent of his master; to the minor, who must be authorized by his guardian, who may be chosen by himself at the full age of fourteen years, or appointed by the judge, when of an age less advanced; to the wife, who must obtain the permission of her husband; and, lastly, to lunatics and idiots, who must be represented by the guardian appointed by law to the care of their persons and property.

2. It must also be observed that the consent of the father is not necessary to the son, when pleading in his own name for the recovery of property or rights acquired by his services in war, which are styled castrensés, or by particular gratification from the prince; or lastly, of those he may have acquired by some public employment, which are styled quasi castrensés. But in the case where the son shall demand a maintenance or wish to be emancipated from his father, he shall previously obtain the permission of the judge, by reason of the consideration and great respect due to a father, or other superior. The slave is also allowed the same course of proceeding towards his master, if the latter, in the exercise of his authority, shall exceed the bounds prescribed by law; in which case the slave is entitled to require either his liberty or to be sold. The wife may, also, without the consent of her husband, require her dowry, if he shall be on the point of squandering the same; or an alimony, in the case of separation or ill-treatment.

3. He who may purpose to institute an action at law for a sum exceeding one hundred livres, shall commence the same by a petition setting forth the fact, and the motives upon which he proceeds; he shall also specify whether his demand be for the proceeds of some sale, for money lent, or other similar claim, with every circumstance necessary to the elucidation of the case, and for the information of the judge. He shall conclude by requiring either the return of the money, if lent, or the payment of his demand, and the condemnation of the adverse party to the payment of costs, if he shall unjustly maintain the contrary.

4. The said petition shall be signed by the party or by his proxy, and shall then be presented to the judge, who shall cause the same to be communicated to the party against whom the demand may be made, which proceeding shall have the validity of a citation. The defendant shall make his defence within nine days, computing from the day on which he may have been notified of the demand. He shall draw up a counter-declaration in answer thereto, which shall contain such arguments as tend to defeat the claim of the adverse party, if the same be not indisputable, and shall make his defence in the manner observed by the plaintiff in his introductory petition.

5. If the defendant does not answer within the nine days, the plaintiff shall require judgment by default, by a writing setting forth that the delay has expired; and moving that, no answer having been made, the defendant be condemned by default; and that, consequently, his claim be reputed acknowledged and sufficiently established.

6. If, on the contrary, the defendant shall answer within the nine days, and shall allege that he is not bound to defend the suit as to the merits thereof, by reason that judgment in the case is not within the competency of the judge who has taken cognizance of the same, that the plaintiff cannot plead in his own name, that the term of his engagement has not yet expired, or other similar exceptions, communication thereof shall be made to the plaintiff that he may reply, within six days, thereto. Upon his replication the judge shall decide whether the cause shall be defended as to the merits thereof; in which case, without admitting an appeal, the said cause shall be tried for the merits thereof.

7. But if the defendant, without producing any similar exception, shall set forth pleas tending indirectly to admit the demand, as by alleging that the thing demanded has not become due, that the same has been already paid, or any other pleas, supported by vouchers, which may be admitted before the putting of the cause to issue, the effect of which pleas would discharge him from the demand, the same shall be communicated to the plaintiff, to reply thereto: a copy of which reply shall be delivered to the defendant for a rejoinder to the same; after which the judge shall require the documents, and shall proceed to give judgment.

8. If the fact contested should be admitted to proof, as being doubtful, the same shall be determined within eighty days, at furthest; during which delay the parties shall furnish their proofs, and shall summon each other reciprocally to attend to the administering of the oath to the witnesses.

9. The testimony of the witnesses shall be so secretly given that neither of the parties shall have knowledge of the depositions of his own witnesses, nor of those of the adverse party. The term to which the cause may have been continued having expired, one of the parties shall move that by reason of the said expiration the testimony of the witnesses be made public. This motion shall be communicated to the other party, who shall consent thereto, or if he shall not reply to the same, he shall be condemned by default, in the manner observed when one of the parties does not reply to the plea of the other. The judge shall order the publication of the said testimony, and the delivery thereof to the parties; observing that the same be first delivered to the plaintiff, that he may, if necessary, strengthen the same.

10. The testimony being made public, should the plaintiff find the witnesses of the defendant inadmissible, as being either his enemies, or the intimate friends or relations of the defendant, or for other causes which may weaken the faith which would otherwise be due to their testimony, he shall draw up a declaration in which his exceptions shall be specified, after taking an oath that he has no intention of offending them; which oath shall be notified to the defendant, who may in reply state his exceptions to the witnesses of the plaintiff. The said exceptions shall then be put to the proof, and forty days may be granted therefor: one-half of the term allowed for the decision of the principal cause.

11. When the term allowed for the admission to proof of the exceptions shall have expired, the publication of the testimony, as in the principal cause, shall not be allowed; but the documents shall be delivered to the plaintiff, that he may set forth his proof; and if he shall establish that the same is more complete than that of the adverse party, a copy thereof shall be given to the defendant, upon whose reply, or in default thereof, the judge shall declare the controversy determined. He shall then order that the parties be summoned for the final decision, which must be given within twenty days, computing from the day on which he may have required the documents in the cause. He shall attentively examine the said documents, and determine the suit by condemning the debtor to payment, or by discharging him from the demand, according to the merits of the case.

12. If judgment be given for a sum not exceeding 90,000 maravedis, an appeal to the cabildo may be made within five days, computing from the day on which the parties may have been notified of the sentence. If the judgment given be for a greater sum, an appeal shall be made to the tribunal to be appointed by His Majesty, in consequence of the representations which have been made to him on that subject. A brief explanation of the manner in which this recourse may be had, will be given at the conclusion of these instructions.

13. If no appeal shall be lodged within the five days allowed, the party, who may have obtained judgment in his favor, shall draw up a writing by which he shall move that no appeal having been made within the legal delay, the judgment be considered definitive; and that, in pursuance thereof, execution be ordered; a copy of which shall be given to the adverse party; and on his reply, or in default thereof, the judge shall pronounce both on the validity of the judgment and the expiration of the delay; after which he shall order that the sentence take effect, and be put into execution.

SECTION II.

OF EXECUTIONS.

1. When a debt shall be fully established, and importing a confession of judgment, as by an agreement or obligation made before a notary; by a simple note, legally acknowledged by the drawer; by confession of judgment, although without any written title from the debtor; by a definitive sentence of the court, or by the cash books of the debtor acknowledged by him; in all these cases the creditor shall draw up a declaration setting forth his claim and his action, annexing thereto the document which entitles him to a writ of execution, and moving that, by virtue of the said document, a writ of execution be granted him for the sum due, as also the tenth, and the costs which may be allowed. He shall observe that his declaration contains the oath that the sum demanded is due, and ought to be paid by the debtor.

2. The judge shall examine if the document which entitles the creditor to a recovery imports a confession of judgment; and, if such be the case, he shall order immediate execution, by addressing an order in writing to the alguazil mayor, directing him to summon the debtor to pay the demand, or, in default thereof, his property shall be seized to the value of the same, with the tenth and the costs.

3. By virtue of the said order the alguazil mayor shall summon the debtor; if he complies, the execution shall cease. If otherwise, his property shall be seized and held in custody by the depositary general; unless he shall give good and sufficient security for the payment of the sum in which he is condemned by the sentence. But if he shall not give the security aforesaid, or if he has not property sufficient, he shall be imprisoned, unless exempted therefrom by the privilege of nobility, which is also enjoyed by the military, regidores, officers of finance, women, lawyers, physicians, and other distinguished persons. The alguazil mayor shall note, at the foot of the writ, his proceedings thereon, as also the day and the hour of the same.

4. The property being seized, the creditor shall, by another writing, move that the same be valued by two capable persons, on whom the parties may agree, and that public notice be given that the sale thereof will be made after the usual delay, according to the nature of the property. The said delay shall be of nine days' duration, for personal property, with a public notice every three days; and of thirty days' duration, for real property, of which notice shall be given every nine days; but, if the debtor shall consent, the said notices need not be given.

5. The said term being expired, and public notice being given, the creditor shall require that the debtor be definitively summoned to make opposition, and to prove that the sum demanded is not due or has already been paid. In pursuance thereof the debtor shall be definitively summoned, if he has not previously opposed, which he might do during the time of the seizure, or of his detention in prison.

6. If the debtor shall not make opposition, within three days, computing from the day on which he may have been definitively summoned, he shall be attached by default; but if he shall make opposition, he shall be ordered to prove his exceptions within ten days at furthest, which shall be common to both parties to prove the justice of their pretensions in the manner which to them may seem best.

7. During the said delay, the proofs offered by the two parties shall be received, and they shall cite each other reciprocally to attend at the administering of the oath to the witnesses, in conformity to the provision of section 1, Nos. 8 and 9, for civil judgments in general; with this difference, however, that the said delay may be prolonged at the request of the creditor, and in which case the debtor shall enjoy the benefit of the said prolongation.

8. The term allowed having expired, no further proof shall be allowed, save the confession of the party; and the documents shall be returned to the creditor that he may set forth his right, of which a copy shall be given to the debtor. Upon his reply, or in default thereof, the judge shall require the documents, and shall proceed to give judgment.

9. He shall examine with attention if the exceptions made by the debtor are just, and more fully established than the claim of the plaintiff; and, if such be the case, he shall discharge him from the demand instituted against him. He shall order the restoration of his property, and shall condemn the plaintiff to the payment of costs.

10. If, on the contrary, the debtor has not proved his exceptions, and the sum demanded be found legally due, the judge shall declare the seizure to be valid, and shall order the fourth and last public notice of the sale to be given, and the adjudication of the property to the highest bidder, that from the proceeds of the same the demand of the creditor may be fully discharged, as also the tenth and the costs. The creditor shall, however, be held to give security in the amount of the sum, lest the sentence should be annulled by a superior tribunal.

11. This sentence shall be carried into execution notwithstanding appeal, but shall not prevent the party who may have been aggrieved from appealing to the cabildo, provided the sum does not exceed 90,000 maravedis;* otherwise the appeal must be made to the superior tribunal, to be hereafter appointed by His Majesty.

12. Definitive judgment being pronounced, the day for the fourth and last notice of the sale of the property seized shall be appointed. On the said day the sale shall be made in the presence of the parties, who shall be legally summoned to attend; and the amount of his demand shall be paid to the creditor, who shall give the security aforesaid; the tenth shall be paid to the alguazil mayor, and the costs and expenses to the other officers, in conformity to the regulations of the tariff.

13. It must be observed, that, if the debtor discharges his debt within seventy-two hours after the seizure is pronounced to be valid, the tenth shall not be demanded; but in default thereof, the payment of the same may not be dispensed with; and on this account it has been heretofore declared indispensably necessary to note the day and the hour of the proceedings in the seizure.

SECTION III.

OF JUDGMENT IN CRIMINAL CAUSES.

1. When information shall have been obtained of any crime, such as homicide, robbery, &c. having been committed, if no prosecutor shall appear, the judge shall officially draw up a procès-verbal containing the knowledge he has acquired of the said crime, and shall order an inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the same; as, for example, in the case of homicide, he shall cause the body to be examined by one or more surgeons, who shall declare whether the wounds have been mortal or otherwise; they shall set forth in what place and in what situation the body was found, and with what instrument it may appear that the crime has been committed. In the case of robbery, an examination shall be made, and the scrivener shall detail and certify the marks of violence on the house or the furniture, indicating that the said crime has been committed. The same statement of facts shall also be made in all other crimes; a formality which is the basis of judicial proceedings, and without which the criminal cannot be prosecuted. The judge shall, at the same time, order that the information be taken and the witnesses heard.

2. When the party injured shall bring forward a complaint, he shall commence by a petition, containing a correct and brief exposition of the fact, and requesting an examination into the circumstances of the crime, in the manner before mentioned, and also that a summary inquiry may be made into the truth of the facts set forth in his petition. The judge shall take order on the said petition in the following words: "Be it done as is required."

3. The judge shall make the said inquiries in person, unless unavoidably prevented; in which case he may intrust the same to the register. If, however, the crime be established, and the criminal unknown, every inquiry, search, and examination necessary to obtain a knowledge of the said criminal shall be made.

4. When the inquiries have been made, and the criminal be known, if two witnesses appear, or one witness of credit, joined to other circumstances indicative of the aggressor, the judge shall direct the body of the said aggressor to be taken into custody, as also an inventory of his property to be taken, and the sequestration of the same in the hands of the depositary general.

5. If the criminal has not been arrested, by reason of either absence or concealment, the judge shall direct that, as by the report of the alguazil the said criminal has not been arrested, he be cited by public proclamation, three times repeated, in the manner following.

6. The accused shall first be cited to appear and deliver himself up within nine days; in default of which, the judge shall direct the scrivener to certify that the term has expired, and the jailer to affirm that the offender has not appeared. In consequence of the said certificates, which shall be annexed to the documents in the cause, the accused shall be condemned to the penalty of contumacy; and the judge shall direct that he be again cited to appear within the aforesaid term of nine days. On the expiration of this second delay the scrivener and jailer shall certify as before; after which the judge shall issue an order for his arrest, and direct the publication of the same, as also the continuance of the proclamation aforesaid. These last nine days being expired, the scrivener shall again certify thereto, and the jailer shall affirm that the accused has not appeared at the prison. The judge shall then declare him fully convicted of contumacy; and if there be no prosecutor, a procureur fiscal shall be appointed to take the necessary steps in the case; but if there be a prosecutor, the cause shall be committed to him that he may proceed therein as he may think best, and to bring the same before the tribunal, in which provisional judgments are given, and the criminal is cited as if he was present. The proceedings shall then be continued until the definitive sentence either in favor of or against the accused be pronounced.

7. If, however, previous to, or after the sentence, the accused shall present himself at the prison, the cause shall be instituted anew, and the defence of the accused shall be heard with attention; and upon what the prosecutor or the procureur fiscal may set forth in opposition thereto, the previous sentence shall be either confirmed or annulled, according to the documents reproduced on the trial.

8. If the criminal be taken after the order for his arrest has been issued, and the procès-verbal concluded, the judge shall direct the jailer to certify that the accused is in prison, and the said judge shall, in person, commence the examination by demanding his name, age, quality, profession, country, and residence. If he be under twenty-five years of age, he shall be enjoined to choose a guardian; and, upon his refusal to do so, the judge shall appoint some one thereto, by reason that the said examination cannot proceed without the presence and authority of the said guardian.

9. In the said examination the judge shall charge the accused with the crime, pursuant to the testimony given, and shall start such questions as may tend to the disclosure of the circumstances of the same.

10. The examination concluded, the witnesses, both for and against the accused, shall be heard within the shortest delay possible; which, however, if necessary, may be extended to eighty days, as allowed in civil causes in general. During this delay, the accused on one side, and the prosecutor, or the procureur fiscal, (in default of a prosecutor) on the other, shall produce their proof in the manner provided in civil causes; and although these proofs should be private, as also the re-examination of the witnesses, they may communicate to each other the documents in the cause in order to the necessary arrangement of their proceedings.

11. The witnesses being re-examined, and the delay allowed having expired, one of the parties shall require that the testimony be made public. This demand shall be communicated to the other party, by a copy thereof, upon whose answer, or in default thereof, the judge shall direct the publication of the said testimony. The documents shall then be delivered to the prosecutor, or to the procureur fiscal, that he may bring his accusation in form, and allege the sufficiency of the proof.

* The 90,000 maravedis, mentioned both in the regulations and in the present instructions, make 330 piasters, 7 reals, and 2 maravedis, equal to 1654 livres, 7 sols, 9 deniers.

12. The accusation being made, conjointly with the declaration of the sufficiency of the proof, a copy thereof shall be given to the accused, that he may in defence set forth whatever he may think in favor of his case. When the said defence shall have been made, the pleadings shall be considered as concluded, and, consequently, the cause in a state to be determined.

13. If it shall happen that one or both of the parties except against the witnesses produced, they shall proceed in the manner pointed out under the head of civil causes in general, and shall conform precisely to the instructions therein given for similar cases. After the decision on the said exceptions has been made, the determination of the cause shall not be delayed; but the judge shall require the documents, and cite the parties for the definitive sentence.

14. The accused being convicted of the crime, as being fully established on the trial, or by some other proof, in conjunction with his own confession, he may be condemned to the penalty provided by law for the same. The said condemnation shall also take place when two witnesses of lawful age and irreproachable character shall depose that of their certain knowledge the accused has committed the crime; but when there shall appear against the accused but one witness, and other indications or conjectures, he may not be condemned to the penalty provided by law; but some other punishment shall be inflicted as directed by the judge, with due consideration of the circumstances which may appear on the trial; this state of things requires the greatest circumspection, as it must always be remembered that it is better to let a criminal escape than to punish the innocent.

15. After all these precautions, the judge shall pronounce sentence; and although in criminal causes an appeal should not be admitted, yet if the judge shall have doubts, or from some difficulties on the trial he shall think it advisable to submit the same to the examination of a superior, execution shall be suspended, and this second instance shall be conducted as in civil causes.

SECTION IV.

OF APPEALS.

1. When judgment has been given for a sum or an object, the value of which shall exceed ninety thousand maravedis, an appeal shall be brought by the party who may think himself aggrieved, directly to the tribunal to be hereafter appointed by His Majesty; and when the said appeal shall have been lodged, communication thereof shall be made to the adverse party, who shall plead against the merits of the same: that is to say, whether the sentence shall be suspended or executed, notwithstanding appeal. To determine this point, the judge shall demand the documents, and after examining the same shall pronounce either for or against, as he shall think just; and in urgent and particular cases, such as dowry, alimony, or others of a similar nature, in which appeals should not lightly be admitted, he shall order execution. In this class are also comprised criminal causes, unless such circumstances should occur as are cited at the conclusion of the preceding paragraph; and in which case execution should be suspended until the superior judge may have examined the same, and confirmed the sentence pronounced.

2. If the appeal be admitted, the second trial shall be conducted in the manner following: The judge shall direct the delivery of the documents in the cause to the appellant, that he may declare in what consists the grievance of which he complains; by which is meant that he shall set forth in argument the injury he would sustain by the execution of the sentence, which, for one or more reasons, is not in conformity to the provisions of the law in similar cases, and concluding by moving that the same be annulled. A copy of this declaration shall be given to the other party to reply thereto and confute the arguments of his adversary, by setting forth those tending to prove that the sentence has been pronounced in conformity to law. The judge shall then direct that after having transcribed the documents in the cause, at the expense of the appellant, the originals be transmitted to the tribunal, in which the appeal is to be tried. He shall summon the parties to hear the transcripts compared with the originals, as also to appear in person, or by proxy, at the tribunal to which the said appeal shall be carried, within the delay that may be allowed, according to the distance of the same from this province. The said delay shall commence from the day on which the first registered vessel shall sail from this port for the place where the superior tribunal shall be established; the judge having previously ordered the delivery, on board the said vessel, of the original documents aforesaid. He shall inform the appellant, that if, within the delay allowed, he shall not prove that he appeared before the said tribunal with the original documents, he shall fully and indisputably forfeit his appeal, and that the execution of the sentence shall consequently be ordered on the first requisition of the adverse party. If, however, the appellant shall establish the loss of the vessel in which his documents were embarked, or of the one in which he had transmitted the vouchers of his having appeared at the superior tribunal within the time prescribed; or, in short, any other impediment which may discharge him from the aforesaid obligation, the appeal may not be declared to be abandoned; but on the contrary, a further delay shall be granted; and if the originals have been lost, copies thereof shall be delivered to him, that he may prove his appearance and compliance with whatsoever has been required.

3. In the case of a judgment for a sum not exceeding 90,000 maravedis, exclusively of the costs, the appeal shall be made to the cabildo in this city, and the same shall be conducted in the manner following: Within five days, computing from the day of the signification of the sentence, the appellant shall present his petition, which shall be delivered to the register to annex his certificate thereto; on sight of which the cabildo shall appoint two regidores, in quality of commissioners, to decide on the cause of appeal, conjointly with the judge who pronounced the sentence. The said commissioners shall be bound to accept the said appointment, and shall take an oath that they will impartially discharge the duties of the same.

4. The said document with the certificate shall be delivered to the scrivener in the cause, who shall institute and pursue the appeal. The document shall be delivered to the appellant, that he may deduce and set forth his grievance in the manner explained in the second paragraph; which shall be done within fifteen days at furthest; and communication thereof shall be made to the other party, that he may reply thereto within a further term of fifteen days; so that within thirty days from the appointment of commissioners the cause shall be ready for determination. It must be observed that the aforesaid term of thirty days cannot be prolonged, even with the consent of both parties.

5. The pleadings being concluded in the manner prescribed, the scrivener shall, within two days, deliver the documents to the judges, who shall examine the same, and give judgment within ten days, computing from the expiration of the thirty aforesaid, annulling or confirming, augmenting or diminishing, the previous sentence, as they may think just. After the expiration of the aforesaid ten days, judgment may not be pronounced; or, if given, the same shall be void; and the first sentence shall take full effect, and be executed according to the tenor thereof.

6. If a majority of the three judges appointed shall accord in opinion, their sentence shall be valid and conclusive, and an appeal to any other tribunal shall not be admitted; but the judge who pronounced the first sentence shall cause the second to be executed so soon as the documents shall have been delivered to him for that purpose.

SECTION V.

OF PUNISHMENTS.

1. He who shall revile our Savior, or his mother, the most holy Virgin Mary, shall have his tongue cut out, and his property shall be confiscated, applicable, one half to the public treasury, and the other half to the informer. (1)

2. He who, forgetting the respect and loyalty which every subject owes to his King, shall have the insolence to vilify his royal person, or that of the Queen, the hereditary prince, or of the infants, their sons, shall be punished corporally, according to the circumstances of the crime; and the half of his property shall be confiscated to the profit of the public or royal treasury, if he shall have legitimate children; but if he shall have none, he shall forfeit the whole; applicable, two-thirds to the public treasury, and the other third to the accuser. (2)

3. The authors of any insurrection against the King or the State, or those who, under pretext of defending their liberty and rights, shall be concerned or take up arms therein, shall be punished with death, and the confiscation of their property. (3) The same punishments shall also be inflicted on all those who may be convicted of lèse-majesté, or treason. (4)

4. Whosoever shall outrage another by either wounds, cuffs, or blows with a stick, shall be punished as the judge may think suitable to the case and to the rank of both the offender and the offended. But if the abuse consists only in words, and the aggressor be not noble, the judge shall exact the retraction of the same, in the presence of himself and other persons, and, moreover, shall condemn the said aggressor to a fine of 1,200 maravedis, applicable one-half to the public treasury, and the other half to the party offended. If the aggressor be of rank, or enjoys the privileges of nobility, he shall be condemned to a fine of 2,000 maravedis, applicable as aforesaid. The judge, however, may, in lieu of the same, inflict any other punishment which he shall think suitable to the rank of the parties and the nature of the outrage. If no blood has been spilt, nor complaint been made by the offended, or if he shall desist from prosecuting the same, the judge may not interfere therein. (5)

5. He who shall ravish a girl, a married woman, or a widow of reputable character, shall suffer death, and his property shall be confiscated to the use of the person injured; but if the said person be not of reputable character, the judge shall inflict such punishment as he may think suitable to the case. (6)

6. The married woman convicted of adultery, and he who may have committed the same with her, shall be delivered up to the will of the husband; with the reserve, however, that he may not put the one to death without inflicting the same punishment on the other. (7)

7. The man who shall consent that his wife live in concubinage with another, or who shall have induced her to commit the crime of adultery, shall, for the first time, be exposed to public shame, and condemned to a confinement of ten years in some fortress; and for the second time shall be sentenced to one hundred lashes and confinement for life. (8)

8. The same punishment shall also be inflicted on those who carry on the infamous trade of enticing women to prostitution, by procuring them the means of accomplishing the same. (9)

9. He who shall be guilty of fornication with a relation in the fourth degree shall forfeit half his property to the profit of the public treasury, and shall, moreover, be punished corporally, or banished, or in some other manner, according to the rank of the person and the degree of the kindred. If the said crime be committed between parents and their offspring, or with a professed nun, the same shall be punished with death. (10)

10. He who shall commit the detestable crime against nature shall suffer death, and his body shall afterwards be burned, and his property shall be confiscated to the profit of the public and royal treasuries. (11)

11. The woman who shall be publicly the concubine of an ecclesiastic shall be sentenced for the first time to a fine of a mark of silver, and to banishment for one year from the city or from the place where the offence may have been committed. The second time she shall be fined another mark of silver, and banished for two years, and in case of relapse, she shall be punished by one hundred lashes, in addition to the penalties aforesaid. (12)

12. If fornication be committed between bachelors and girls, they shall be admonished by the judge to discontinue every kind of intercourse with each other, under the penalty of banishment of the man, and confinement of the girl, for such time as may be necessary to operate a reformation. If this menace have not the desired effect, the judge shall put the same into execution, unless the rank of the parties requires a different procedure; and in which case the said offence shall be submitted to the consideration of the judges, collectively, to apply the remedy which their prudence and zeal for the repression of such disorders may suggest. They shall punish all other libidinous offences in proportion to their extent, and to the injury occasioned thereby. (13)

13. He who shall break his oath taken, in conformity to law, for the validity of an agreement, shall forfeit the whole of his property to the profit of the public and royal treasuries. (14)

14. False witnesses in civil causes shall be exposed to public shame, and banished for ten years; but in criminal causes, in which false testimony is more important in its consequences, the same shall be punished capitally. If, however, the accused shall not have thereby been sentenced to death, the false witness shall only be exposed to public shame, and be sentenced to perpetual banishment to some presidio. The said punishments may, however, be commuted, when from the rank of the offenders they cannot be condemned to the same. (15)

15. He who shall steal the sacred vessels in a holy place shall suffer death. (16)

16. Assassins and robbers on the highway shall suffer death. (17)

17. The same punishment shall also be inflicted in cases of forcible robbery, which shall be reputed such, when the proprietor or other person shall have made resistance. (18)

18. Robberies of classes other than those comprised in the preceding articles shall be punished corporally, according to the nature of the same, and the rank of the persons. (19)

19. He who shall kill another shall suffer death, unless done in his own defence, or under such circumstances as are explained in statutes 3, 4, 12, tit. 23, book 8, of the Nouvelle Recopilation.

20. He who shall commit wilful murder, or wound another with intent to deprive him of life, although the wounded person may survive, shall suffer death, and shall be dragged to execution at the tail of some animal; (20) and the half of his property shall be confiscated to the profit of the public or royal treasury.

SECTION VI.

OF TESTAMENTS.

1. For the validity of a nuncupative will, it is necessary that the same be received by a notary public, in presence of at least three witnesses, residents of the place; or if there be no notary, there must be present five witnesses residents of the place in which the will shall be made; if, however, it be impossible to procure the last-mentioned number, three may suffice. (1)

2. A testament shall be equally valid when made in the presence of seven witnesses, although they be not residents of the place, and although the same be not made in the presence of a notary. (2)

3. If, after the closing of a will, the testator shall wish to add to, diminish, or change any disposition contained therein, he may do the same effectually by a codicil; observing the same formalities, and in presence of the same number of witnesses required for the validity of the testament itself; but he may not change the name of the heir, unless another will shall be made. (3)

4. If the testator be blind, five witnesses shall be necessary to each of the instruments aforesaid, in order to prevent those deceptions to which those who labor under such a misfortune are exposed. (4)

5. For the validity of a written will, styled in Latin scriptis, the testator, on delivering the same to the notary, (who shall seal it,) shall put an endorsement on the cover, stating that the within is his will; which endorsement shall be signed by himself and the seven witnesses, if they can write; and if not, the others shall sign for them; so that there be eight signatures, including that of the scrivener, who shall also put his signature thereto. (5)

6. Before the opening of a will, after the decease of the testator, it is necessary that the judge who shall have knowledge thereof shall certify thereto, and that the witnesses appear before the said judge, and declare, on oath, that they were present when the testator declared the same to be his last will: they shall acknowledge their signatures, or shall declare (if such be the case) that by their request some one has signed for them.

7. As it often occurs that persons, either unable or unwilling to make a will themselves, empower others for that purpose, they are hereby informed, as follows:

8. That such authority must be given in presence of the same number of persons, and with the same formalities required for testaments. (6.)

9. That the person empowered to make a will for another cannot revoke a will previously made by his constituent, unless the said will shall contain a special clause to that effect. (7)

10. That he may neither appoint an heir, bequeath a third or a fifth to any of the children or descendants of his constituent, disinherit any of them, substitute others in their stead, nor name a guardian for them without an express clause and special authority to that effect; by reason that the constituent should himself nominate his heir, and designate, by his will, whatsoever he may wish to be done. (8)

11. That if the testator has not appointed an heir, nor designated one in the power given to make a will for him, the person so empowered may only direct the payment of the debts of the deceased, after which a fifth part of the proceeds of his property shall be distributed for the repose and relief of his soul: the remainder shall be divided amongst the relations of the deceased, who, according to law, shall inherit; or if there be none, the whole shall be applied to pious uses for the benefit of the soul of the deceased, after previously deducting therefrom what is allowed by law to the wife, as dower, bridal presents, donations proper nuptias, the half of the profits on the joint estate, and whatever may have fallen to her by succession or donation during the marriage. (9)

12. That if the constituent shall have appointed an heir, the person empowered as aforesaid may not dispose of, in legacies pious or profane, more than the fifth part of the property of the testator, his debts being previously paid, unless by a special clause he may be authorized to dispose of a greater part. (10)

13. That the person empowered should proceed to the completion of the will with which he is charged within four months, if he be in the place in which the power was given, or, if not, within six months; unless he be out of the kingdom; in which last case, one year shall be allowed, computing from the day of the decease of the constituent. All that may be done by the person empowered as aforesaid after the expiration of that term shall be void and of non-effect, even if he shall allege that he had no knowledge whatever of his having been so empowered. But all the other stipulations by the testator, in the said power contained, shall be carried into execution, and the remainder of his property shall be delivered to his relations who inherit ab intestat, and who, with the exception of the legitimate children of the descendants or progenitors of the testator, shall give the fifth part of the nett proceeds of the said property for the ease and repose of the soul of the said testator. (11)

14. That the person empowered as aforesaid may not in any manner revoke the will he shall have made by virtue of the authority aforesaid, nor add a codicil, nor any declaration thereto, even if the same should be for pious uses, and notwithstanding he may have reserved the power of revoking, augmenting, diminishing, or changing the disposal he shall have made. (12)

15. To the said testaments, codicils, or powers given to that effect, women, monks, people under the age of fourteen, drunkards, or other disqualified persons, shall not be admitted as witnesses. (13)

16. A testator may bequeath a third or a fifth to any one of his children or other legitimate descendants, by specifying the part of his real or personal property which he designs for that purpose. (14)

17. When a testator shall make a bequest to any of his children or legitimate descendants, he may impose such condition, remainder, or entailment, upon the property bequeathed as he may think proper, in order that his other legitimate descendants, or, in default thereof, his illegitimate descendants, or if there be none of either of those descriptions, his relations may enjoy the benefits resulting therefrom; to the end that the said bequest may never pass to a stranger, unless all the relations in the order aforesaid shall be deceased. (15)

18. The father may also, while living, advance any of his children or legitimate descendants, in the same manner as at his death, or by will; but it is to be understood that he shall make the said advancement but once, and that the same being made during his life cannot be revoked, if settled by agreement and fixed by a public instrument, which should precede the delivery of the object in which consists the advancement; or if having been made with a view to marriage, or for any other similar cause, unless he shall have reserved, by the said instrument, a power to that effect; in which case he may revoke the said advancement. (16)

19. If the father or the mother shall have entered into an agreement not to advance any one of their children, the said agreement shall thereafter be binding; and if they should attempt the said advancement by any public instrument, the same shall be void and of non-effect. If, on the contrary, they shall promise the said advancement,

(1) Stat. 1, tit. 4, book 5, Nouv. Recopilation. (2) Ibid. (3) Stat. 2, same tit. and book. (4) Ibid. (5) Ibid. (6) Stat. 13, tit. 5, book 4. (7) Stat. 8, tit. 4, book 5. (8) Stat. 5, same tit. and book. (9) Stat. 6, same tit. and book. (10) Stat. 11, ibid. (11) Stat. 7, & 10, same tit. and book. (12) Stat. 9, ibid. (13) Stat. 9, ibid. (14) Stat. 2 and 3, tit. 6, book 5, ibid. (15) Stat. 11, same tit. and book. (16) Stat. 1, tit. 6, book 5, ibid.

in consideration of marriage, or for other similar cause, the right to a third or a fifth shall be good at the decease of the parent, although no mention thereof shall have been made in the will. (1)

20. The said advancement being made during life, or at the point of death, shall be calculated upon the real value of the property at the time of the decease, and not at the time of making the same. (2)

21. All deeds of gift, or legacies, by the father or mother to their children or descendants, during life, or bequeathed by will, shall be reputed on account of the third or the fifth, although the same may not have been expressed. In consequence thereof, they may not bequeath a third or a fifth to any of the other children or descendants, which shall exceed the value of the said legacies or gifts to the former. (3)

22. When any one shall die intestate, and without having empowered another to make a will for him, in the manner hereinbefore explained, if there be no legitimate children, or progenitors who may inherit, the relations by blood and kindred of the fourth degree shall inherit the whole of the property; observing that the nearest relations shall inherit of right, and to the exclusion of those who may be further removed, unless the nearest relations shall be brothers of the deceased; in which case, the children of the other brothers who shall have died previous to the decease of the person intestate, shall take a portion of the whole; that is to say, that if one brother, and three or four children of another brother, be living, the said children shall be entitled to an equal proportion of one-half of the property, and the brother, uncle of the said children, shall inherit the other half, by reason that the nephews succeed by representation of their father, and not in their own right. This rule shall be followed in the division of estates when there may be a greater or less number of heirs; the foregoing being intended for an example. (4)

23. If the deceased shall have neither progenitors nor descendants capable of inheriting, in the order explained in the preceding article, the King shall be his heir, and the property shall be vested in the treasury or royal chamber. (5)

24. Those who have not legitimate descendants may will in favor of their illegitimate children, although they may have progenitors. It must be understood that by illegitimate children are meant those born of a free girl, to whose marriage with the father of the said children no legal impediment existed. Those children shall succeed in their own right, to their mother, and shall inherit the whole of her property, whether she may have died intestate, or otherwise, and shall have a preference over the progenitors, in case she shall have no legitimate children, who would otherwise inherit, to the exclusion of the illegitimate children. (6)

25. Illegitimate children of every description shall incontestably succeed to their mother, if she have no legitimate children or descendants, even to the exclusion of her father or other progenitors. (7)

26. The father and mother having legitimate children or descendants, may not give, by way of maintenance, to their illegitimate children, more than the fifth part of their property; of which proportion they may also dispose for the benefit of their souls, or by a legacy to a stranger; excepting from the foregoing, the children of ecclesiastics, or monks, who cannot in any manner inherit from their parents or kindred, nor pretend to any thing possessed by them during their lives. (8)

27. A son or daughter, while under the authority of the father, being of competent age, that is to say, the son being fourteen, and the daughter being twelve, may will, in the same manner as if they were emancipated from their parent, and may dispose of the third part of their property acquired by succession, donation, or in another manner, unless derived from the father, who shall inherit the remaining two-thirds, in the same manner as the mother or other progenitor. (9)

TABLE OF FEES, DEMANDABLE BY JUDGES, LAWYERS, SCRIVENERS, ATTORNEYS, AND THE OTHER OFFICERS OF JUSTICE.

JUDGES.—For a signature containing the baptismal and family name of the judge, four reals in piasters fortes of America, as also for the other fees hereafter detailed. They shall put the aforesaid signature to judgments, decrees, warrants, titles, and despatches which they may deliver for another tribunal. They shall exact but two reals in the same money for a signature containing their family name only, and the same for their cipher.

For a sitting of two hours and a half, in cases of inventories, seizures, assessments, public sales, adjudications of real or personal property, procès-verbaux, declarations, examinations, and other acts of justice of whatsoever nature, two ducats, equal to twenty-two reals in milled piasters. For affixing the seals, in cases of death, one ducat. If a longer time be necessary for the security of the property, the fee may be augmented in proportion to the time that shall be employed. For the opening of a will, and the examination of the seven witnesses, which should precede the opening of the will, forty-eight reals; viz. forty-four for two sittings, and the other four for the signatures to the two instruments. They shall receive four ducats per diem while employed in the country, to continue until their return to their own houses; they shall be decently entertained, and shall be provided with a horse and other things necessary.

Assessors shall have also two ducats for each sitting in the city, and four for the country, either with or without commission. They shall charge one real per leaf for revising documents, according to the bulk of the same, to the circumstances of the case, and to what may be only a continuation of the usual business.

THE ALCAID MAYOR PROVINCIAL, AND THE OFFICERS OF THE SAINT HERMANDAD shall receive the same fees as the other royal judges, for their signatures and their sittings.

REGIDORS.—In causes of little importance, which may be brought before the cabildo by appeal, two regidors shall be appointed as commissioners, conjointly with the judge who shall have pronounced the previous sentence. In all such cases they shall receive the same fees as the judge for their signatures and sittings.

THE ALGUAZIL MAYOR.—In common executions against debtors, they shall require payment, and if the same be not complied with within seventy-two hours from the moment of the summons, the said debtors shall pay, besides the fees to the judge and the other officers of justice, the tenth to the alguazil mayor, which is five milled piasters for the first hundred piasters, and two and a half piasters for every other hundred piasters; so that if the execution be issued for three hundred piasters, he shall take ten for the tenth. He may not, however, exact the same until the creditor be satisfied in the sum for which the execution shall be given.

THE DEPOSITARY GENERAL shall take three per cent. on all sums in specie, which may come into his possession by way of deposite, and the same for plate, jewels, or other personal property which may be deposited with him.

For real property, as houses, plantations, and other property yielding revenue, he shall take five per cent. upon the said revenue, which shall be his compensation for the management of said property, for receiving the proceeds thereof, and for rendering an account of the same to the tribunal by whom he is appointed, whenever he shall be required thereto. He shall also take five per cent. upon the proceeds of the labor of all slaves in his care, who may not be employed upon the estate.

Whenever bonds or notes shall be deposited with him, he shall take five per cent. upon the sums which he may recover on account of the same.

LAWYERS.—The fees of lawyers shall be settled by another lawyer whom the judge shall appoint; and for every sitting their compensation shall be the same as that of the judges and assessors. But when they may be employed in examining documents in order to assist at a court, they shall be paid separately.

SCRIVENERS shall have fifteen reals for a sitting in the city, and thirty per diem when employed in the country, to be continued until their return to their own houses, and two reals for each leaf of writing, and shall be furnished with a horse, and decently entertained.

For the opening of a will, the examination of the seven witnesses, which should precede the same, and legacies to the church, fifty-two reals.

For a copy of a decree or of a provision, one real. For an act, two reals. For a notification, citation, or participation, two reals. For a declaration in his own house, six reals; or, if elsewhere, eight reals; and two reals for each leaf of writing either in his own house or elsewhere. For a despatch, two reals per leaf, and eight for the commencement and conclusion of the same. For each leaf of an exemplification of an act, one real and three quartilles, and one real for his signature. For duplicates, or copies of documents drawn from his records, two reals per leaf.

For a bill of sale of slaves, twelve reals. For a sale of personal property, which usually contains two leaves, two piasters; and if the same shall contain more on account of the conditions which the parties may wish to be inserted, he may augment in proportion. For a simple bond, eight reals; for a bond with mortgage, twelve reals; and if there be several mortgages comprised in the said bond, he shall be paid according to the labor and trouble he may have had in drawing up the same. For a receipt, eight reals. For an agreement, according to the number of leaves the same may contain; and if an examination of documents be necessary, the same should be taken into consideration, and the charge should be at least doubled.

For a will containing three or four sheets, four piasters, and augmented in proportion to the number of sheets.

THE RECORDER OF MORTGAGES.—For a certificate of a house, plantation, or other real property, eight reals. For a certificate of a slave, from one to the number of eighteen, four reals; and from that number to one hundred, twelve reals for each certificate. For a certificate of a mortgage on a vessel, four reals. For recording in the book of mortgages, those given for the security of payments, either for personal property, slaves, or vessels, four reals; and if the same be of an unusual length, eight reals; but when only a short note to designate the page in which the mortgage is recorded be required, no charge shall be made.

ATTORNEYS.—For an introductory demand, five reals. For assisting in the city, at an inventory, sale, adjudication, or seizure, twelve reals; for the same in the country, if employed a whole day, three piasters. If, however, the case requires much writing, they shall be paid according to the time that the lawyer may have been employed in drawing up the said case.

THE CONTADOR JUDICIAIRE.—For every five hours employed in preparing an account for settlement, four ducats, making forty-four reals, observing that five hours shall be accounted a day; and out of the aforesaid sum he shall pay four reals to the scrivener for each sheet of twenty-five lines to a page.

THE ASSESSOR OF COSTS shall be paid one quartille for each sheet of the documents contained in the cause, the costs of which he shall assess. Four quartilles make a real.

APPRAISERS OF PERSONAL PROPERTY, SLAVES, AND OTHER EFFECTS.—To the exchange broker, for the valuation of furniture, houses, slaves, merchandise, &c., eleven reals, notwithstanding the appraisement may require two hours and a half.

ALARIFS, MASTER CARPENTERS, AND ASSAYERS OF SILVER.—Alarifs, master carpenters, masons, and joiners, shall have a ducat for every thousand piasters of the amount of the appraisement; and if the same shall exceed four, six, or eight thousand, they shall not demand more than four ducats: but if they be employed in the country, and the appraisement shall not amount to one thousand piasters, they shall have two ducats per diem during the time they may be employed, on account of the distance. If, however, one day only shall be necessary, although the appraisement shall amount to three or four thousand piasters, they shall be paid as if the same had been made in the city; but they shall be furnished with a horse, and shall be decently entertained. The assayer of silver shall have eleven reals for each appraisement, although the articles may be valuable, by reason that little time is required for that purpose.

THE APPRAISERS OF LAND shall have two ducats per diem, and the same when they shall value buildings of little consequence in the country, woodland, and fields in grain.

SURVEYORS shall have three ducats per diem.

THE ALGUAZILS shall have four reals for a summons to appear, and for a demand of payment. They shall also receive the same sum for obtaining documents of every description. They shall have eight reals for arresting and conducting to prison. The sergeant, in this case, shall have the same.

JAIL FEES.—The alguazil mayor shall have twelve reals for every free person imprisoned, and eight reals for a slave.

DON ALEXANDER O'REILLY.

Don Alexander O'Reilly, Commander of Benfayan, of the order of Alcantara, Inspector General of Infantry, appointed, by special commission, Governor and Captain-General of this province of Louisiana.

Divers complaints and petitions which have been addressed to us by the inhabitants of Opelousas, Attakapas, Natchitoches, and other places of this province, joined to the knowledge we have acquired of the local concerns, culture, and means of the inhabitants, by the visit which we have lately made to the Côte des Allemands, Côte des Acadiens, Iberville, and La Pointe Coupée, with the examination we have made of the reports of the inhabitants assembled, by our order, in each district, having convinced us that the tranquillity of the said inhabitants, and the progress of culture required a new regulation, which should fix the extent of the grants of lands which shall hereafter be made, as well as the enclosures, cleared lands, roads and bridges, which the inhabitants are bound to keep in repair, and to point out the damage by cattle, for which the proprietors shall be responsible. For these causes, and having nothing in view but the public good, and the happiness of every inhabitant, after having advised with persons well informed in these matters, we have regulated all those objects in the following articles:

1. There shall be granted to each newly-arrived family, who may wish to establish themselves on the borders of the river, six or eight arpents in front, (according to the means of the cultivator,) by forty arpents in depth; in order that they may have the benefit of the cypress wood, which is as necessary as useful to the inhabitants.

2. The grantees established on the borders of the river shall be held bound to make, within the three first years of possession, mounds sufficient for the preservation of the land, and the ditches necessary to carry off the water. They shall, besides, keep the roads in good repair, of the width of at least forty feet between the inner ditch which runs along the mound, and the barrier, with bridges of twelve feet over the ditches which may cross the roads. The said grantees shall be held bound, within the said term of three years' possession, to clear the whole front of their land to the depth of two arpents; and, in default of fulfilling those conditions, their lands shall revert to the King's domain, to be granted anew; and the judge of each place shall be responsible to the governor for the superintendance of this object.

3. The said grants can neither be sold nor alienated by the proprietors, until after three years of possession, and until the above-mentioned conditions shall have been entirely fulfilled. To guard against every evasion in this respect, the sales of the said lands cannot be made without a written permission from the governor general, who will not grant it until, on strict inquiry, it shall be found that the conditions above explained have been duly executed.

4. The points formed by the lands on the Mississippi river, leaving in some places but little depth, there may be granted, in these cases, twelve arpents of front; and, on a supposition that these points should not be applied for by any inhabitant, they shall be distributed to the settlers nearest thereto, in order that the communication of the roads may not be interrupted.

5. If a tract belonging to minors should remain uncleared, and the mounds and roads should not be kept in repair, the judge of the quarter shall inquire into the cause thereof. If attributable to the guardian, he shall oblige him to conform promptly to this regulation; but if arising from want of means in the minors, the judge, after having, by a verbal process, obtained proof thereof, shall report the same to the governor general, to the end that the said land may be sold for the benefit of the minors, (a special favor, granted to minors only;) but if no purchaser shall, within six months, be found, the said land shall be conceded gratis.

6. Every inhabitant shall be held bound to enclose, within three years, the whole front of his land which shall be cleared; and for the remainder of his enclosure he will agree with his neighbors, in proportion to his cleared land and his means.

7. Cattle shall be permitted to go at large, from the eleventh of November, to the fifteenth of March of the year following; and at all other times the proprietor shall be responsible for the damage that his cattle may have done to his neighbors. He who may have suffered the damage shall complain to the judge of the district, who, after having satisfied himself of the truth thereof, shall name experienced men to estimate the value of the same, and shall then order remuneration without delay.

8. No grant in the Opelousas, Attakapas, and Natchitoches shall exceed one league in front by one league in depth; but when the land granted shall not have that depth, a league and a half in front by half a league in depth may be granted.

9. To obtain in the Opelousas, Attakapas, and Natchitoches, a grant of forty-two arpents in front by forty-two arpents in depth, the applicant must make it appear that he is possessor of one hundred head of tame cattle, some horses and sheep, and two slaves to look after them; a proportion which shall always be observed for the grants to be made in the said places, but none shall ever be made of greater extent than that declared in the preceding article.

10. All cattle shall be branded by the proprietors; and those who shall not have branded them at the age of eighteen months cannot thereafter claim a property therein.

11. Nothing being more injurious to the inhabitants than strayed cattle, without the destruction of which tame cattle cannot increase, and the inhabitants will continue to labor under those evils of which they have often complained to us; and considering that the province is at present infested with strayed cattle, we allow to the proprietors until the first day of July, of the next year, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-one, and no longer, to collect and kill, to their use, the said strayed cattle; after which time they shall be considered wild, and may be killed by any person whomsoever, and no one shall oppose himself thereto, or lay claim to a property therein.

12. All grants shall be made in the name of the King, by the governor general of the province, who will, at the same time appoint a surveyor to fix the bounds thereof, both in front and depth, in presence of the judge ordinary of the district, and of two adjoining settlers, who shall be present at the survey. The above-mentioned four persons shall sign the verbal process which shall be made thereof, and the surveyor shall make three copies of the same; one of which shall be deposited in the office of the scrivener of the Government and cabildo, another shall be delivered to the governor general, and the third to the proprietor, to be annexed to the titles of his grant.

In pursuance of the powers which our lord the King (whom God preserve) has been pleased to confide to us, by his patent issued at Aranjuez, the 16th April, 1769, to establish in the military, the police, and in the administration of justice, and his finances, such regulation as should be conducive to his service and the happiness of his subjects in this colony, with the reserve of His Majesty's good pleasure, we order and command the governor, judges, cabildo, and all the inhabitants of this province, to conform punctually to all that is required by this regulation.

Given at New Orleans, the 18th February, 1770.

Regulation concerning the general police, the repair of bridges, roads, and mounds, and the police of slaves; for the use of the commanders of posts and of coasts, and the syndics of the province of Louisiana.

The astonishing success which has attended certain designing, restless, and enthusiastic persons, and who certainly have nothing to lose, in disseminating injurious reports tending to produce an entire distrust between the Government and the inhabitants, which would infallibly plunge them into all those atrocities which have desolated the French colonies, has induced us to digest a regulation capable of re-establishing order, police, and tranquillity throughout the province.

In pursuance thereof, the Government will establish within every three leagues, at furthest, a syndic chosen from amongst the most industrious and respectable inhabitants of the district, who shall be changed in the month of January of each year, unless he may consent to be continued for the succeeding year, and whose functions shall be subordinate to the commander of the post or of the coast, to whom he shall render a weekly account of the occurrences in his district.

FUNCTIONS OF THE SYNDICS.

Every person who shall have acquired knowledge of an unlawful attempt, either by being an eye-witness thereof, or from hearsay, shall be bound to give information thereof to the syndic of his district, and to require him to take the necessary order thereon, pointing out to him the offender, the place, and those persons who may have knowledge of the same, under a penalty of six piasters, or even being punished to the extent of the law if his silence shall proceed from malice or connivance. Seditious discourses, or those tending to alarm the public mind, shall also be reported to the syndic of the district in which they may be held, as attempts against the public tranquillity, under the penalty of one hundred piasters; and the syndic who shall not give an account of the same to the commandant or to the Government, shall incur the same penalty. Information being given, the syndic shall proceed to a verbal inquiry, accompanied by two respectable inhabitants, who shall assist him as witnesses. In the present case, the syndic shall have power to oblige the two persons who may be nearest at hand, to assist him as witnesses, under a penalty of four piasters, and being considered unfriendly to good order.

As the necessity of an inquiry into the offence may be urgent, and the syndic may be absent, or his residence at too great a distance, every individual shall in this case have a right to summon his two nearest neighbors to accompany him to the place where the offence may have been committed; and, in case of refusal, they shall incur the penalty aforesaid. The offender, being convicted of the offence, shall be conducted to and accused before the syndic, who shall secure him, and give information thereof or send him to the commandant.

Syndics are authorized to search plantations, houses, negro huts, &c. accompanied by two witnesses, when the case shall require it, and when the informer shall bind himself to find therein the evidences of the truth of his information, and not otherwise; and if the informer shall fail in so doing, he alone shall be responsible to the proprietor.

The syndics shall take cognizance, provisionally and verbally, of all crimes and disorders committed within their districts, notwithstanding the offender shall belong to another district.

The general police, and the security of the district, the repair of bridges, roads, and mounds, the general inspection of coasters, passengers, the provisions, maintenance, subordination, and police of the negro camps, the security of horses, cattle, &c. shall be within the province of the syndics, who shall conform strictly to the articles herein contained in relation to those objects.

Whenever the Government shall think it expedient to convoke the syndics to a general meeting at the capital, or to a private meeting at the residence of the commandant of the post, they shall be accompanied by two persons as evidences of the satisfaction of their district, upon which condition only they shall be entitled to take part in the deliberations; but the evidences shall take no part therein, their duties being to observe that their syndic does not lose sight of the interest of the district. The syndics may not assemble the inhabitants of their district without the permission of the commandant of the post, who shall not make opposition thereto without strong motives, which he shall communicate to the Government. All meetings consisting of more than eight inhabitants, for the purpose of treating of public affairs, is strictly prohibited; and the syndic is enjoined to give information thereof to the Government, under the penalty of being considered a party thereto.

In case a syndic shall incur any one of the penalties provided by this regulation, three individuals shall join him for the purpose of convicting and denouncing him to the commandant of the post, who shall impose the penalty provided, and shall communicate the same to the Government.

A syndic who, through negligence, or from motives of humanity, shall dissemble a fault, or conceal it from the knowledge of the commandant, or shall join with him for that purpose, shall incur the penalty provided for the offender, for having abused the public confidence; and the Government reserves the care of punishing the commandant with still greater severity if he shall be a party thereto.

The commandants of posts, or of the coasts, shall deliver to the Government, the first day of December in each year, a list of the inhabitants in their opinion the most suitable to be elected syndics for the following year; observing that their respective distances from each other must not exceed three leagues, and on which account they shall mention the situation of their plantations; and observing, likewise, that there be some on both sides of the river, as also in the place of residence of the said commandant, or adjacent thereto.

The first day of January, the new syndics, elected by the Government, shall enter upon the duties of their office, previously receiving, in presence of the commandant, this regulation, and the other instructions relative to their employment, from the hands of the syndic of the preceding year.

The persons of the syndics shall be respected by the public; and whosoever shall dare to insult them, menace them, or disobey their orders, shall forfeit forty piasters for the two first-mentioned offences, and one hundred for the third; applicable one-half to the royal treasury, and the other half to defray the expenses of the prison and courts of the district.

Assaults shall be punished to the extent of the laws, when committed on those who are charged with the execution of them.

GENERAL POLICE.

All coasters and travellers shall exhibit their passports, and reply to the questions which may be put to them by the syndic of the district, who shall require the same, and shall make himself known, by declaring his family name.

The passport shall specify the number of horses conducted by the traveller, and all articles for sale on board the coaster, as also the number of the crew, who shall be persons known, and for whose conduct the master shall be responsible. Those who shall be found with an unusual number of horses, cattle, or quantity of merchandise, shall be arrested by the syndic of the district, and sent to the commandant of the post or of the coast, who shall give information thereof to Government.

A passenger who may be necessitated to change horses, to purchase others, or cattle, merchandise, &c. should have the same endorsed on his passport by the syndic of the district in which the said exchange or purchases may have been made.

A coaster who shall during his voyage leave any of his crew on shore, or take others on board, must have an endorsement to that effect made on his passport. Every person found without a passport shall be arrested by the syndic, examined, and delivered to the commandant of the post.

Every traveller, coaster, &c. previous to circulating any news of importance, shall make a relation thereof to the syndic of the district, who shall require his name, and shall permit him to divulge the same, or shall forbid him if the circulation thereof would be injurious to the public tranquillity or the good of the State, and shall render an account thereof to Government, previously holding the said traveller or coaster responsible for the result.

Pocket pistols, poignards, large knives, sword canes, and other similar weapons, are forbidden by law, under penalty of the presidio; and the syndics shall arrest those who may wear them.

The syndics shall be acquainted with the brand or marks on the animals of their district, and shall cause those to be taken up which shall be found without the mark of the proprietor, or with another strange mark; in this last case they shall inform the commandant thereof, who shall communicate the same to the other syndics, to the end that the proprietor may be acquainted therewith.

Any person convicted of having detained, stolen, or killed any kind of tame animal which shall not belong to him, without having given information thereof to the syndic of his district, shall be sentenced to return the same, if alive, and to a fine equal to one-half the value thereof; one-third of which shall go to the use of the proprietor, another third to the royal treasury, and the remaining third to defray the expenses of the courts and prison of the district; or, if the animal be dead, he shall pay four times the value thereof, which shall be applied as aforesaid.

It is absolutely forbidden, under the same penalty, to shoot at any tame animals without permission of the syndic, who shall not grant the same without the knowledge of the commandant, and then only when the cattle are known to be strayed and ravaging the grain fields.

The turning out of cattle is forbidden from the 15th of March, to the 15th of November; if, however, the inhabitants of a district shall unanimously agree to prolong the time, the syndic may, with the knowledge of the commandant, depart from this article; in all other cases, it shall be optional with the inhabitant either to kill the tame animal found in his grain fields, in presence of two witnesses, or to be indemnified for the damages, by the award of two or three capable persons, one of whom shall be named by himself, another by the proprietor of the animal, and the third by the syndic, in case the two first shall be divided in opinion; observing that the award shall be made upon the supposed value of the grain when arrived at maturity, and that the animal shall be returned to the proprietor thereof.

Every proprietor having an exclusive right to the enjoyment of his property, none other shall fish, hunt, or go within his enclosures, without his permission, under the penalty of restitution of game, fish, &c. and of a fine of four piasters, applicable one-half to the expenses of the courts and prison of the post, and the other half to the royal treasury, to be imposed by the syndic of the place; and, in case of repetition, the same shall be doubled, trebled, &c.

The syndic shall be entitled to command the patrols of his district when the case shall require it, and with the knowledge of the commandant; no one shall refuse to serve in his turn under a penalty of six piasters, applicable one-half to the person who shall have taken his place, and the other half to the royal treasury; and whosoever shall refuse to conduct a prisoner from one plantation to another on his way to the residence of the commandant of the post, shall incur the same penalty, which shall be disposed of as aforesaid.

For the more speedy execution of justice, the syndics shall take cognizance, in the first instance, of all matters in dispute the amount of which shall not exceed ten piasters; all others shall be brought before the commandant of the post, who may not give judgment for more than fifty piasters, and shall refer those exceeding that amount to the Government, by reason that the law requires that they shall not be decided without the advice of an assessor or a lawyer.

At every post not provided with a prison the commandant shall call a meeting of the syndics, at which he shall preside, for the purpose of selecting a plan for the building; which being adopted by a majority of the meeting, shall be published and posted up during nine days; after which, they shall proceed to the erection of a prison proportionate to the population of the place, the expenses of which shall be defrayed by the inhabitants, according to their means.

The prison of the post shall always be situated near the residence of the commandant, that he may provide for the maintenance thereof, as also that of the prisoners insolvent; to which objects a part of the fines imposed on the infringers of this regulation is appropriated. The commandants shall, in the months of July and January, account to the Government for the fines they have received, and shall at the said times pay into the royal treasury the amounts applicable thereto.

As the dissemination of false reports on the coasts is one of the most efficacious means resorted to by the disturbers of the public tranquillity to obtain proselytes, it would be proper that the syndics should subscribe for the Moniteur, from which they would obtain correct information upon the events of the day, and should communicate the same to the inhabitants of their district.

It would not be less useful, that, whenever any doubt shall arise in the public mind upon the propriety of any proceeding of the Government, the syndics should give information thereof to the commandant of the post, who would communicate the same to the Government of the province, whose reply would satisfy all those possessed of integrity and zeal for the public welfare.

BRIDGES, ROADS, AND MOUNDS.

The keeping in repair of bridges, roads, and mounds being indispensable for the facility of transportation, for the convenience of the inhabitants and travellers, and for the preservation of the fruits of the earth, the syndics shall direct their whole attention to that object with an impartiality and firmness proof against all reproach and worldly considerations.

Now, inasmuch as experience has demonstrated that the greater part, fearful of reproach and of making themselves enemies, have hitherto neglected an object so essential, and have confined themselves at most to communicating to the Government the negligences of certain inhabitants, every syndic who shall be convicted of having neglected to proceed against those inhabitants who shall refuse immediately to repair their bridges, roads, and mounds, in conformity to the present regulation, shall himself be condemned to make the repairs aforesaid, and shall be responsible for the accidents which may result from his negligence.

The syndics, accompanied by the commandant of the posts and their witness, shall, in the month of July, make a strict examination of all the mounds and roads in their district; shall direct the repairs which each inhabitant is bound to make, of which they, as well as the commandant, shall keep an account; and shall notify the interested that those who shall not have complied with their directions previous to their second visit in December, (in which they shall also be accompanied by the commandant and the same witnesses) shall be obliged to pay for the labor and food of the negroes of the district who shall be employed for that purpose, by order of and under the inspection of the syndic, besides the fine of one hundred piasters hereinbefore mentioned. The syndics shall require from the inhabitants that their negroes be employed on Sundays for the purpose above mentioned, and they may not refuse in consideration that the price of their labor shall be faithfully paid to the negroes. So soon as a gap shall be perceived, the syndic of the district shall issue orders to all the inhabitants of his district to furnish the number of negroes which he may think necessary, in proportion to their means, without waiting for the orders of the commandant or of the governor. Whosoever shall refuse shall be responsible for the ravages occasioned by the waters, which might have been stopped if immediate assistance had been given, and shall besides incur the before-mentioned fine of one hundred piasters for disobedience. If the negroes of the district are insufficient, the syndic shall give immediate information thereof to the governor or the commandant, who shall issue orders to the inhabitants who might be incommoded by the waters to furnish negroes, in proportion to their means.

The labor and food of the negroes employed in stopping a gap shall be paid by the proprietor of the land, at the rate of four escalins* per day, and one escalin for food.

Holes between the mounds and the river shall be carefully stopped at low water, and filled up by a talus. The drains shall be as far removed as the nature of the ground will permit from the foot of the mound, which they would totally weaken, and would expose to be undermined by the quantity of craw-fish which frequent them.

All horses, mules, cows, steers, and hogs, found on the mounds without a conductor, shall be taken up by the proprietor of the mound, and delivered to the syndic, who shall not return the same to the owner, without exacting a fine equal to one-half the value thereof, applicable one-third to the proprietor of the mound, another third to the royal treasury, and the remainder to the expenses of the courts and prison of the district. The appraisement shall be made by two or three capable persons, one of whom shall be appointed by the owner of the animal, another by the proprietor of the mound, and, if those two be divided in opinion, a third shall be appointed by the syndic.

POLICE OF SLAVES.

The disastrous events proceeding from the present war should, with redoubled force, impress upon the minds of the inhabitants the necessity of attention to their slaves, and of keeping them in that state of content and subordination which would alienate them from the wish of acquiring a freedom which has cost so much blood to those of St. Domingo. To prevent, on the one hand, that excessive indulgence with which the slaves of some plantations are treated, introducing insubordination and insolence, and thereby exhibiting a bad example to the others; and, on the other, to provide against the hardships and inhumanity of some masters of little reflection, who, infringing the first law, that of nature, expose their slaves to the influence of despair; the commandants and syndics are required to direct their whole attention to the internal police of the plantations, and to cause the following directions to be strictly observed, under the penalty of personal responsibility to the Government, and of incurring the reproaches of both their own consciences and of the public, if, by an ill-placed complaisance or neglect, their country should hereafter be exposed to the disasters which have ruined the French colonies.

Every slave shall punctually receive the barrel of corn allowed by the usage of the colony, and which quantity is voluntarily augmented by the greater part of their masters.

The syndics shall take measures to induce the planters of their district to allow their negroes a portion of their waste lands, by which they will not only add to their comforts, but increase the productions of the province, and that time will be usefully employed which would otherwise be devoted to libertinism.

Every slave shall be allowed half an hour for breakfast, and two hours for dinner; their labor shall commence at break of day, and shall cease at the approach of night. Sundays shall be the privilege of the slaves, but their masters may require their labor at harvest, &c., on paying them four escalins per diem.

The slaves who have not a portion of waste lands shall receive punctually from their master a shirt and trowsers of linen for the summer, and a great-coat and trowsers of wool for the winter.

No person shall cause to be given, at once, more than thirty lashes to his slave, under the penalty of fifty piasters; but the same may be repeated, if necessary, with an interval of one day.

It is permitted to shoot at an armed runaway negro who shall refuse to stop when required, or who cannot otherwise be taken, even if he be not armed; at a negro who shall dare to defend himself against his master or overseer; and, lastly, at those who shall secretly enter a plantation with intent to steal.

Whosoever shall kill a slave, unless in one of the cases before mentioned, shall be punished to the extent of the law; and if he shall only wound him, he shall be punished according to the circumstances of the case, and shall, besides, allow the slave to seek another master; no one being permitted to dispose of the life of a man at his pleasure: as, for example, when a slave, threatened with thirty lashes, shall fly before his master, he is not yet guilty of any crime, and very often has no other intention than to gain time to soften his master, or to implore the pity of some intercessor. With what shadow of justice could the law permit a master, transported with passion, to kill or wound this unfortunate, solely for endeavoring to escape a rigorous chastisement? Intrigues, plots of escape, &c., arising in general from the negroes of one plantation frequenting those of another, the inhabitants are forbidden, under the penalty of ten piasters, to allow any concourse or resort of negroes to their plantations for the purpose of dancing, &c.; and the amusements of their own slaves, which shall be allowed only on Sundays, shall terminate always before night.

A slave shall not pass the bounds of his master's land, without his permission in writing, under the penalty of twenty lashes.

To prevent those disputes and animosities occasioned by the slaves of one planter being chastised by another, no person shall be allowed to punish a negro not belonging to him, without the consent of his master, or of the syndic of the district, under the penalty of thirty piasters.

Every slave arrested without a permission or passport shall be sent to the syndic, who shall order that he be punished and returned to his master. If the residence of the syndic be too remote, the person who may have arrested the slave shall give information thereof, in writing, to the syndic, requesting permission to punish him, and shall conform to the tenor of his reply; after which the slave shall be returned to his master.

A slave who shall ride the horse of his master, or of any other person, without permission, shall be punished with thirty lashes during two days; that is to say, with an interval of one day.

Slaves are not permitted to be proprietors of horses, under penalty of the confiscation thereof, one half to the use of the treasury, and the other half to defray the expenses of the courts and prison; and the master who shall tolerate the same shall incur a fine of four piasters for each horse.

Fire-arms are prohibited to slaves, as also powder, ball, and lead, under the penalty of thirty lashes during three days, and confiscation thereof, one half to the use of the royal treasury, and the other half to defray the expenses of the courts and prison.

An inhabitant may not have more than two hunters; and he shall oblige them to deliver up their arms and ammunition on their return from the chase, under the penalty of fifty piasters if his hunter shall be arrested without a passport, or if his arms and ammunition be found in the camp.

Slaves may not sell any thing without the permission of their master, not even the productions of the waste lands allowed them, under pain of twenty-five lashes, and a fine of double the value of the thing sold; and the white person who shall have purchased the same shall incur the forfeiture thereof, and shall be brought before the syndic.

No white person, negro, or free mulatto, shall be allowed entrance into a camp without the permission of the master, nor to sell any thing to the slaves on the borders of the river, under pain of being arrested by the proprietor of the plantation, and transported with all his merchandise to the residence of the syndic, who shall examine his passport and merchandise, and shall sentence him to a fine of fifteen piasters; and if he have not money sufficient to discharge the same, he shall be confined fifteen days in the prison of the post, or be at the disposal of the commandant.

Rum, fire-arms, and ammunition shall be seized when in possession of coasters, by the syndic, and delivered to the commandant, who shall sell the same at public auction for the use of the royal treasury, and to defray the expenses of the courts and the prison.

The syndic shall, from time to time, visit the negro camps in his district, both by night and by day, and shall punish with thirty lashes the slaves belonging to other plantations, who shall be found therein without the permission of both masters. White persons, free negroes and mulattoes shall be sent to the commandant of the post, who shall punish them by fifteen days' imprisonment.

When an inhabitant shall be informed that there are runaway negroes in a certain place, he shall give notice thereof to the syndic, who shall have authority to assemble as many as fifteen armed inhabitants, without the permission of the commandant, for the purpose of arresting them; but he shall immediately after give notice thereof to the commandant. Patrols, or other military proceedings, may not be had without the permission of the syndic, under the penalty of twenty piasters.

A slave may not complain to the Government, without having previously made his complaint to the syndic of the district and to the commandant, under pain of thirty lashes upon the public square; but the said persons shall be obliged to receive his complaint, and to grant him strict justice.

Whosoever shall shoot at a slave shall be obliged to give notice thereof to the syndic within four hours, under the penalty of fifty piasters, applicable one half to the royal treasury, and the other half to defray the expenses of the prison and of the post; the syndic shall advise the commandant of the circumstances within twenty-four hours, and the last-mentioned shall give information thereof to the Government within a like term, under the penalty of fifty piasters, to be incurred by the syndic or commandant, if either shall fail therein.

As there are plantations the masters of which are mostly absent, the syndic shall attend thereto, and shall charge some inhabitant with the care of the slaves, and to make the necessary visits both by night and by day; such cases excepted, no person shall have authority to visit plantations, granaries, negro camps, dwelling-houses, or huts of whites, negroes, mulattoes, or mestives, without permission in writing from the syndic of the district; by reason that all property is sacred, and every house an asylum, which the authority of the law can only enter for the public advantage.

Free people of color, enjoying by law the same advantages with the other members of the nation with which they are incorporated, may not be molested in the possession of their property, injured, or ill-treated under the penalties provided by law for the safety and security of the property of white persons.

The syndics and commandants of posts shall be watchful of their conduct, and shall require that deference and attention which is due from them to the members of that society whom they formerly served, and which has admitted them to its bosom. The syndics shall not tolerate any want of attention to the whites, but shall deliver them over to the commandant of the post, who shall punish them with imprisonment, but never by the lash, or by any other corporal punishment.

The syndics shall also observe that all free people of color labor either in the field, or at some trade within their district, and shall send the indolent and vagabonds to the commandant of the post, who shall fix them at the capital, where they shall be employed upon the king's buildings, and other public works.

In case a syndic shall be sick, or obliged to be absent from the district, he shall commit the duties of his office to a respectable inhabitant, and shall give notice thereof to the commandant of the post.

All fines herein specified shall be equally divided, and applied to the royal treasury, and to defray the expenses of the courts and prison of the post. Those persons who may be insolvent shall remain in prison as many days as there shall be piasters composing their debt.

MEMORANDUM.—This census is taken from the latest returns, but is manifestly incorrect—the population being underrated. From some places there have been no returns for the last seven years; and, from those made this year, it is easy to see that certain causes induced the inhabitants to give in short returns of their slaves and of their own numbers. The Spanish Government is fully persuaded that the population at present considerably exceeds 50,000 souls.

[1st SESSION.]

EXTENSION OF THE POWERS OF THE JUDGES OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE TERRITORIES, AND APPEALS FROM THEIR DECISIONS TO THE SUPREME COURT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 29, 1803.

Mr. BOYLE, from the committee to whom was referred a resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of vesting the powers usually exercised by a court of equity in the judges of the United States, within the Indiana and other Territories, and also into the expediency of allowing writs of error and appeals from the judgments and decrees of said judges to the Supreme Court of the United States, made the following report:

That courts without equitable jurisdiction will inevitably, in some instances, become the instruments of iniquity, instead of the administrators of justice. Fraud, accident, and hardship, ingredients in many of those transactions of human life, which constitute the basis of litigation; entrenched within legal forms and veiled with specious, but deceitful appearances, are many times not within the reach of a tribunal, vested with common law powers only. To develop, and relieve against them, an equitable jurisdiction is necessary. It may be proper also to observe, that persons may avail themselves of the powers of a court of equity to obtain more complete relief, by coercing the specific execution of contracts fairly made, and rescinding those that are bottomed upon deceit, than a court of law is competent to grant; add to that, trusts, which frequently become sources of forensic controversy, are matters properly cognizable in courts of equitable jurisdiction.

The committee, therefore, have agreed respectfully to submit to the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to vest the powers usually exercised by a court of equity in the judges of the United States in the Indiana and other Territories.

As to the second matter referred to them for their inquiry, the committee beg leave to observe, that the attainment of a uniformity of decision in any section of country subject to the same laws and usages, is one of the principal objects of the institution of a Supreme Court, with appellate jurisdiction. Where there are many courts dispersed over a country, though subject to the same laws and usages, yet, without one common tribunal, which shall have power to revise and correct the judgments and decrees of the inferior courts, their decisions will be various and contradictory. But to attain this uniformity of decision in each Territorial Government, it is not necessary to allow writs of error or appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, because each Territory has a supreme court (relatively speaking) within itself, which is composed of three judges, and has, or may have, appellate jurisdiction over all others erected in the Territory, whereby it may preserve that uniform rule of decision so desirable.

Correctness, or propriety of decision, is the only other object the attainment of which can be aided by allowing writs of error and appeals from the Territorial courts to the Supreme Court of the United States. The committee are not informed, nor do they believe, that there is any unusual want of confidence in the courts of the Territories. They are aware that hardship and injustice will result to individuals in some instances from the erroneous decisions of those courts, but it has not occurred to them that an appeal will insure infallible relief. Infallibility is not the attribute of any earthly tribunal. So vast is the distance from the Territorial courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, that the mischief resulting from the necessary delay, expense, and inconvenience of prosecuting or defending writs of error and appeals cannot, in the opinion of the committee, be compensated by any advantage to be derived from the revision of the judgments and decrees of the courts of the Territories by the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is obvious to those who have had an opportunity of observing the spirit which often prevails with litigants, that the right of appeal would sometimes be made use of as an instrument of vexation and oppression, where the distance is so great from the inferior to the superior court.

The committee, therefore, upon the second matter referred to them, agree to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to allow writs of error and appeals from the judgments and decrees of the courts of the Indiana and other Territories to the Supreme Court of the United States.

DISAGREEMENT OF A JOINT COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 29, 1803.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to confer with the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, on the amendments to the bill entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and insisted on by the Senate, reported:

That the amendments in question go to raise the salaries of the Postmaster General and his assistant from $3,000 and $1,700 respectively, to $4,000 and $2,000. The committee are of opinion that it would be inexpedient to concur with these amendments, for the following reasons:

1. That the office of Postmaster General, which is of very inferior consequence to that of Comptroller of the Treasury, would thereby be compensated by a salary superior to that of the Comptroller, and superior in proportion to the duties of Postmaster General, to the compensation of all the other great officers of the State, when the duties of those officers are taken into consideration.

2. Because the Assistant Postmaster General is, in fact, but the chief clerk of that Department; because his duties are of a nature very inferior to those of the chief clerk of the Department of State, in whom a high confidence is necessarily reposed, the abuse of which might prove incalculably detrimental to the best interests of the Government. The present emoluments of the chief clerk of the Department of State are $1,850 per annum, and the proposed amendment would give to an officer merely ministerial a greater compensation. The same observations might be extended to the chief clerk of the Treasury Department. The committee, therefore, respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House adhere to their disagreement to the first, second, third, and fourth amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned."

[1st Session.]

APPLICATION TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF SLAVES INTO THE TERRITORY OF LOUISIANA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 23, 1804.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The American convention for promoting the abolition of slavery, and improving the condition of the African race, beg leave respectfully to propose for your consideration the utility and propriety of passing such laws as shall prohibit the importation of slaves into the Territory of Louisiana, lately ceded to the United States.

Your memorialists feel themselves deeply impressed with this important subject, and they deem it their duty to solicit, most earnestly, your serious attention to the proposition. They believe that wisdom and sound policy are so intimately united by their Eternal Parent, that man cannot separate them with impunity. If wisdom urge the performance of any particular act, if it command the formation and establishment of any specific law, the soundest policy will be evinced by obedience to that injunction.

True virtue, the offspring of wisdom, teaches man to love his fellow-man, and enjoins him to perform all that may be within the compass of his abilities for the general happiness of his species. When national Governments comply with this benevolent and sublime law, they become the providential instruments of national blessings; but when they oppose or disregard its dictates, their constituents must necessarily feel, sooner or later, all the calamities which follow such opposition or neglect.

Our ancestors have, unhappily, entailed on some of our States the evils of slavery; many of our fellow-citizens in those States we believe are mournfully sensible of the magnitude of their burden, but they know and feel that man may commit error with more facility than he can eradicate its consequences. Your memorialists entreat you to reflect on, to consider with impartial attention, the dangers and difficulties before you; and beseech you, with deep concern, to preserve the country, whose regulations depend on your wisdom, from similar calamities.

They also respectfully suggest to you, that while the constitution of the United States declares all men equally entitled to liberty, they cannot conceive our Government as acting consistently with its declarations, if it shall, in any instance, authorize man to enslave unoffending man. In compliance with that distinguishing principle of our national constitution, a former Congress judged it expedient to introduce among its regulations, for the government of the Northwestern Territory, a provision resembling that which your memorialists now suggest to you.

There is another consideration to which your memorialists feel themselves bound to call your attention. While the Governments of Europe are shaken by civil discord, or surrounded by the incalculable cruelties and horrors of national warfare, a beneficent and overruling Providence has been pleased to preserve for our country the blessings of peace, to grant us new proofs of his goodness, and to place us in a condition of prosperity, unrivalled in the records of history. Does it not become the duty of a nation, so crowned with the blessings of peace, and plenty, and happiness, to manifest its gratitude, to the whole world, by acts of justice and virtue? For the true honor of our country, from benevolence towards the future possessors of our newly acquired soil, your memorialists hope you will hear and grant their request. And with all the respect which is due to the representatives of a free people, they subscribe themselves, cordially, your friends and fellow-citizens.

Signed by order and on behalf of the convention.

MATTHEW FRANKLIN, President.
OTHNIEL ALSOP, Secretary.

APPLICATION FOR DIVORCES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 17, 1804.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred the several petitions of Marcella Stanton, of Ann Alricks, and of Judith Crow, late Judith Sayse, of the District of Columbia, made the following report:

That the petitioners respectively pray that an act may pass to divorce them from their husbands. The committee have not thought it necessary to inquire into the merits of the cases brought to their view, as they are of opinion, that if any provision be made, it should be of a general nature. They, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the District Court of the District of Columbia ought to be invested with a power to grant divorces in certain cases.

[1st SESSION.]

SLAVERY, ELECTIVE FRANCHISE, AND PUBLIC LANDS IN INDIANA TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 17, 1804.

Mr. RODNEY, from the committee to whom were referred a letter from William Henry Harrison, president of the general convention of the representatives of the people of the Indiana Territory, also a memorial and petition from the said convention, together with the report of a former committee on the same subject at the last session of Congress,* made the following report:

That, taking into their consideration the facts stated in the said memorial and petition, they are induced to believe that a qualified suspension, for a limited time, of the sixth article of compact between the original States and the people and States west of the river Ohio, might be productive of benefit and advantage to the said Territory.

They do not conceive it would be proper to break in upon the system adopted for surveying and locating public lands, which experience has proved so well calculated to promote the general interest. If a preference be given to particular individuals in the present instance, an example will be set, by which future claimants will obtain the same privilege. The committee are, nevertheless, of opinion, that after those lands shall have been surveyed, a certain number of townships should be designated, out of which the claims stated in the memorial ought to be satisfied; and that, for the encouragement of actual settlers, the right of pre-emption should be secured to them.

They consider the existing regulations, contained in the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States, which requires a freehold of fifty acres as a qualification for an elector of the General Assembly, as limiting too much the elective franchise. They conceive the vital principle of a free Government is, that taxation and representation should go together after a residence of a sufficient length to manifest the intention of becoming a permanent inhabitant, and to evince, by conduct orderly and upright, that a person is entitled to the rights of an elector. This probationary period should not extend beyond two years.

It must be the true policy of the United States, with the millions of acres of habitable country which she possesses, to cherish those principles which gave birth to her independence, and created her a nation, by affording an asylum to the oppressed of all countries.

One important object desired in the memorial, the extinguishment of the Indian title to certain lands, has been happily accomplished; whilst the salt spring below the mouth of the Wabash river has also been placed in a situation to be productive of every reasonable advantage.

After a careful review, and an attentive consideration of the various subjects contemplated in the memorial and petition, the committee respectfully submit to the House the following resolutions, as embracing all the objects which require the attention of Congress at this period:

Resolved, That the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787, which prohibited slavery within the said Territory, be suspended, in a qualified manner, for ten years, so as to permit the introduction of slaves, born within the United States, from any of the individual States: Provided, That such individual State does not permit the importation of slaves from foreign countries: And provided further, That the descendants of all such slaves shall, if males, be free at the age of twenty-five years, and, if females, at the age of twenty-one years.

2. Resolved, That every white free man, of the age of twenty-one years, who has resided within the Territory two years, and within that time paid a territorial tax which shall have been assessed six months before the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector of members of the General Assembly.

3. Resolved, That in all cases of sales of land within the Indiana Territory, the right of pre-emption be given to actual settlers on the same.

4. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to cause an estimate to be made of the number and extent of the claims to lands under the resolution of Congress of the 29th of August, 1788, and the law of the 3d of March, 1796, and to lay the same before this House.

5. Resolved, That provision, not exceeding one thirty-sixth part of the public lands within the Indiana Territory, ought to be made for the support of schools within the same.

6. Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant lands to individuals for the purpose of establishing houses of entertainment, and opening certain roads.

7. Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to vest in the Legislature of Louisiana Territory the salt spring below the mouth of the Wabash river.

8. Resolved, That compensation ought to be made to the attorney general of the said Territory for services performed by him on behalf of the United States.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF THOMAS LEWIS, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VIRGINIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 24, 1804.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the memorial of Andrew Moore, of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election of Thomas Lewis, returned to serve in this House, as one of the members for the said State; as also sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from several counties in the State of Virginia, in the case of the said contested election, made the following report:

That at an election held on the several days in the month of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, directed by the law of the State of Virginia, for a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, for the district composed of the counties of Botetourt, Rockbridge, Kenawha, Greenbrier and Monroe, in the western district of Virginia, it appears:

That at the polls taken in the county of Botetourt, Thomas Lewis had one hundred and fifty-five votes, and that Andrew Moore had three hundred and five votes.

That out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis, twenty-three were unqualified to vote; and that out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, twenty-eight were unqualified to vote.

That of the polls taken in the county of Rockbridge, Thomas Lewis had sixty-five votes; and Andrew Moore had three hundred and twenty-one votes.

That out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis, there were four persons unqualified to vote; and out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, there were twenty persons unqualified to vote.

That of the polls taken in the county of Kenawha, Thomas Lewis had one hundred and sixty-one votes; and Andrew Moore one vote.

That out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis, there were ninety persons unqualified to vote.

That of the polls taken in the county of Greenbrier, Thomas Lewis had five hundred and thirty-nine votes; and Andrew Moore had one hundred and three votes.

That out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis, two hundred and two were unqualified to vote; and out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, thirty-two were unqualified to vote.

That of the polls taken in Monroe county, Thomas Lewis had eighty-four votes; and Andrew Moore had one hundred and two votes.

That out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis, thirty-six were unqualified to vote; and out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, forty-four were unqualified to vote. Hence it appears:

That all the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis in the several counties aforesaid, which compose the western district of the State of Virginia, were one thousand and four; and that all the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, in the said counties, were eight hundred and thirty-two.

It further appears, on a deliberate scrutiny, that of the above votes, three hundred and fifty-five persons voted for Thomas Lewis, who were unqualified to vote; and that one hundred and twenty-four voted for Andrew Moore, who were unqualified to vote; and

That by deducting the unqualified votes from the votes given for each of the parties at the elections, Thomas Lewis has six hundred and forty-nine good votes; and Andrew Moore has seven hundred and eight good votes; being fifty-nine votes more than Thomas Lewis: Whereupon,

Your committee are of opinion, that Thomas Lewis, not being duly elected, is not entitled to a seat in this House; and they are further of opinion, that Andrew Moore, who has the highest number of votes after deducting the before-mentioned unqualified votes from the respective polls, is duly elected, and entitled to a seat in this House.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF SAMUEL D. PURVIANCE, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 29, 1804.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred a representation of Duncan McFarland, of the State of North Carolina, complaining of an undue election of Samuel D. Purviance, returned to serve in this House as a member for the seventh election district in the said State; as also sundry depositions and other papers, transmitted from the counties of Montgomery and Cumberland, being part of the aforesaid seventh district, in the case of the said contested election, made the following report:

That at an election held at the times and places directed by a law of the State of North Carolina, for the election of a member to serve in the eighth Congress for the seventh district of said State, among other complaints alleged by Duncan McFarland, it is proved by testimony legally taken in presence of William McCarroll, the voluntary agent of Samuel D. Purviance, that at the elections held at the different election districts into which the county of Montgomery is by law divided, that the inspectors and clerks of the elections, held at the several election divisions of the said county of Montgomery, not only neglected but refused to take the oath obliging them to act with justice and impartiality, as directed by an act of assembly of North Carolina, passed in the year 1802, notwithstanding that they were thereto required by Duncan McFarland, at the opening of the election; therefore, the committee, without deciding on the other complaints made against the said elections, consider the neglect and refusal to take the oath prescribed by law as sufficient ground to set aside the election held for the said county of Montgomery.

That, with respect to the elections held at the election districts in and for the county of Cumberland, of the congressional district aforesaid, a notification was given, according to law, by William Cochran, Esq. on the application of Duncan McFarland, on the 5th day of October, 1803, to Samuel D. Purviance, informing him of the times and places where depositions were to be taken, in support of the complaint of Duncan McFarland, against the election of the said Samuel D. Purviance.

That, agreeably to the notification, William McCarroll attended and acted as the voluntary agent of Samuel D. Purviance: That from the examination taken on this notification, sufficient cause does not appear to change the state of the poll so as to set aside the elections held in and for the said county of Cumberland.

That all the witnesses not appearing agreeably to the said notification, a second notification was left at the house of Samuel D. Purviance for said Samuel D. Purviance or William McCarroll, directed to said McCarroll his friend, on the 2d of November, 1803, appointing another examination of witnesses, on the 22d, 23d, 29th, and 30th days of that month. Of this notification Samuel D. Purviance, then in Congress, was not informed until the 23d, viz: the day after which the examination was to commence, and he had authorized no agent; and neither William McCarroll nor any other person attended as his voluntary agent.

That on the first day of December, a third notification was left at the house of Samuel D. Purviance, for the said Samuel D. Purviance or William McCarroll, his agent or friend, directed to the said William McCarroll, to attend on the 9th and 10th days following, to the further examination of witnesses, as aforesaid; but the notification did not, nor could not reach Samuel D. Purviance, then in Congress, in due time, and neither William McCarroll, nor any other agent in behalf of Samuel D. Purviance, attended.

It further appears to the committee, that although various irregularities and abuses are set forth in the depositions, taken agreeably to the second and third notifications, are alleged to have been practised at the said election, yet that Samuel D. Purviance had not such notice as put it in his power to attend the said examination of witnesses, or to appoint an agent so to do.

It further appears from the documents, that depositions were taken, and examinations made by magistrates who were not named in the notification, issued by the magistrate to whom the application was made, and without a certificate of the matters and proceedings had by him in that behalf, as the law enacted by Congress provides. It also further appears, that part of the testimony so taken is in the hand-writing of Duncan McFarland, one of the parties, and signed by the mark of the deponent, inconsistent with the act aforesaid, which provides that the magistrate shall cause the examination to be reduced to writing in the presence of the parties or their agents, which the committee are of opinion does not authorize the writing the examination by the parties themselves.

Influenced by the aforementioned facts and circumstances, the committee are of opinion, that the aforesaid testimony respecting the election held in and for the said county of Cumberland cannot be admitted or acted upon by the House.

By comparing the certified records of the lists of taxables with the list of votes given at the election now contested, it appears that the number who voted exceed the number of taxables in the county, viz: the number of persons who voted is 1,159, and the number of free taxable polls taken from the last return of taxables is 1,117; but the committee discover that the tax list of any year, agreeably to the laws of North Carolina, are not a perfect record of those who are entitled to vote, because citizens who at any time formerly had paid taxes, by the laws of that State appear to the committee to continue to enjoy the privilege of voting, though they might for many years have ceased to pay taxes.

Therefore, your committee are of opinion, that there is not sufficient legal testimony to set aside the election of Cumberland county, so as to vacate the seat of Samuel D. Purviance.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES INTO LOUISIANA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 8, 1804.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

MARCH 7, 1804.

I communicate to Congress an extract of a letter from Governor Claiborne to the Secretary of State, with one which it covered, for their information, as to the present state of the subject to which they relate.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract of a letter from Governor Claiborne to the Secretary of State, dated

NEW ORLEANS, January 31, 1804.

A vessel arrived at this port a few days since, with fifty African negroes for sale. I immediately applied to a Mr. Leonard, the late Spanish contadore at this place, a man of great integrity of character for information, as to the laws and customs of Spain, relating to the African trade, and received from him a letter upon the subject, which is herewith enclosed. Finding, from Mr. Leonard's communication, that the bringing of African slaves to Louisiana had been permitted by the Spanish authority, and doubting whether I was vested with power to forbid their sale, the importer has been left to pursue his own wishes.

SIR:

NEW ORLEANS, January 25, 1804.

In reply to your excellency's request for information, relative to the arrangement of the Spanish Government of this province, concerning the importation of slaves, I beg leave to represent:

That by an order of His Majesty, dated at Aranjuez, the 24th of January, 1793, the prohibition which restrained the importation of slaves was expressly removed, free of duties, to favor the commercial interest of His Majesty's subjects, and the said order was promulgated in due form by the Intendant of this province, Don Ramon de Loper y Angulo, on the 29th of November, 1800.

Subsequent to the retrocession of the province to France, but pending the existence and the exercise of the Spanish authorities, three vessels have arrived, and been admitted into this port with slaves for sale, consigned to John Francis Merecu, viz: the French brig African, Peter Farmuel, master, charged with one hundred and forty-three Africans, the French brig La Confiance, John Louis Sacray, master, charged with one hundred and seventy Africans, and the French brig Sally, Augustus Guibert, master, charged with one hundred and fifty Africans.

It is proper for me to observe to your excellency, that the Royal Edict required Spanish bottoms and Spanish masters for this commerce, but the Spanish authorities which existed but after the retrocession had been formally announced, considered it their duty to pursue the obvious spirit of this edict, which had for its object the particular interest and accommodation of His Majesty's marine and his subjects, and therefore they deemed it both reasonable and just, that these privileges and advantages which had been graciously intended for Spanish Louisiana should not be withheld from French Louisiana during the existence of their temporary authority.

To this candid exposition of facts, I will beg leave, with great deference, to add the opinion that should a change of policy be found expedient by the Government of the United States, it should be promulgated a reasonable time anterior to the interdiction of such commercial expeditions as may have been projected under and permitted by the Government of France or Spain, previous to the sale and transfer of the province by the French Government to the United States.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.,

GILBERT LEONARD.

His Excellency WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

EXPLORATION OF LOUISIANA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 8, 1804.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, on the resolve of the House of Representatives, directing them to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain remote and unknown parts of Louisiana to be explored, made the following report:

By a series of memorable events the United States have lately acquired a large addition of soil and jurisdiction. This is believed, besides the tracts on the east side of the Mississippi, to include all the country which lies to the westward between that river and the great chain of mountains that stretch from north to south, and divide the waters running into the Atlantic from those which empty into the Pacific Ocean; and beyond that chain between the territories claimed by Great Britain on the one side, and by Spain on the other, quite to the South Sea.

It is highly desirable that this extensive region should be visited, in some parts at least, by intelligent men. Important additions might thereby be made to the science of geography. Various materials might thence be derived to augment our knowledge of natural history. The Government would thence acquire correct information of the situation, extent, and worth of its own dominions, and individuals of research and curiosity would receive ample gratification as to the works of art and productions of nature which exist in those boundless tracts.

There is no need of informing the House that already an expedition, authorized by Congress at the second session of the seventh Congress, has been actually undertaken, and is going on, under the President's direction, up the Missouri. The two enterprising conductors of this adventure, Captains Lewis and Clark, have been directed to attempt a passage to the western shore of the South Sea; from them, on their return, in 1805, a narrative full of instruction may be expected. It is also understood that a survey has been ordered to be made of the Mississippi, from the mouth of the Ohio to the falls of Saint Anthony. Of this a correct map may be expected within a reasonable time. The like also is hoped, in the course of a moderate period, from the latter place to the source of the Mississippi, and thence to the Lake of the Woods.

Men of political research have, in like manner, long known that the course of the Mississippi downwards to the Gulf of Mexico, has been well delineated by Captain Hutchings; and that more recently, by the assiduous observations of Mr. Ellicott, the turnings and windings of that river, southward of its junction with the Ohio, and the territorial line on the 31st degree of north latitude, to the northwestern angle of Florida, have been exhibited in a perspicuous and scientific manner. Along the coast of the ocean too, from Perdido Bay to the Bay of Saint Bernard, navigators have viewed the shores and coast so often, that there is little left to explore.

But, although there is so much really known, or in a train of investigation, concerning Louisiana, there are still some parts upon which it would be desirable to possess additional information. The tracts alluded to are those which remain principally in their original obscurity, and strongly attract the eye of the adventurer. Their pathless forests may be advantageously penetrated along the channels of the Arkansas and the Red River, two of those large and long water courses which intersect them. An expedition of discovery up these prodigious streams and their branches might redound as much to the honor, and more to the interest of our Government, than the voyages by sea round the terraqueous globe have done for the polished nations of Europe who authorized them. Such liberal enterprises will befit the present season of prosperity, and may be expected to succeed best during the reign of peace.

The Red River was visited many years ago, and even settled as high as Natchitoches. This old establishment is laid down in some of the maps, as being only seven leagues distant from the station of Adais, the capital of the province of Tecas, and situated on the river Mexicano. Red River is described as difficult to ascend when the waters are low; but when high a traveller may, by means of them, penetrate where he pleases. More than half a century ago, it was said that along its banks were many inferior lakes, and drowned lands that abounded with alligators and fishes; that its shores were inhabited by plenty of bisons, bears, tigers, wolves, deer, and several other species of untamed beasts; as well as by turkeys, geese, swans, ducks, and other kinds of wild fowl; and that all manner of indigenous fruit trees and grape vines sprout up luxuriantly from the soil. To these accounts, which are common to most other parts of the American wilderness when first visited by civilized men, other facts and considerations are now to be added. The nation has been lately told, on respectable authority, that the Red River is navigable by boats one thousand miles beyond Natchitoches. It is reported to run through a country abounding in rich prairies, where neat cattle and horses range in innumerable herds as independent as the natural inhabitants. There is reason to presume the head of this stream lies concealed in the southwestern corner of the newly ceded territory. The limits of Louisiana in that quarter are obscure and undefined. And it is worthy of legislative consideration, whether the latitude and longitude of the Red River source ought not to be ascertained under the authority of the nation. It may be expected that individuals will venture upon such undertakings for the gratification of their own speculative curiosity, and by discreet management the journeys of such persons will minister to the national wants, and to general instruction, with but a trifling appropriation from the Treasury.

The Arkansas, which has been already traced above one thousand miles, also seems worthy of being explored with more care and to a greater extent than has hitherto been done. A spacious plain and valley incrustated annually (like the soil in some spots about the Persian Gulf) with native salt, in quantity sufficient to impregnate a branch of the Arkansas, and occasionally the river into which it falls, with its briny quality, and to make it a salt river down to the settlement of Ouisarque, for considerably more than six hundred miles of its course, might be mentioned as no ordinary occurrences. The masses of virgin silver and gold that glitter in the veins of the rocks which underlay the Arkansas itself, and mingle with the minerals near certain other of its streams, and offer themselves to the hand of him who will gather, refine, and convert them to use, are no less uncommon and wonderful. These extraordinary productions might be dwelt upon to considerable length, in this report; but, credible as both the relations are, the committee forbears to offer any thing more than that the existence of a salt river, precious mines and ores, and of some other remarkable objects, are stated upon solid and credible testimony. Omitting these things as not necessary to be urged to Congress, the committee considers that the latitude, longitude, and relative situation of the source of the Arkansas, are themselves of sufficient moment to render their attainment very desirable.

Without writing a sentence on the advantages of tracing the streams of the Black river, the White river, the Mexicano, and of other rivers, to their sources, the committee submits the following opinion:

That it will be honorable and useful to make some public provision for further exploring the extent, and ascertaining the boundaries of Louisiana: and,

That a sum not exceeding _____ dollars be appropriated for enabling the President of the United States to cause surveys and observations to be made on the Red River and the Arkansas, or either of them, or elsewhere in Louisiana, as he shall think proper, for these purposes.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF THOMAS MANN RANDOLPH, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VIRGINIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 9, 1804.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred, during the present session, a memorial of Samuel J. Cabell, of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election of Thomas Mann Randolph, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the said State; and also sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from the counties of Amherst, Albemarle, and Fluvanna, in the State of Virginia, in the case of the said contested election, made the following report:

That, having examined the depositions and papers referred to them, they discover that the land lists of all the counties of which the district is composed are wanting, and the lists of voters of all the counties but one (viz: Fluvanna county) are also wanting. The committee also inform the House that, by letters from the memorialist of the 13th of October, and 3d of November, the committee were requested not to proceed, until he could procure and transmit further documents. That by another letter from the memorialist of the 5th of January, accompanied with a protest against documents then before the committee, he again made a request that the committee would defer taking the subject under consideration. Afterwards the memorialist was notified, by the direction of the committee, to be prepared, and to attend the committee himself, or by his agent, in order to obtain a decision: he has not complied with the notification, and the committee observe no facts, from examining the documents submitted to them, sufficient to invalidate the claim, or set aside the returns of Thomas Mann Randolph. Therefore, the committee are of opinion that Thomas Mann Randolph, returned as a member for the congressional district composed of the counties of Albemarle, Amherst, and Fluvanna, in the State of Virginia, is entitled to his seat in this House.

EXTRA ALLOWANCES TO DISTRICT ATTORNEYS AND ASSISTANT COUNSEL.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 24, 1804.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 24, 1804.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d instant, respectfully reports:

That the annexed statement (A) exhibits in detail all the moneys which, since the establishment of the present Government, have been paid at the Treasury either for extra allowances to district attorneys, or as fees to other attorneys employed singly or as assistant counsel, or for legal advice in the business of the United States; and amounting altogether to five thousand and twenty-two dollars and sixteen cents.

That some other allowances of a similar nature have been made by the collectors of customs, and principally by the supervisors of the internal revenues, in relation especially to suits instituted in the State courts, as may appear from the statement B, of the credits allowed on that account to the supervisor of Pennsylvania; and that those allowances, being considered as charges on the revenue, and being paid by the officers out of the moneys collected by them, cannot be ascertained except by an examination of all the accounts of every collector and supervisor—an investigation which will necessarily consume some months, and the result of which shall be laid before Congress at their next session.

That no other allowances, but those which are exhibited in the statement A, and the annexed note a, have been paid or authorized by the present Secretary of the Treasury for fees to the assistant counsel, or extra allowance to district attorneys; that no payments whatever have been made or authorized by him for legal advice, nor have any such, to his knowledge, been made or authorized, since he has been in office, by any other public officer, or been claimed at the Treasury by any person whatever.

All which is respectfully submitted.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF JOHN HOGE, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 10, 1804.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of the citizens of Washington therein named, against the election of John Hoge, as a representative in Congress for the district of Washington, in Pennsylvania, made the following report:

That William Hoge, member of the House of Representatives for the eighth Congress, having, by letter to the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, dated the 15th of October, resigned his seat in Congress, the Governor, in pursuance of the provisions made in the second section of the first article of the constitution of the United States, issued a writ of election to supply the vacancy which had thus taken place. That the said writ was issued on the 22d day of October, and the election directed to be held on the 2d day of November, eleven days after the date of the said writ. That the writ was brought by the mail to the prothonotary's office in Washington on the 30th of October, but not proclaimed by the sheriff until the 31st.

It appears to the committee, that though by the second section of the first article of the constitution of the United States, it is made the duty of the Executive authority of the respective States to issue writs of election to fill vacancies, yet, by the fourth section of the aforesaid article, it is made the duty of the Legislature of each State to prescribe the times, places, and manner for holding such elections. It appears, however, that several elections, to supply vacancies in Congress, have been heretofore held in Pennsylvania; yet, on examining the laws of that State, it appears that no law exists prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections to supply such vacancies as may happen in the representation in Congress; and consequently, if the election of John Hoge is, on this account, set aside, no election can be held to supply the vacancy until the Legislature of the State enact a law for that purpose.

By the law for the general election of representatives to Congress for Pennsylvania, the sheriff is to give thirty days' notice before the election, and to make the returns within thirty days after it. This election is held near five months before the expiration of the existing Congress. By the law of said State, for supplying vacancies in the State Legislature, the speakers of the respective Houses shall issue writs to supply vacancies that may happen, giving at least ten days' notice. The Governor, in the case now before the committee, has directed the election to be held on the same day, &c., on which the electors for President and Vice-President were to be chosen. There is no proof before the committee of any abuse in the manner of conducting the election in obedience to the writ issued by the Governor.

While the committee are of opinion that the Legislature of Pennsylvania ought to have appointed as near as might be the times, as well as the places and manner of holding elections to supply vacancies in Congress, and that in ordinary cases a longer period ought to intervene between the time of public notice and the day of holding the election; yet considering the special circumstances connected with the election of John Hoge, and particularly that the election took place on the day fixed by the State Legislature for the appointment of electors for the State of Pennsylvania, the committee are of opinion that John Hoge is entitled to a seat in this House.

[2d SESSION.]

REMONSTRANCE OF THE PEOPLE OF LOUISIANA AGAINST THE POLITICAL SYSTEM ADOPTED BY CONGRESS FOR THEM.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 31st OF DECEMBER, 1804.

We, the subscribers, planters, merchants, and other inhabitants of Louisiana, respectfully approach the Legislature of the United States with a memorial of our rights, a remonstrance against certain laws which contravene them, and a petition for that redress to which the laws of nature, sanctioned by positive stipulation, have entitled us.

Without any agency in the events which have annexed our country to the United States we yet considered them as fortunate, and thought our liberties secured even before we knew the terms of the cession. Persuaded that a free people would acquire territory only to extend the blessings of freedom, that an enlightened nation would never destroy those principles on which its Government was founded, and that their Representatives would disdain to become the instruments of oppression, we calculated with certainty that their first act of sovereignty would be a communication of all the blessings they enjoyed, and were the less anxious to know on what particular terms we were received. It was early understood that we were to be American citizens; this satisfied our wishes; it implied every thing we could desire, and filled us with that happiness which arises from the anticipated enjoyment of a right long withheld. We knew that it was impossible to be citizens of the United States without enjoying a personal freedom, protection for property, and, above all, the privileges of a free, representative Government, and did not, therefore, imagine that we could be deprived of these rights even if there should have existed no promise to impart them; yet it was with some satisfaction we found these objects secured to us by the stipulations of treaty, and the faith of Congress pledged for their uninterrupted enjoyment. We expected them from your magnanimity, but were not displeased to see them guaranteed by solemn engagements.

With a firm persuasion that these engagements would be soon fulfilled, we passed under your jurisdiction with a joy bordering on enthusiasm, submitted to the inconveniences of an intermediate dominion without a murmur, and saw the last tie that attached us to our mother country severed with less regret. Even the evils of a military and absolute authority were acquiesced in because it indicated an eagerness to complete the transfer, and place beyond the reach of accident the union we mutually desired. A single magistrate, vested with civil and military, with executive and judiciary powers, upon whose laws we had no check, over whose acts we had no control, and from whose decrees there is no appeal; the sudden suspension of all those forms to which we had been accustomed; the total want of any permanent system to replace them; the introduction of a new language into the administration of justice; the perplexing necessity of using an interpreter for every communication with the officers placed over us; the involuntary errors, of necessity committed by judges uncertain by what code they are to decide, wavering between the civil and the common law, between the forms of the French, Spanish, and American jurisprudence, and with the best intentions unable to expound laws of which they are ignorant, or to acquire them in a language they do not understand, these were not slight inconveniences, nor was this state of things calculated to give favorable impressions or realise the hopes we entertained; but we submitted with resignation, because we thought it the effect of necessity; we submitted with patience, though its duration was longer than we had been taught to expect; we submitted even with cheerfulness, while we supposed your honorable body was employed in reducing this chaos to order, and calling a system of harmony from the depth of this confused, discordant mass. But we cannot conceal, we ought not to dissemble, that the first project presented for the Government of this country tended to lessen the enthusiasm which, until that period, had been universal, and to fix our attention on present evils, while it rendered us less sanguine as to the future. Still, however, we wished to persuade ourselves that further inquiry would produce better information; that discussion would establish our rights, and time destroy every prejudice that might oppose them. We could not bring ourselves to believe that we had so far mistaken the stipulations in our favor, or that Congress could so little regard us, and we waited the result with anxiety which distance only prevented our expressing before the passing of the bill. After a suspense which continued to the last moment of the session, after debates which only tended to show how little our true situation was known, after the rejection of every amendment declaratory of our rights, it at length became a law, and, before this petition can be presented, will take effect in our country.

Disavowing any language but that of respectful remonstrance, disdaining any other but that which befits a manly assertion of our rights, we pray leave to examine the law for erecting Louisiana into two Territories and providing for the temporary government thereof, to compare its provisions with our rights, and its whole scope with the letter and spirit of the treaty which binds us to the United States.

The first section erects the country south of the thirty-third degree into a Territory of the United States by the name of the Territory of Orleans.

The second gives us a Governor appointed for three years by the President of the United States.

The fourth vests in him and in a council, also chosen by the President, all legislative power, subject to the revision of Congress, specially guarding against any interference with public property either by taxation or sale.

And the fifth establishes a judiciary, to consist of a supreme court, having exclusive criminal and original jurisdiction without appeal for all causes above the value of one hundred dollars, and such inferior courts as the Legislature of the Territory may establish. The judges of the superior court are appointed by the President to continue in office four years.

This is the summary of our constitution; this is so far the accomplishment of a treaty engagement to "incorporate us into the Union, and admit us to all the rights, advantages, and immunities of American citizens." And this is the promise performed, which was made by our first magistrate in your name, "that you would receive us as brothers, and hasten to extend to us a participation in those invaluable rights which had formed the basis of your unexampled prosperity."

Ignorant as we have been represented of our natural rights, shall we be called on to show that this Government is inconsistent with every principle of civil liberty?

Uninformed as we are supposed to be of our acquired rights, is it necessary for us to demonstrate that this act does not "incorporate us in the Union," that it vests us with none of the "rights," gives us no advantages, and deprives us of all the "immunities" of American citizens.

If this should be required, we think neither task will be difficult.

On the first point we need only appeal to your declaration of independence; to your constitution; to your different State Governments; to the writings of your revolutionary patriots and statesmen; to your own professions and public acts; and finally, legislators, to your own hearts, on which the love of civil liberty and its principles are, we trust, too deeply engraved to be ever totally effaced.

A Governor is to be placed over us whom we have not chosen, whom we do not even know, who may be ignorant of our language, uninformed of our institutions, and who may have no connexions with our country, or interest in its welfare.

This Governor is vested with all executive, and almost unlimited legislative power; for the law declares that, "by and with the advice and consent of the legislative body, he may change, modify, and repeal the laws," &c. But this advice and consent will no doubt in all cases be easily procured from the majority of a council selected by the President or Governor, and dependent on him for their appointment and continuance in office; or if they should prove refractory, the power of prorogation frees him from any troublesome interference, until a more prudent selection at the end of the year shall give him a council better suited to his views. The true legislative power, then, is vested in the Governor alone, the council operates as a cloak to conceal the extent of his authority, to screen him from the odium of all unpopular acts, to avoid all responsibility, and give us the faint semblance of a representative assembly, with so few of its distinguishing features, that unless the name were inscribed on the picture it would be difficult to discover the object for which it was intended.

Taxation without representation, an obligation to obey laws without any voice in their formation, the undue influence of the executive upon legislative proceedings, and a dependent judiciary, formed, we believe, very prominent articles in the list of grievances complained of by the United States, at the commencement of their glorious contest for freedom; the opposition to them, even by force, was deemed meritorious and patriotic, and the rights on which that opposition was founded were termed fundamental, indefeasible, self-evident, and eternal; they formed, as your country then unanimously asserted, the only rational basis on which Government could rest; they were so plain, it was added, as to be understood by the weakest understanding; not capable of alienation, they might always be reclaimed; unsusceptible of change, they were the same at all times, in all climates, and under all circumstances; and the fairest inheritance for our posterity, they should never, it was firmly asserted, they should never be abandoned but with life.

These were the sentiments of your predecessors; were they wrong? Were the patriots who composed your councils mistaken in their political principles? Did the heroes who died in their defence seal a false creed with their blood? No, they were not wrong! The admiration of the world, the respect still paid to the living, the veneration accorded to the memory of the dead, attest the purity of their principles, and prove the truth of those maxims, which rendered their lives a blessing to their country, and their deaths glorious in its defence.

Are truths, then, so well founded, so universally acknowledged, inapplicable only to us? Do political axioms on the Atlantic become problems when transferred to the shores of the Mississippi? or are the unfortunate inhabitants of these regions the only people who are excluded from those equal rights acknowledged in your declaration of independence, repeated in the different State constitutions, and ratified by that of which we claim to be a member? Where, we ask respectfully, where is the circumstance that is to exclude us from a participation in these rights? Is it because we have not heretofore enjoyed them? This, on the contrary, would seem a reason to hasten the communication, to indemnify us by a futurity of freedom, for the years we have been deprived of it, and enable us, experimentally, to compare the blessings of a free Government with the evils of another kind of dominion. But the present situation of affairs forms no pleasing contrast with that which is past; and if we did not count with confidence on a change in the system you have adopted, the prospect before us would not afford matter for consolatory anticipation; for though a period is fixed for the absolute government placed over us, though a year may terminate the equally objectionable system which succeeds it, yet what is to follow? Liberty? Self-government? Independence? and a participation in the advantages of the Union? If these were offered to us as the reward of a certain term of patience and submission, though we could not acquiesce in the justice of the procedure, we should have some consolation in our misfortunes; but no manifestation of what awaits us at the expiration of the law is yet made.

We may then again become the victims of false information, of hasty remark, or prejudiced opinion; we may then again be told that we are incapable of managing our own concerns, that the period of emancipation is not yet arrived, and that when, in the school of slavery, we have learned how to be free, our rights shall be restored. Upon the topic to which this leads we are reluctant to speak; but misrepresented and insulted, it cannot be deemed improper to show how groundless are the calumnies which represent us as in a state of degradation, unfit to receive the boon of freedom. How far any supposed incapacity to direct the affairs of our own country would release the United States from their obligation to confer upon us the rights of citizenship, or upon what principle they are to become the judges of that capacity, might, we believe, fairly be questioned; for we have surely not become less fit for the task since the signature of the treaty than we were before that period; and that no such incapacity was then supposed to exist, is evident from the terms of that instrument, which declares that we are to be admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the constitution. If the United States, then, may postpone the performance of this engagement until, in their opinion, it may be proper to perform it, of what validity is the compact, or can that be called one of which the performance depends only on the will of the contracting party?

But if capacity is to be the criterion, and information the preliminary requisite of our admission, let us respectfully inquire what is the nature of this capacity and information, and where it will most probably be found. By the distribution of powers between the General and State Governments, the former have the exclusive superintendance of all external relations, and of those internal arrangements, which regard the several States in their national capacity; the residuary powers, retained by the States, are more limited in their operations, and require in their exercise a species of information to be derived only from local sources. The purest principles will be misapplied, the best intentions will be ill directed, the most splendid efforts of genius will prove ineffectual, without an intimate knowledge of the manners, customs, pursuits, and interests of the people, to whom they are applied, or in whose favour they are exerted. Should this reasoning be just, it would appear to follow that local information should be preferred in a State legislator to splendid acquirement, when they cannot be united; and although we give the representatives of the United States all the superiority they claim and justly merit, yet we cannot be accused of presumption, in supposing that we know somewhat more of our own country and its local interests than men who are acquainted with it only from report. It will not, we trust, be answered that the members of the council must be selected from the inhabitants; we have already shown what share this council will probably have in legislation, and the residence of one year is certainly too short to attain information, or secure any thing like a permanence of attachment.

If this local knowledge is necessary to legislate wisely, how much more so is it in order to select discreetly those on whom this task must devolve. The President must necessarily depend on the information of his agents here, without any personal knowledge of the men he must choose. How can he detect imposition, or counteract prejudice? How defeat intrigue, or secure himself from the reproach of having confided our interests to men in whom we have no confidence? We might contrast these inconveniences with the evident advantages of a choice made by the people themselves, and the conviction would be irresistible that the latter possess exclusively that species of information, with respect to character, conduct, circumstances, and abilities, which is necessary to a prudent choice of their representatives; but we presume enough has been said to show that among a people not absolutely sunk in ignorance, the kind of knowledge indispensable to good government, or a selection of rulers, can only be found at home; that the best abilities, and the purest intentions will not replace it abroad, and that without it all legislation is tyrannical and oppressive. Convinced of this truth, we find the advocates for our subjection driven to an argument at which we have before hinted. To deprive us of our right of election, we have been represented as too ignorant to exercise it with wisdom, and too turbulent to enjoy it with safety. Sunk in ignorance, effeminated by luxury, debased by oppression, we were, it was said, incapable of appreciating a free constitution, if it were given, or feeling the deprivation, if it were denied.

The sentiments which were excited by this humiliating picture may be imagined, but cannot be expressed, consistent with the respect we owe to your honorable body. We were willing, however, to ascribe it to the want of correct information, but we could not avoid wondering that it should be so very defective as to have drawn from the names of some districts in our country an argument as to the language spoken in them, which proved fatal to an important amendment to the bill. We could not imagine what had excited the idea of our effeminacy and profusion; and the laborious planter, at his frugal meal, heard with a smile of bitterness and contempt the descriptions published at Washington of his opulence and luxury.

As to the degree of information diffused through the country, we humbly request that some more correct evidence may be produced than the superficial remarks that have been made by travellers or residents, who neither associate with us nor speak our language; many of us are native citizens of the United States, who have participated in that kind of knowledge which is there spread among the people; the others generally are men who will not suffer by a comparison with the population of any other colony. Some disadvantages as to education in the higher branches of literature have lately attended us, owing to the difficulty of procuring it, but the original settlement of the province was marked by circumstances peculiarly favorable in this respect; it was made at no distant date, at a period when science had attained a great degree of perfection, and from a country in which it flourished; many individuals possessing a property and rank, which suppose a liberal education, were among the first settlers; and perhaps there would be no vanity in asserting, that the first establishment of Louisiana might vie with that of any other in America for the respectability and information of those who compose it. Their descendants now respectfully call for the evidence which proves that they have so far degenerated as to become totally incompetent to the task of legislation.

For our love of order and submission to the laws we can confidently appeal to the whole history of our settlement, and particularly to what has lately passed in those dangerous moments when it was uncertain at what point our political vibrations would stop; when national prejudice, personal interest, factious views, and ambitious designs, might be supposed to combine for the interruption of our repose; when, in the frequent changes to which we have been subject, the authority of one nation was weakened before the other had established its power. In those moments of crisis and danger, no insurrection disturbed, no riot disgraced us; the voice of sedition was silent; and before a magistrate was appointed, good morals served instead of laws, and a love of order instead of civil power; it is then as unjust to tax us with turbulence as it is degrading to reproach us with ignorance and vice. But let us admit, that by some train of reasoning to which we are strangers, by some incomprehensible fatality, we are cut off from our national rights, and form an unfortunate exception to those general principles on which your revolution and Government are founded; that there is no clause for us in the great charter of nature, and that we must look for our freedom to another source; yet we are not without a claim; one arising from solemn stipulation, and, according to our ideas, full, obligatory, and unequivocal.

The third article of the treaty lately concluded at Paris, declares that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyments of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time they shall be protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the exercise of the religion they profess."

Your honorable body seems to have adopted a construction of this article, which would suspend its performance until some period fixed by the principles of the constitution, and to have read the article thus: "the inhabitants shall be incorporated into the Union, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, &c., as soon as the principles of the federal constitution will permit." We, on the contrary, contend that the words "according to the principles of the federal constitution," as they are placed in the sentence, form no limitation, that they were intended as a description of the kind of rights we were to enjoy, or at most relate to the mode in which they were to be conferred, and that the article contemplates no other delay to our reception than will be required to pass the necessary laws and ascertain the representation to which we are entitled.

The inhabitants of the ceded territory are to be "incorporated into the Union of the United States;" these words can in no sense be satisfied by the act in question. A Territory governed in the manner it directs may be a province of the United States, but can by no construction be said to be incorporated into the Union. To be incorporated into the Union must mean to form a part of it; but to every component part of the United States the constitution has guaranteed a republican form of Government, and this, as we have already shown, has no one principle of republicanism in its composition; it is therefore not a compliance with the letter of the treaty, and is totally inconsistent with its spirit, which certainly intends some stipulations in our favor. For if Congress may govern us as they please, what necessity was there for this clause, or how are we benefited by its introduction? If any doubt, however, could possibly arise on the first member of the sentence, it must vanish by a consideration of the second, which provides for their admission to the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the United States. But this Government, as we have shown, is totally incompatible with those rights. Without any vote in the election of our Legislature, without any check upon our executive, without any one incident of self-government, what valuable "privilege" of citizenship is allowed us, what "right" do we enjoy, of what "immunity" can we boast, except, indeed, the degrading exemption from the cares of legislation, and the burden of public affairs?

Will it be said that though our right be admitted, yet Congress are to determine the period when it shall be conferred? This, we apprehend, would not only be contrary to the words of the treaty, but would be a solecism in itself. The words "according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of the rights," &c., certainly mean to such rights as are secured by the principles of the constitution, or that we are to be admitted to their enjoyment in such manner as the same principles direct; and at any rate, the words "as soon as possible," can never be construed, so as to give a right of deferring it indefinitely. If it may be procrastinated for two years, we see no reason, why it may not be deferred for twenty, or a hundred, or totally omitted. That our verbal construction is the true one will be evident from pursuing the other exposition to its consequences. If the treaty means to say that we shall be admitted as soon as the principles of the constitution will permit, we must look into that instrument to discover what restrictions oppose its immediate performance. We should naturally expect, if this reasoning be true, to find some period limited before which we could not become members of the Union, some requisites of population or other circumstance to be previously attained or performed; but, on the contrary, the power of admitting new States is vested in Congress, without any restriction whatever that can be applicable to the present case; there is, therefore, nothing that can satisfy these words, if they are construed as a limitation; nothing but the will of Congress is referred to in the constitution. This construction, then, would prove that the United States had stipulated to admit us into the Union as soon as they should think proper; but a treaty implies a compact, and what compact can arise from a stipulation to perform or not perform, as the party shall deem expedient? This would be such a solecism in argument, such a confusion of terms as must make us doubt the propriety of any construction that leads to them, and we feel ourselves justified in a persuasion, that the treaty intended to incorporate us into the Union so soon as the laws necessary for that purpose could be passed.

We know not with what view the territory north of the thirty-third degree has been severed from us, and carried with it the distinguishing name which belonged to us, and to which we are attached; the convenience of the inhabitants we humbly apprehend would have been better consulted by preserving the connexion of the whole province until a greater degree of population made a division necessary. If this division should operate so as to prolong our state of political tutelage, on account of any supposed deficiency of numbers, we cannot but consider it as injurious to our rights, and therefore enumerate it among those points of which we have reason to complain.

If there is force in our reclamations, on the great question of fundamental rights; if we are entitled to legislate for ourselves as a member of the Union, and to establish the forms on which that legislation shall be conducted, by framing a constitution suited to our own exigencies, then no further observations need be made on other parts of the law, for the right of local legislation implies that of making the alterations we might deem expedient; then our judiciary would become independent, the executive power would be properly circumscribed, and the legislative guarded against encroachment.

There is one subject, however, extremely interesting to us, in which great care has been taken to prevent any interference even by the Governor and council, selected by the President himself. The African trade is absolutely prohibited, and severe penalties imposed on a traffic free to all the Atlantic States who choose to engage in it, and as far as relates to procuring the subjects of it from other States, permitted even in the Territory of the Mississippi.

It is not our intention to enter into arguments that have become familiar to every reasoner on this question. We only ask the right of deciding it for ourselves, and of being placed in this respect on an equal footing with other States. To the necessity of employing African laborers, which arises from climate, and the species of cultivation pursued in warm latitudes, is added a reason in this country peculiar to itself. The banks raised to restrain the waters of the Mississippi can only be kept in repair by those whose natural constitution and habits of labor enable them to resist the combined effects of a deleterious moisture, and a degree of heat intolerable to whites; this labor is great, it requires many hands, and it is all important to the very existence of our country.

If, therefore, this traffic is justifiable any where, it is surely in this province, where, unless it is permitted, cultivation must cease, the improvements of a century be destroyed, and the great river resume its empire over our ruined fields and demolished habitations.

Another subject not indeed growing out of this law, but of great moment to us, is the sudden change of language in all the public offices and administration of justice. The great mass of the inhabitants speak nothing but the French; the late Government was always careful, in their selection of officers, to find men who possessed our language, and with whom we could personally communicate; their correspondence with the interior parts of the province was also carried on chiefly in our own language; their judicial proceedings were indeed in Spanish; but being carried on altogether by writing, translations were easily made; at present, for the slightest communication, an interpreter must be procured; in more important concerns, our interest suffers from not being fully explained; a phrase, a circumstance seemingly of little moment, and which a person uninterested in the affair will not take the trouble to translate, is frequently decisive, and produces the most important effects. That free communication so necessary to give the magistrate a knowledge of the people, and to inspire them with confidence in his administration, is by this means totally cut off, and the introduction of viva voce pleadings into the courts of justice subjects the party who can neither understand his counsel, his judge, nor the advocate of his opponent, to embarrassments the most perplexing, and often to injuries the most serious.

We have thus stated the great sources of discontent which have arisen from the measures your honorable body has been pleased to pursue. Did we suppose them the effect of a settled design to oppress, of a determination to disregard our natural and stipulated rights, we are persuaded we should do as much injustice to your views, as the strongest expressions would do to our feelings of indignation and grief; but we will not insult you by a suspicion so injurious to your motives; the want of true information with respect to us, opinions founded on a superficial acquaintance with our country, and prejudiced relations with our habits and manners, on reports the most unfounded, even as to our language, these alone have given rise to the measures of which we complain, and when these impressions shall have been effaced, we have the fullest confidence that their effects will cease, and the language of remonstrance will be changed to that of congratulation and thanks.

Deeply impressed, therefore, with a persuasion that our rights need only be stated to be recognised and allowed; that the highest glory of a free nation is a communication of the blessings of freedom; and that its best reputation is derived from a sacred regard to treaties; we pray you, Representatives of the people, to consult your own fame and our happiness, by a prompt attention to our prayer; we invoke the principles of your revolution, the sacred, self-evident, and eternal truths on which your Governments are founded; we invoke the solemn stipulations of treaty; we invoke our own professions and the glorious example of your fathers, and we adjure you to listen to the one and to follow the other, by abandoning a plan so contradictory to every thing you have said, and they have taught; so fatal to our happiness, and the reputation of your country. To a generous and free people we ought not to urge any motive of interest, when those of honor and duty are so apparent; but be assured that it is the interest of the United States to cultivate a spirit of conciliation with the inhabitants of the territory they have acquired. Annexed to your country by the course of political events, it depends upon you to determine whether we shall pay the cold homage of reluctant subjects, or render the free allegiance of citizens, attached to your fortunes by choice, bound to you by gratitude for the best of blessings, contributing cheerfully to your advancement, to those high destinies to which honor, liberty, and justice, will conduct you, and defending, as we solemnly pledged ourselves to do at the risk of fortune and life, our common constitution, country, and laws.

We, therefore, respectfully pray that so much of the law above mentioned, as provides for the temporary government of this country, as divides it into two Territories, and prohibits the importation of slaves, be repealed.

And that prompt and efficacious measures may be taken to incorporate the inhabitants of Louisiana into the Union of the United States, and admit them to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the citizens thereof.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray for the happiness and prosperity of the United States.

Conformable to the original deposited in the House of Representatives.

P. SAUVE,
L. DERBIGNY,
DESTREHAN.

[The following remonstrance was communicated to the House of Representatives, January 4, 1805.]

To the honorable the Senate, and the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: The remonstrance and petition of the representatives elected by the freemen of their respective districts in the District of Louisiana, humbly show:

That your petitioners, as well as those whom they represent, were filled with the most lively pleasure at the first rumour of the cession of Louisiana to the United States. When it no longer became us to doubt of the event, and when we were informed that Congress were making laws to organize the newly-acquired territory, we experienced emotions of gratitude, and anticipated for ourselves and our posterity all the blessings which result to the people of the United States from the wisdom and magnanimity of an enlightened and free government.

While we were indulging these fond expectations, unmingled with distrust or fear, the act of the last session of your honorable Houses, entitled "An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof," came to our knowledge, and snatched from our eager grasp the anticipated good. The dictates of a foreign Government! an incalculable accession of savage hordes to be vomited on our borders! an entire privation of some of the dearest rights [enjoyed by freemen! These are the leading features of that political system which you have devised for us; for those very men whom in a solemn treaty you had stipulated to call and to treat as fellow-citizens; yet the American colors are hoisted in our garrisons, this far-famed signal of liberty to all to us alone exhibits a gloomy appearance, and makes us more sensible of the immeasurable interval between us and political happiness. May we not be long doomed, like the prisoners of Venice, to read the word LIBERTY on the walls of prisons! We trust to your wisdom and goodness; you are the guardians of our constitutional rights, and we repose our hopes in you as in the sanctuary of honor.

The right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances, is declared and warranted by the first amendment to the constitution. To this constitution we appeal; we learned from you to resist, by lawful means, every attempt to encroach on our rights and liberties; the day we became Americans, we were told that we were associated to a free people. We cannot suppose that the language of men jealous of their freedom can possibly be unwelcome to your ears.

By the third article of the treaty between the United States and the French republic, it is agreed "that the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess."

Your petitioners beg leave to represent to your honorable Houses, that according to the principles contained in the third article of the treaty above quoted, they conceive that had not Congress thought proper to divide Louisiana into two Territories, they should now be entitled by their population to be incorporated in the Union as an independent State.

In the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States, northwest of the river Ohio, article the fifth, it is ordained, "that whenever any of the States to be formed out of the Northwestern Territory shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government, provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity with the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be considered consistent with the general interest of the confederacy such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than sixty thousand." Your petitioners are informed, moreover, that at the time of the admission of the State of Ohio in the Union, said State, conformable to the last clause of the fifth article of the ordinance above quoted, did not contain more than from thirty-three to forty thousand free inhabitants; which proportion, if adhered to in our case, as it seems to us it should have been, the United States having bound themselves by the third article of the treaty above quoted to admit us as soon as possible into the Union, would have given us a right to be immediately incorporated in the Union of the United States.

We find neither in the constitution of the United States, nor in the treaty with the French republic, any provisions by which Congress may have been authorized to make such division.

We find in the treaty nothing but the plain and unequivocal obligation in Congress, to incorporate the ceded territory into the Union of the United States, and admit it as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; but if Congress had a right to divide Louisiana into two Territories last year, they may claim next year the right to divide it into four, into eight Territories. Whenever the population of one of those Territories shall amount to very near the population required by the constitution of the United States, to entitle that Territory to be admitted in the Union as an independent State, Congress may again claim the right to subdivide said Territory. Your petitioners, if the principle should be granted, see no end to the oppression likely to result from such a precedent; and ill-fated Louisiana is condemned to drag along for ages the fetters of an endless territorial infancy, never (to use the expression of one of the most strenuous advocates of American independence,) to be hardened into the bone of manhood.

Under ordinary circumstances, your petitioners would have been disposed to sacrifice some of those rights, secured to them by a solemn treaty, to the convenience of the United States; but the provisory laws enacted by Congress for the district of Louisiana seem to us to be characterised by such an unusual spirit of severity as to oblige your petitioners (if those laws should be enforced) to pray for the unconditional fulfilment of those express engagements contained in the treaty of cession, and for those other benefits to which they are entitled as freemen of the United States. But had not your petitioners the unconditional provisions of a treaty to rest their rights upon, still they might have expected a Government founded on more liberal principles from the representatives of a free people, who, on a great occasion, had previously declared to the world these truths to be self-evident: "That all men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new Government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Little as we are acquainted with the United States, we know by heart your declaration of independence; we recollect the noble deeds of the heroes who bled in your glorious revolution; we are no strangers to the constitution of the United States, and the bills of right, and constitutions of the several States in the Union; and it was upon those highly respectable and absolutely binding authorities, that we had anticipated the blessings of freedom.

In order to enforce their pretensions, your petitioners are sensible that it becomes incumbent on them to submit to your honorable Houses a comparative view of the constitutions enacted by Congress, at different times, for the different Territories, which were erected previously to the erection of the district of Louisiana; from that statement, extracted from your own records, your honorable Houses cannot help being convinced that the act respecting the district of Louisiana alone, instead of the open, disinterested countenance of a fond adoptive mother exhibited to our sister territories, bears the stern, distrustful look of a severe, imperious master; and if your honorable Houses will be so good as to follow your petitioners through this interesting review, you will be fully satisfied that the humble remonstrances of your petitioners rest on the rock of American liberty and independence.

Although your petitioners lament that the principle should now appear consecrated by practice, that governors and judges should, contrary to every principle of liberty, and to the principles of the constitution of the United States, which took care to separate them, unite in their hands the three powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, yet your petitioners would have submitted in silence to whatever had been adopted by Congress, and submitted to by the people. But arbitrary measures without a precedent call loudly for the most energetic remonstrances to your honorable Houses.

By the twelfth section of the act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof, "the Executive power, now vested in the Governor of the Indiana Territory, is to extend to and be exercised in Louisiana." Your petitioners beg leave to state that they have read, with the utmost attention, the laws enacted at different times, for the provisory government of the several Territories of the Union; and that far from observing in those laws any thing like trusting the Governor of a neighboring State or Territory with the government of a newly-erected Territory, they find, on the contrary, that Congress paid the most scrupulous respect to the interest and feelings of the inhabitants by the wisest precautions, in not only obliging the Governor to reside in the Territory which he governs, but also in obliging him to hold a freehold estate in the same Territory. In the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States, north-west of the river Ohio, we find this provision: "Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, that there shall be appointed from time to time by Congress, a Governor whose commission shall continue in force for the term of three years, unless sooner revoked by Congress; he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein in one thousand acres of land, while in the exercise of his office."

In the act authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory we find, "and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to establish therein a Government in all respects similar to that now exercised in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio." And in the act to divide the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, we find: "Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established within the said Territory a Government in all respects similar to that provided by the ordinance of Congress, passed on the 13th day of July, 1787, for the Government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio."

In the act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, the executive power in the district of Orleans is vested in a Governor, who shall reside in the Territory, &c.

Here, then, are the laws of the three Territories, erected previously to the erection of the district of Louisiana, and the laws of the district of Orleans, erected by the very same act. Those laws make it necessary for the Governor, who is liable to be called upon for the discharge of his official duties by every citizen of the Territory, to reside in said Territory. The law with respect to three of those Territories does not stop there. Congress were fully sensible that the inhabitants of those Territories would place more confidence in men who, like the inhabitants themselves, should have a direct interest in the welfare of the country, by their own possessions in it; and to the indispensable condition of residence in the Territory, they made it necessary for the Governor, while in the exercise of his office, to have a freehold estate therein in one thousand acres of land.

The extension of the executive power given to the Governor of the Mississippi Territory over the district of Orleans can hardly be adduced as a precedent; for, ever since the extension of his jurisdiction, the Governor of the Mississippi Territory has habitually resided in the district of Orleans, of which he was Governor in fact; whilst the administration of the Government of the Mississippi Territory was left in the hands of a secretary. But admitting, for argument's sake, that it might be construed into a precedent, your petitioners beg leave to observe to your honorable Houses that the circumstances of the two Territories cannot be compared. There are hardly two hundred and forty miles from Natchez to Orleans. An easy and speedy communication can be had at all times between the two places, both by land and by water. The laws of both Territories may be very similar in many important respects, by which the property of the inhabitants may be affected. Slavery prevails in both Territories. On the contrary, the point of Louisiana nearest to the place where the Governor of the Indiana Territory makes his habitual residence is not less than one hundred and sixty-five miles distant, and there is not a house to be met with on the road; impassable at many seasons of the year, owing to the number of creeks and rivers which sometimes overflow their banks, sometimes are entirely covered with ice; so that we may conclude that, did not justice and sound policy prohibit the alliance in contemplation, nature itself loudly proclaims its impracticability. Your honorable houses may judge at what an immense distance some parts of Louisiana must be from the Governor, to whom an appeal lies in many cases affecting the property and even the life of individuals.

What would it be, if, arriving at Vincennes in those circumstances, an inhabitant of Louisiana was told of His Excellency's being at Detroit, six hundred miles further? Besides, the laws of both Territories must be very dissimilar in a number of respects. Slavery cannot exist in the Indiana Territory, and slavery prevails in Louisiana; and here your petitioners must beg leave to observe to your honorable Houses that they conceive their property of every description has been warranted to them by the treaty between the United States and the French republic. Your petitioners are informed that a law respecting slavery has been passed by Congress for the district of Orleans, similar in many respects to the one formerly made for the Mississippi Territory. Is not the silence of Congress with respect to slavery in this district of Louisiana, and the placing of this district under the Governor of a Territory where slavery is proscribed, calculated to alarm the people with respect to that kind of property, and to create the presumption of a disposition in Congress to abolish at a future day slavery altogether in the district of Louisiana?

The same wise precaution which induced Congress to make the residence of the Governor and the holding of property in the Territory where he exercises his office necessary, extends likewise, in the three Territories erected previously to the erection of the district of Louisiana, to the secretary and judges of the said Territories. In the same third section of the ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, we find, "there shall be appointed, from time to time, by Congress, a secretary, whose commission shall continue in force for four years, unless sooner revoked; he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of his office," &c.

And again, in the same third section, "there shall also be appointed a court, to consist of three judges, any two of whom to form a court, who shall have a common law jurisdiction, and reside in the district, and have each therein a freehold estate in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of their office."

These provisions extend likewise to the Mississippi Territory, as may be seen by a reference to an act authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory; and to the Indiana Territory, as may be seen by a reference to an act of Congress to divide the Territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio into two separate Governments.

Your petitioners cannot consider it as necessary to add any other reasons to those given already, and which appear to them grounded upon justice, in order to determine your honorable Houses immediately to repeal that part of the act providing for the government of the district of Louisiana, which places this district under the administration of the Governor, Secretary, and Judges of the Indiana Territory. To say more on the subject might appear to doubt your disposition to do justice to the request of your petitioners, and to your justice alone they are determined to appeal.

How far the extraordinary measures, contemplated by the fourteenth section of the bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, may, in the opinion of Congress, have been rendered necessary by circumstances, it does not belong to your petitioners to determine. Were those measures only severe, we should oppose to them only the articles of compact between the original States and the people of the Northwestern Territory. Article second of said compact expressly declares: "That in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made, or have force in the said Territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts or engagements, bona fide and without fraud, previously formed."

In the fourth article of the same compact it is provided "That non-resident proprietors shall in no case be taxed higher than residents."

Here Congress not only acknowledge that they have no right to make a law interfering with or affecting private contracts or engagements, bona fide and without fraud, previously formed, but so tender are they of the right of property, that they even go so far as to provide that non-resident proprietors shall in no case be taxed higher than residents.

How different is the condition of the Louisianians! Congress, in the fourteenth section of the act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, seems to acknowledge the validity of some incipient titles to land, for what else can mean these words? "Or to make null and void any bona fide act or proceedings to obtain a grant for lands done by an actual settler, agreeably to the laws, usages, and customs of the Spanish Government." Act or proceedings cannot certainly mean any thing else than the incipient titles of which we are speaking.

Now, suppose such act or proceeding, agreeably to the laws, usages, and customs of Spain, to have actually taken place, three years were granted by the Spanish Government after having obtained a full or incipient grant for making a settlement thereon. There may be, and there are, American emigrants, who, some time previously to the 20th day of December, 1803, may have bought from the original proprietor, or rather holder of that incipient title, his right to said lands. There may be, and there are, some, who have obtained those incipient titles in their own name, and who, ignorant as they must have been of a law not enacted at the time, and taking it for granted that Congress would allow the same space of time which was allowed by the Spanish Government for making a settlement upon lands obtained from the Spanish Government, may have returned to the eastern part of the United States in order to prepare every thing necessary for their removal, and with an intention of coming back to Louisiana in the following spring to settle upon those lands which they had bought bona fide and without fraud. But perhaps Congress, who, in the beginning of the fourteenth section, had declared null and void every act and proceeding subsequent to the treaty of St. Ildefonso, made the 1st day of October, 1800, of whatsoever nature, towards the obtaining any grant, title, or claim to such lands, and under whatever authority transacted or pretended, be, and have been, from the beginning, null, void, and of no effect in law or equity, may insist that since the sovereignty of the lands in Louisiana was vested in the United States, the 1st day of October, 1800, and since, more than three years elapsed from the 1st day of October, 1800, to the 20th day of December, 1803, they have unquestionably a right to expel from the lands they claim any man who, according to the conditions of the Spanish Government, has made no improvement on the lands he might have obtained on the 20th day of December, 1803; and as to Congress being pleased to confirm such in itself an insufficient title to any actual settler, it is a favor which they may or may not grant, without binding themselves to extend it to the representative of the original holder, unless the express condition of an improvement has been fulfilled; but if your honorable Houses give leave to your petitioners to remind you that, by the first article of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, "His Catholic Majesty promises and engages, on his part, to cede to the French republic six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations herein relative to His Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it has now in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it." It will be manifest to your honorable Houses that the King of Spain did not renounce his sovereignty over Louisiana on the 1st day of October, 1800.

At what period of time an absolute renunciation of Louisiana was made by the King of Spain your petitioners cannot ascertain; but they humbly conceive that the sovereignty of the United States in Louisiana did not begin previously to that absolute and unconditional renunciation on the part of the King of Spain.

And if your honorable Houses consider, moreover, that time sufficient must be allowed for the Spanish Government to make known its final treaty with the French republic to its agents in Louisiana, (authorized, your petitioners humbly conceive, to grant lands in its name until they received official notice of the treaty which ceded Louisiana to France,) and that it is not probable that a Government at a considerable distance can be in a greater hurry to take steps by which it divests itself of the sovereignty of a country, than the Government which has just acquired that country, and which is on the spot, has taken to have its sovereignty acknowledged there, and that ten months and ten days elapsed after the treaty between the United States and the French republic before the United States took possession of Louisiana, your honorable Houses must conclude that there may have been grants for lands obtained from the Spanish Government, as to which those who have obtained them may have yet more than one year to comply with the laws, usages, and customs of the Spanish Government. But your petitioners (we mean the few who have any knowledge at all of the law respecting Louisiana, enacted during the last session of your honorable Houses) find themselves placed between the necessity either of not complying with the conditions on which they received lands from the Spanish Government, or of acting in direct contradiction to a law enacted by your honorable Houses; and yet what do those grants amount to which were given since the 1st day of October, 1800? If your honorable Houses will be pleased to call upon your officers in Louisiana for a correct statement of the quantity of land given since that epoch by the officers of the Spanish Government, your honorable Houses will be satisfied that there has been but a very inconsiderable quantity of land thus disposed of, and disposed of chiefly in favor of hard laboring men, who, owing to the various rumors which ran all over the country ever since the cession of France was spoken of, the country belonging sometimes to Spain, sometimes to France, sometimes to the United States, sometimes to Spain again; at an immense distance from every source of information, very often not understanding the language of their neighbors; discouraged at first from exhausting their whole in making improvements on lands to which they had obtained an incipient title, from what they conceived the precariousness of those titles, likely to result from the interference of such, or such a power to which they were told Louisiana belonged; prevented by your law from complying with the conditions of Spain, when they had not it any longer in their power to doubt that the country was ultimately to remain to the United States, and who, at the very moment their confidence had begun to revive, find themselves, whatever they may do, liable to be punished by a free and enlightened nation for having listened to the dictates of prudence and placed confidence in the United States.

Your petitioners beg leave to observe further, that it was only on the 10th day of March, 1804, that the United States took possession of the district of Louisiana; it should seem of course that the inhabitants of Louisiana could not be bound by any law of the United States, previously at least to that epoch: Yet your honorable Houses, by a law approved by the President, on the 26th day of March, 1804, deprive of his property, and if he does persist in his claim after the first day of October next, condemn to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and to suffer an imprisonment not exceeding one year, any man who shall have attempted a settlement on lands to which he may not have obtained as yet a complete title, if he has made or attempted a settlement any time posterior to the 20th day of December, 1803, that is, more than three months before the law which condemns him was enacted; and if your honorable Houses reflect that the act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, is only to take place on the first day of October, 1804, it will result that a man may be guilty by doing an act indifferent in itself, in virtue of a law which is to take place more than nine months subsequently according to the law itself, before the provision of that law can be enforced, and that, too, in the very face of the third article of the ninth section of the constitution of the United States, which declares, "That no bill of attainder, or ex post facto law, shall be passed."

The 15th section of the law erecting Louisiana into two Territories authorizes the President of the United States "to stipulate with any Indian tribes, owning lands on the east side of the Mississippi, and residing thereon, for an exchange of lands, the property of the United States, on the west side of the Mississippi, in case the said tribes shall remove and settle thereon."

Had the United States bound themselves to exterminate from the face of the earth every inhabitant of Louisiana, your petitioners do not conceive, that they could have taken a more effectual step towards the fulfilment of the engagement, than the measures contemplated by the 15th section of the law, respecting the district of Louisiana. But by the treaty with the French republic, the United States have engaged to maintain and protect us in the free enjoyment of our liberty and property. Great God! a colony of Indians to maintain and protect us in our liberties and properties! And we hear, at the same time, that troops have been ordered from some parts of this district of Louisiana; and at this moment, the garrison of New Madrid is reduced (not from death or sickness, from which they have kept entirely free, but in virtue of orders received from the commanding officer at Fort Massac,) to fifteen men. In the mean time, depredations and assassinations by the Indians have already begun: it is not a week since your petitioners received the news, that within forty miles of this place the Indians had wantonly assassinated three men. A week before, we heard of another set, on the river St. Francis, who committed against one of our scattered settlers every sort of depredation; killing his cattle of every description, destroying all his property of every kind, stripping him and all his family entirely naked, and after glutting themselves with what provisions they found in the house throwing all the rest into the fire. What a time have your honorable Houses chosen for the exchange in contemplation! A plan, wearing the most threatening aspect to our lives and properties—a plan not only alarming in its immediate effects, but pregnant with evils of a most dangerous nature in its remote consequences.

Your petitioners humbly conceive, that the tribes of Indians living in your populous States cannot possibly prove, at any time, dangerous to their white inhabitants, principally dispersed and scattered as they are upon an immense, and, in many parts, very thickly inhabited territory: But your honorable Houses must be sensible that it would be far otherwise with respect to any habitual residence those now scattered Indians could make on the west side of the Mississippi. The Indians will be by the measures contemplated connected together, and our white settlers must, for a very considerable time to come, remain dispersed at an immense distance from each other; an easy and defenceless prey to the bloody rage of the merciless tomahawk. Is this protection? Is this justice? Is this equity? Would your honorable Houses acknowledge in all the powers of Europe the right to collect in one body all their convicts, amounting in number (if such a number could be found) to twice or perhaps three times your own population, and to vomit them on your shores? The narrow and limited view of your petitioners does not allow them to see any the least difference between the conduct of the powers of Europe in that case, and your conduct with respect to us; except that in one case the powers of Europe are not bound by any treaty to protect you, and the Government of the United States is bound to protect us. Your petitioners might add that convicts might possibly be reclaimed, but experience teaches us that the Indians, when conscious of their strength, the nearer they approach to civilization the more inclined they feel to resume at the first opportunity their naturally cruel and savage disposition.

Your petitioners do not doubt but that some grand political ends were expected to be answered by the provision in the fifteenth section of the bill, erecting Louisiana into two Territories, but were those ends as advantageous as in the humble opinion of your petitioners they are disastrous—"Nothing," said Aristides to the Athenians, "could be more advantageous than the proposition of Themistocles but nothing could be more unjust." Your honorable Houses are well acquainted with the determination of the Athenian people.

Your petitioners have thus gone through the painful, yet they conceive indispensable task of remonstrating against grievances, in compliance with the duty they owed to their country, to themselves, and to posterity. Your petitioners are sensible that in the discussion of interests of such magnitude, involving their dearest rights, they may perhaps appear to have deviated a little, either in some of their conclusions or expressions, from the respect they never intended to refuse to the highest authority of their country: but let your honorable Houses remember that your petitioners feel themselves injured, deeply injured. Could they tamely submit, could they even represent with more moderation in such a case, you yourselves would not consider them worthy to be admitted into a portion of the inheritance of the heroes who fought and bled for the independence of America.

Your petitioners ask, 1st, For the repeal of the act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof.

2dly. That legal steps should be immediately taken for the permanent division of Louisiana.

3dly. That a Governor, secretary, and judges, should be appointed by the President, who shall reside in the district of Louisiana, and hold property therein to the same amount as is prescribed by the ordinance respecting the Territory northwest of the river Ohio.

4thly. That the Governor, secretary, and judges, to be thus appointed, for the district of Louisiana, should, in preference, be chosen from among those who speak both the English and the French languages.

5thly. That the records of each county, and the proceedings of the courts of justice in the district of Louisiana should be kept, and had in both the English and French languages, as it is the case in a neighboring country, under a monarchical Government, and acquired by conquest.

6thly. That supposing the district of Louisiana to be divided into five counties, ten members, two from each county, shall be elected by the people having a right to vote in each county, according to the rules prescribed by the ordinance respecting the Northwestern Territory every two years, or such another number as Congress may appoint, which said members shall, jointly with the Governor, form the legislative council of said district of Louisiana.

7thly. That Congress would acknowledge the principle of our being entitled, in virtue of the treaty, to the free possession of our slaves, and to the right of importing slaves into the district of Louisiana, under such restrictions as to Congress in their wisdom will appear necessary.

8thly. That Congress, taking into consideration the distance at which we live from the seat of the General Government, which does not allow the General Government to be informed with respect to the true interest of this country but through the agents of that same Government, Congress should enact a law authorizing this district of Louisiana to send an agent or delegate to Congress, whose powers as to speaking and voting in the House Congress may circumscribe as to them may seem proper.

9thly. That funds should be appropriated for the support, and lands set apart or bought for the building and maintaining of a French and English school in each county, and for the building of a seminary of learning, where not only the French and English languages, but likewise the dead languages, mathematics, mechanics, natural and moral philosophy, and the principles of the constitution of the United States should be taught. Independent of the obligation of spreading knowledge, upon which alone a free Government can stand in a country till now unacquainted with your laws and language, a powerful additional interest will result, in the opinion of Congress, from the teaching principally of mathematics and natural philosophy, when your honorable Houses reflect that Louisiana abounds with mines of every description, which can never be worked to any advantage without the powerful engines supplied by these two sciences.

10thly. That every private engagement, conformable to the laws of Spain, entered into during the time Louisiana was ruled by the laws of Spain, shall be maintained.

11thly. That any judgment which was considered as final, according to the Spanish law, shall not be revised by any of the tribunals to be established in Louisiana by the United States.

12thly. That any judgment from which an appeal might be had, according to the Spanish law, to any superior tribunal, may be appealed from to a tribunal of equal dignity within this Territory, or the United States, and that a final judgment be had, conformably to the laws of Louisiana, at the time the suits were first brought into court.

And now your petitioners trust their remonstrances and petition to the justice of your honorable Houses, and they do not entertain the least doubt but that a nation, who, in their declaration of independence, has proclaimed that the governors were intended for the governed, and not the governed for the governors; a nation who complained so loudly of their right of representation, a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants, only being violated; a nation who presented it to the world, as one of their reasons of separation from England, that the King of England had endeavored to prevent the population of their States; a nation who waged war against her mother country for imposing taxes on them without their consent; a nation who styles the Indians "the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions," will not be deaf to their just complaints; and, by redressing their grievances, will deserve forever the most unbounded affection of the inhabitants of this district of Louisiana.

Elated with these hopes, your petitioners conceive, that they cannot end their present remonstrance and petition in a more suitable manner than by renewing to you the oath they had administered to them on the first day of their meeting together in General Assembly, by the first civil commandant of this district of Louisiana.

And we all swear "to be faithful to the United States, to maintain with all our power the constitution of the United States, and to obey the laws made and to be made by Congress for the district of Louisiana."

Signed at St. Louis, the twenty-ninth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the American independence the twenty-ninth.

[2d Session.]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 22, 1805.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: The memorial of delegates appointed by various sections of the District of Columbia respectfully represents:

That their constituents, at the commencement of the present session, with a view to ascertain the general opinion on such objects as might require the interposition of Congress, and which, by being presented in one view, might supersede numerous petitions on subordinate points, so apt to distract the attention and unnecessarily consume time claimed by national concerns, empowered your memorialists to take into consideration the situation of the District, and submit whatever, in their opinion, its welfare required.

Your memorialists accordingly met at an early period and made considerable progress in the business confided to them, when their deliberations were arrested by the propositions offered for a re-session of the District. As soon as a decision was made upon them your memorialists resumed their sittings, and now embrace the earliest opportunity in their power of inviting the attention of the Legislature to the results of their deliberations. In submitting these they beg leave to state that they have refrained from noticing any objects, an attention to which is not, at the present time, of indispensable importance to the interests of the District.

The object which, from its superior interest, first engaged their attention, is the administration of justice. By a recurrence to the laws of Congress it appears that, in organizing the judiciary system of the United States, fees were allowed to the officers of the courts established in the respective States equal to those allowed in the supreme courts thereof, with an addition of one-third, together with other emoluments. The reason of this liberal allowance was doubtless the high grade of suits generally carried before those tribunals, and the great extent of country they embraced. When Congress assumed jurisdiction over this small Territory, the same fees, it is presumed from inadvertence, were allowed to the officers of the circuit court of the District of Columbia as those allowed in the other circuits. Previous to this time, that portion of the District, which at present forms the county of Washington, was charged with fees similar in amount to those paid in the county courts of Maryland; and that portion, which now forms the county of Alexandria, was charged with the same fees as those paid in the county courts of Virginia. By this provision the fees have been increased in some instances to double, and in other instances to three times the amount paid under the States to which the portions of the District were attached. Local and peculiar circumstances, so far from creating any reason for this augmentation, strongly enforce a diminution. Among these are:

The small size of the District;

Its compact population;

The increased number of suits before the circuit court from the extension of its cognizance to controversies for sums exceeding twenty dollars, the greater part of which arise between tradesmen and mechanics in moderate circumstances.

Without going into detail, it may be proper to state, that, where the defendant immediately on being served with writ satisfies the demand against him, the costs are seldom less than ten dollars; that, in a suit where the debt is not contested, but which is carried into court solely for delay, the costs amount to thirty-three dollars, even in cases where the debt does not exceed twenty-one dollars. In the case of an appeal from the decision of a magistrate on a demand of thirteen dollars, which was reversed by the court, the costs incurred by the defendant amounted to about one hundred and thirty dollars, nearly one-third of which was in compensation to witnesses.

Your memorialists need scarcely, after the statement of these facts, and the mass of corroborating facts herewith submitted, say, that the existing system presses with a weight upon the District that threatens in a short time to destroy the industry of the honest citizen or drive him from it. In order to remove these evils, your memorialists pray a reduction of the fees of the officers of the circuit court, in the county of Washington, to the rates payable to the officers of the county courts of Montgomery and Prince George's, in the State of Maryland, at the time of the assumption of the jurisdiction by Congress; and of those of the officers of the circuit court in the county of Alexandria to the rates payable to the officers of the county court of Fairfax, in the State of Virginia, at the same period.

It is respectfully submitted whether the impartial administration of justice does not require the repeal of so much of the act of Congress, entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, an act concerning the District of Columbia," as repeals the act providing for the compensation of the justices of the peace thereby created; and as directs execution on magistrates' judgments to issue from the clerk's office, and allows him a compensation therefor; and likewise so much thereof as relates to the compensation of jurors in the county of Washington; which repeal, your memorialists have no hesitation in saying, will give general satisfaction to their constituents.

Experience having proved the existence of various defects in the militia system, it is recommended as the means of obviating them, and of rendering the system more acceptable to the inhabitants of the District, that it be so altered as to reduce the number of musters from eight, as now directed to be held, to five; that is, three musters in company, one in battalion, and one in legion; to reduce the number of courts for assessing fines from six, as now directed to be held, to four; that is, two battalion and two legionary courts; to make the persons of delinquents liable to arrest and imprisonment, not exceeding twenty-four hours, for each day's non-attendance, where property is not shown whereon to assess the fines; and to devolve the collection of fines on the marshal of the District, as practised in the first instance, instead of collectors appointed by military courts, as is now the case.

Your memorialists further request that validity may be given in the District of Columbia to letters testamentary and of administration, granted in any part of the United States, in which the testator or intestate resided at the time of his death; and that owners of slaves residing within the District may be permitted to remove them from time to time from one county thereof to the other, without incurring any penalty or forfeiture.

Inconveniences having arisen from the want of competent authority, to lay out and keep in repair roads within the county of Washington, it is requested that adequate provision be made for this interesting object.

Your memorialists are duly impressed with the lateness of the period of their application, and its possible interference with an attention to objects under the consideration of Congress; but they are likewise impressed with a belief that a sincere disposition exists to promote the general interests of the District, and so far as they can be ascertained, to consult the wishes of its inhabitants; having, however, made no request, not dictated by considerations of great weight, and justified by a regard for the interest of their constituents, they entertain the hope that their representation will obtain the early attention of Congress.

JANUARY 18, 1805.

C. CONINGHAM, President,
N. KING, Secretary.

The committee appointed on the 19th November, 1804, to whom was referred a resolution directing certain inquiries to be made respecting the administration of law, and the fees allowed to the officers of the district court, offer the following report as the result of their labors:

They have, from Herty's Digest of the Laws of Maryland, ascertained the fees payable to the clerks of the county courts of the State, and reduced them from tobacco to the currency of the United States, (in paper marked A.)

They have, also, from the same source obtained the fees payable to the sheriffs in Maryland, in the money of the United States, (in paper marked B.)

They have, from the law of Congress, chap. 125, sec. 1, passed on the 28th February, 1799, made an extract, (C.) of the fees allowed to the marshal; which they have also entered in paper B, for the purpose of making the comparison between them, and the fees received by the sheriffs of Maryland for similar services.

They have from the same law, ascertained the fees of the clerk of the district court, (in extract D.) These are entered, where for similar services, in the paper A, for the purpose of comparing the compensation of clerk of the district court with the clerks of the county courts of Maryland.

The paper marked E shows the number of suits on the docket, at each court or term since the establishment of the county court for the county of Washington; from this it will appear that at the three courts holden in 1801, quarter yearly, there were 763 appearances, 384 imparlances, 193 trials, 8 appeals, and 71 criminal cases. At the three courts held in 1802, two of which were quarter yearly, and the third six months thereafter, there were 1,119 appearances, 657 imparlances, 746 trials, 23 appeals, and 96 criminal cases. At the two half-yearly courts holden in 1803, there were 880 appearances, 723 imparlances, 462 trials, 17 appeals, and 93 criminal cases. That at the July term in 1804, there were 467 appearances, 316 imparlances, 267 trials, 7 appeals, and 65 criminal cases.

Desirable as it is your committee cannot obtain "the nature and amount of those suits, with the expenses attending them, and the sums recovered," without paying a large sum in fees to the clerk of the court for searches, &c. or they would willingly have taken on themselves the labor of extracting all the information which the documents would afford. Nor can they, from the same causes, obtain the facts relative to cases of insolvency, and which might throw light upon their causes, and show how far it is through the instrumentality of the judiciary establishment of the District that they occur.

The number of criminal cases which appear on the docket may be averaged at about ninety in each year, but the committee have not been able to ascertain the amount of fines imposed.

The marshal has been obliging enough to furnish the committee with (F) the amount of compensation paid to grand and petit jurors at March term, 1802; it being $711 75 cents. One of the committee being referred to the marshal's office, from the clerk's, for this information, took the liberty of asking other information at the same time, which it was supposed might be obtained from that source (G.) The application was made to the deputy marshal at the office, as accident rather than design had led him there. Although unable to obtain the facts wanted, the committee believe the disposition lay with the marshal and deputy, to furnish any information in their possession; but not having complete returns of fees, judgments, &c. in the office, they could not satisfy the inquiries of the committee.

From a professional gentleman your committee have obtained the following information on the subject of uncontested claims: "That where the defendant is served with a writ, provided he immediately pays the debt, the costs are seldom less than ten dollars." And that the expenses attendant on a suit in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, in Washington county, on a debt of twenty-one dollars, where the defendant does not deny it, but only wishes to obtain time by carrying it into court, are nearly as follows: The plaintiff's costs, seventeen dollars sixteen cents, and the defendant's, seven dollars thirty-seven cents, being twenty-four dollars and fifty-three cents incurred to the time of judgment. On execution issuing to the clerk and marshal for issuing, poundage, serving feri facias, swearing appraisers, &c., a further expense of about seven dollars ninety-seven cents will be incurred; making, in all, the sum payable by the defendant to be about fifty-four dollars and forty-nine cents, instead of the original debt of twenty-one dollars! (I.)

The committee have not succeeded in their endeavor to ascertain the expense of a suit where an average number of witnesses were summoned, and the proceedings are protracted by appeal, delay, &c., but as an illustration of the effect of these principles, in a case not pursued to the extremity, they refer to the statement H, given by a citizen of Washington, of the expense he was involved in, by defending himself against what he considered as a gross imposition, and where he was supported in the belief by a previous adjudication. A claim of thirteen dollars was tried before a magistrate, and judgment given in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff by appeal carried the cause into court; about four witnesses were examined; the judges determined on the appeal, reversed the decision of the magistrate, and the defendant had to pay about one hundred and thirty dollars.

At the first establishment of the court, the legal appearance fee of an attorney was fixed at ten dollars. This was, however, at one of the succeeding terms reduced to six dollars and sixty-seven cents, at which sum it now stands.

On reviewing the information thus obtained, it has suggested certain observations, which the committee deem it proper to submit to the consideration of the delegation. The sudden transition from the economical county courts of the State of Maryland to the more dignified judiciary system given to the District, however flattering to our vanity, is not calculated to give satisfaction to those whom necessity impels into its vortex, or who take into view our real situation. For notwithstanding the per diem allowance to the marshal, and the clerk of the court, we find their fees vastly more than the State officers received. By a comparison of the fees allowed to our federal officers, with those paid to the officers of the county courts of Maryland, it appears that the clerk of the court receives about two hundred and fifty per cent. advance; and the marshal's fees are nearly double what the sheriff of Maryland used to receive. This great increase of compensation can scarcely have been dictated by considerations of our local situation, for, in a district only ten miles square, and where the population is more collected than usual in counties of a State, it cannot be supposed that additional labor would be imposed on the clerk, or on the marshal in the discharge of his duty; the reason of the case seems to point to a contrary conclusion. The circumstance of this District being established as the seat of the General Government, must increase its population by the removal of strangers into it, many of whom will be tradesmen and mechanics, whose small debts will constitute a large proportion of the business of the courts, and on whom this increase of expense in prosecuting their claims must operate with peculiar hardship. If, on the other hand, these fees were given under the expectation, that from the smallness of the counties in the District few suits would be instituted, and that the compensation of the officers ought therefore to be increased to enable them to live, the result seems to show that expectation was erroneous; as, either from the extension of the jurisdiction to sums of twenty dollars, or the description of the inhabitants, the Washington county docket must afford a reasonable portion of business.

The great labor, and perhaps impossibility of procuring all the facts relative to the expense of prosecuting, and the amount recovered, has prevented the committee from obtaining an accurate statement; yet from the docket out of the sight of the marshal and his deputies during the morning of the day when they ought to be attending to their business, lest they be summoned on the jury for the day: and the marshal is obliged to take those whom chance or design has thrown in his way; and they are sometimes travellers, strangers to our habits, our manners, and our laws; who serving against their will may be more anxious to be discharged than solicitous to do justice.

The inconveniences felt from the operation of that portion of the law which prohibits imprisonment for debts under twenty dollars, arise in a great measure from our peculiar local situation. Subject to an influx of strangers by the buildings going on, and the vessels of the United States discharging their seamen in this city, debts of this description to a very considerable amount are contracted by single men with our citizens: many of these contemplating but a transitory residence, and finding the operation of this law, have the dishonesty to avail themselves of it, although they possess sufficient to discharge their debts; and instances of this kind of robbery, aggravated by insult, are not infrequent. Enemies as your committee are to every thing tyrannical in the execution of the law, they are induced to believe, that the effect of this indulgence is neither favorable to humanity nor justice; that it is more an introduction to dishonesty than a provision of humanity in favor of the unfortunate: for few indeed have been the instances of committing a father of a family to prison for a small debt. The law, however, now favors the idle vagabond, shakes the confidence which ought to exist among our citizens, and in many instances is supposed to prevent that lenity and indulgence to the unfortunate, and those having families, which they formerly received. When the confidence of the citizen has been several times abused, he will of necessity withdraw it from others, and the innocent will suffer from the injustice of the depraved.

The committee, therefore, recommend the passing of the following resolution, as declaratory of the sense of the delegation on the subject of the foregoing report:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the delegates of the district of Columbia the repeal of so much of the act of Congress, entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, An act concerning the District of Columbia, as repeals the law providing for the compensation of justices of the peace thereby created," would be just, proper, and beneficial to the county of Washington; as would also, the repeal of so much of the fourth section of said act as directs executions on magistrates' warrants to issue from the clerk's office, and allows the clerk a fee therefor.

DANIEL REINTZEL,
NICHOLAS KING.

The above table of the fees of the clerk of the county courts of Maryland is taken from Herty's Digest of the Laws, and the tobacco fees there allowed are reduced into cents, or the currency of the United States. The corresponding fees of the clerk of the district court of Columbia are taken from the fee-bill of the general court of Maryland in the same work, and one-third added thereto, agreeably to the law fixing the fees of the officers of the district courts of the United States. These are also reduced from tobacco, as kept in Maryland, to the currency of the United States, as more familiar to citizens of other States. The amount of each column is taken as a mean of comparison of the fees paid to the clerk while we remained subjected to Maryland, with those now imposed by the United States, making about 250 per cent. advance.

By the act of Congress fixing the fees, passed the 28th February, 1799, an additional compensation of five dollars a day during the courts, and ten cents a mile travelling to them from his residence is allowed.

The fees in the foregoing table are all reduced from tobacco into the currency of the United States. From this it will appear that in those cases where the marshal's fees differ from the sheriff's, they are nearly doubled, and that they are what constitutes the principal duties of his office; and that the marshal has, in addition, five dollars per day for attending court, and four dollars for summoning the grand jury.

These fees are from Herty's Digest of the Laws of Maryland and the United States.

Thaddy Hogan sued for the loan of a bed, while it was held for the marshal, who had attached it in consequence of judgment against Hogan. Hogan's claim was about thirteen dollars; brought before a magistrate, who gave judgment against Hogan. Hogan carried it into the court by appeal, where the judges reversed the judgment of the magistrate, and Rhodes had to pay about one hundred and thirty dollars.

Determined in July, 1803.

The above statement was made by William Rhodes to N. King, for the purpose of being laid before the delegation, on Monday, 26th November, 1804.

Copy of presentment by grand jury, July term 1804.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, }
County of Washington, } July term, 1804.

We, the grand inquest of the United States for the district and county aforesaid, do on our oaths present as a grievance, so much of the act of Congress, entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, an act" entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia," as goes to repeal certain parts of two acts of Congress, whereby compensation was allowed to justices of the peace and to jurors.

We also present, as a further grievance, the exorbitant fees allowed to the attorney general, the gentlemen of the bar, the marshal and the clerk as practised in the circuit court of said county.

The above presentment is founded on the inconsistency of requiring services of one description of persons without compensation and providing for others so liberally, as to be productive of serious injury and evil to a considerable portion of the community.

We further present as a grievance, so much of the act of Congress, as exempts the persons of debtors for sums not exceeding twenty dollars from imprisonment, and the method now exercised of summoning daily petit jurors.

It is respectfully solicited that the honorable court will order the above presentment to be published in the city and Georgetown newspapers, and also to have the same laid before Congress at their next session.

[2d SESSION.]

EXTENSION OF PATENT AND COPY RIGHTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 22D OF JANUARY, 1805.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of Oliver Evans, of the city of Philadelphia, submitted the following report:

The petitioner has invented many useful improvements on merchant flour mills, for which he obtained a patent, dated January 7, 1791. This patent expired on the 7th of the present month. He states that he has also made several valuable improvements on steam engines, explanations and drawings of which have been exhibited to the committee. The petitioner represents, that, owing to the great extent of the United States, and the difficulties usually attending the introduction of improvements in new countries, he has not yet been able to collect any considerable sums from his patent; and having found it necessary to impose on himself a condition not to expend in new inventions and discoveries any more than the nett profits derived from old ones, he finds himself compelled to ask for the extension of his patent right for the improvement in merchant flour mills, with a view that he may appropriate the proceeds towards completing his further inventions on steam engines, which (in his opinion) are, in their operation, from five to ten times more powerful than any others heretofore invented, in proportion to size and weight; and he avers that he has conceived still greater improvements on steam engines, (which he has not yet put in practice,) to lessen their expense, and cause them to last longer, increase their power, and diminish the consumption of fuel to about one-fourth part.

The petitioner appears to possess a mind capable of conceiving, and a strong propensity for making, new discoveries and inventions, and the greater part of his life seems to have been devoted to improvements in labor-saving machines; and, if he could be encouraged to persevere, it is highly probable his discoveries may be rendered useful to his country, and, at the same time, profitable and honorable to himself.

He is desirous that his patent may be extended for the term of seven years, without injuring those who have already purchased the right of using it; and, if this privilege could be granted, he is convinced that it would enable him to complete his other valuable discoveries, which otherwise, he apprehends, from the great expense attending them, he may be obliged to abandon or at least to delay their completion for several years.

The committee have been favorably impressed with the representations made to them by the petitioner, and would venture to recommend that his patent right for the improvement on merchant flour mills be extended seven years from the 7th instant. At the same time, the committee are aware (should the petitioner obtain the extension of his patent) that numerous applications will be made to Congress by other patentees for the same indulgence, and as the authors of books, maps, and charts are allowed to renew their patents for the further term of fourteen years, and seeing no objection to a general provision calculated to meet the reasonable requests of persons who have made very valuable or important discoveries, they ask leave to report a bill on the subject.

REVISION OF THE POLITICAL SYSTEM ADOPTED FOR LOUISIANA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 25, 1805.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of sundry planters, merchants, and other inhabitants of Louisiana,* made the following report:

The grievances which have been felt by the memorialists are of a nature which your committee believe to be inseparable from those sudden transitions of Government to which late political events have subjected the inhabitants of Louisiana. By them, however, they are ascribed to a denial, on the part of the United States, of those rights and immunities to which they declare themselves entitled, in virtue of the third article of the treaty which transferred them to our dominion, and to the immediate enjoyment of which they now claim to be admitted. It is only under the torture, that this article of the treaty of Paris can be made to speak the language ascribed to it by the memorialists, or countenance for a moment that charge of breach of faith, which they have conceived themselves justified in exhibiting against the Government. By that article it is stipulated that "the inhabitants of the ceded Territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

"They shall be incorporated into the Union, and admitted—to what? To the enjoyment of all the rights, &c., of American citizens. When? As soon as it can be done in conformity with the principles of the federal constitution; meanwhile they are to be protected, &c."

Could any doubt be excited of the soundness of this construction of the English context, it would be instantly dissipated by a recurrence to its counterpart in the French language,† if the manifest absurdity of the concluding words of the article, which would result from an opposite interpretation, should fail to remove it. For what necessity could exist for a provision securing to the inhabitants of Louisiana the temporary enjoyment of certain minor privileges, when their immediate admission to all the rights of American citizens was one of the conditions on which their country was transferred to the United States by France? Whether the words "as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution," be understood to refer to any change, which, in conformity with its own principles, might at some future period be made in that instrument, or to that provision of the constitution which requires the rule of naturalization to be uniform, they are equally fatal to the claim urged by the memorialists of their right to an immediate participation of those benefits which they cannot possess in their full extent, until admitted to their enjoyment by the principles of the constitution. The imputation, therefore, of a want of good faith in the Government of the United States is not more unsupported by the language of the third article of the treaty of Paris than it is repugnant to the uniform tenor of the American character, from the commencement of the national existence.

But because the memorialists may have appreciated too highly the rights which have been secured to them by the treaty of cession, the claims of the people of Louisiana on the wisdom and justice of Congress ought not (in the opinion of your committee) to be thereby prejudiced. Relying on the good sense of that people to point out to them, that the United States cannot have incurred a heavy debt in order to obtain the Territory of Louisiana merely with a view to the exclusive or especial benefit of its inhabitants, your committee at the same time earnestly recommend that every indulgence, not incompatible with the interests of the Union, may be extended to them. Only two modes present themselves, whereby a dependent province may be held in obedience to its sovereign state—force and affection. The first of these is not only repugnant to all our principles and institutions of Government, but it could not be more odious to those on whom it might operate, than it would be hostile to the best interests, as well as the dearest predilections, of those by whom, in this instance, it would have to be exercised. The United States are not the property of an hereditary despot, or the rich prize of a military adventurer, whose favorites and followers may batten on the spoil of plundered provinces won by the blood and treasure of their exhausted subjects, but they form the patrimony of a free and enlightened people, who control, while they constitute the only fund from which the men and the money of which military power is composed can be drawn. It can never be the interest, therefore, of the people of the United States to subject themselves to the burthens, and their liberties to the dangers, of a vast military force, for the subjugation of others. The only alternative, then, which presents itself, is believed to be not more congenial to the feelings, than to the best interests of the Union. So long as their authority pervades the Territory of Louisiana, so long as their laws are respected and obeyed therein, your committee are at a loss to conceive how the United States are more interested in the internal government of that Territory than of any State in the Confederacy. By permitting her inhabitants to form their own regulations, the voice of discontent would be hushed, faction (if it exist) disarmed, and the people bound to us by the strong ties of gratitude and interest. The spirit of disaffection, should it be excited at any future period by ambitious and unprincipled men, would be in direct hostility to the obvious interests of the people of Louisiana, whilst the ability of the Union to repress it would remain unimpaired.

In considering this subject, the committee have not been inattentive to those forms of provincial government which have heretofore obtained in the remote territories of the United States. But they have found nothing in them worthy of imitation. The second grade, as it is termed, is of the two less liable to objection, but there are many of its features which they are unable to recommend. Their object is to give to Louisiana a government of its own choice, administered by officers of its own appointment. In recommending the extension of this privilege to the people of that country, it is not the intention of the committee that it should be unaccompanied by wise and salutary restrictions. Among them may be numbered a prohibition of the importation of foreign slaves, a measure equally dictated by humanity and policy; restrictions against the establishment of any form of Government, other than a representative republic; against violations of the liberty of conscience, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury; against the taxation of the lands of the United States; to which may be added (for further security) that such of the laws as may be disapproved by Congress, within a limited time after their passage, shall be of no force and effect. These, however, are objects which may be embraced in any bill which the wisdom of the Legislature may see fit to pass upon the subject. They will be proper subjects of consideration after the determination of the principal question, the extension of self-government to the people of Louisiana. Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for extending to the inhabitants of Louisiana the right of self-government.

[The following paper was subsequently presented to the House by the committee.]

After having considered with respectful attention the observations of the committee on the third article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, we avail ourselves of the permission they have given us, to make such remarks as we conceive may be of some use towards the elucidation of the question on which is principally founded the claim of our constituents.

We have diligently and carefully examined the articles of the constitution of the United States, which have been pointed to us as having more or less relation to the present subject.

The first is the article which speaks in a direct and unquestionable manner of the admission of new States into the Union, in these words: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, &c." This article, the only one which expresses a clause respecting the admission of new States, makes no kind of restriction which can be applicable to Louisiana, and so far we find nothing that can prevent its incorporation.

The next article which has been quoted to us establishes the power of Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States. This, we humbly conceive, has no relation whatever with the situation of the inhabitants of Louisiana, and is evidently relative only to the disposal and management of the property of the United States.

Subsequently, it has been suggested that certain rules and regulations established in the year 1787, respecting the Territory northwest of the Ohio, are applicable to us because they are considered as a part of the constitutional laws, and, consequently, must be observed with respect to Louisiana, which is to be admitted into the Union according to the principles of the constitution.

This observation leads to two queries: First, Is the ordinance of 1787 to be considered as a part of the principles of the constitution? Second, Is it applicable to Louisiana?

Without questioning whether the ordinance of 1787 ought to be considered as an integral part of the rules established by the constitution, though it appears to us extremely doubtful, we beg leave to say that it cannot be ranked among the principles of the constitution. The principles of the constitution we humbly conceive to be the fundamental laws common to all the members of the federation. This is only a local regulation, which far from having any thing to do with the principles of the constitution, has been made, on the contrary, for those who could not enjoy yet the rights secured by the principles of the constitution.

But in whatever light that ordinance may be considered, it can by no means be applicable to Louisiana. It is clearly and unquestionably limited to the Territory northwest of the Ohio; and unless it should have been stipulated afterwards in the constitution that that regulation would be applicable to any other Territory thereafter to be acquired, it must have remained a local and private rule.

On the other hand, we do not conceive what similitude can be found between our country and those territories. The Territory northwest of the Ohio, acquired by the right of war, was a vast desert almost without any inhabitants, and was the absolute property of the United States. There was no compact, no contract of any kind stipulated by any nations in favor of any population. The United States, being bound by no stipulation whatever, were at full liberty to make such government as they thought fit for that Territory. But the case of Louisiana is evidently different. It is a country which contains already a numerous population established in it since nearly one hundred years. It becomes a part of the United States by a solemn treaty, containing a positive clause in favor of its inhabitants. Now, to pretend that this engagement goes no further than applying to them the ordinances made for territories, in favor of which no stipulation existed, would be, we conceive, reducing to nothing the third article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana. That article does not stipulate that the inhabitants of the ceded Territory shall be admitted into the Union according to the acts made by Congress to regulate the rights of the inhabitants of the Territory northwest of the Ohio; it expresses, on the contrary, that the Louisianians shall be incorporated into the Union according to the principles (the elemental laws) of the constitution. It is, therefore, in the constitution that we must look to find on what principles the Louisianians are to be incorporated in.

Other remarks have been made by the committee tending to show that the incorporation of the inhabitants of Louisiana into the Union cannot be executed without the consent of three-fourths of the several States. Without pretending to enter into any discussion upon subjects of that magnitude, the consideration of which appertains exclusively to the sovereign body of Congress, we will take the liberty to suggest respectfully that the treaty stipulates our incorporation into the Union, that the United States have accepted that condition, and that to place it, at the present period, in the power of the individual States to refuse that incorporation, would be exposing the Federal Government to the danger of not fulfilling their promise.

After having briefly stated the principal remarks which have occurred to our memory respecting the suggestions of the committee, we beg leave to present, with all due deference and respect, our own interpretation of the third article of the treaty of cession of our country.

We consider, in the first place, that the clause, which is the ground of our claim, is a stipulation made expressly in favor of the inhabitants of Louisiana then existing, because the French Government had no right to stipulate the incorporation of the future citizens of Louisiana. We think that the words "as soon as possible, according to the principles of the constitution," evidently express that this incorporation is to be executed without any unnecessary delay, and that it is to take place on the same principles by which the constitution has regulated the rights of the individual States, and of the citizens of the United States, in relation to the federal compact. We humbly think that any interpretation tending to procrastinate the incorporation of the present inhabitants of Louisiana into the Union is directly opposite to the spirit of the third article of cession of our country, the object of which is unquestionably to secure that advantage to the inhabitants who are annexed to the United States by that treaty; that, consequently, any condition depending on future circumstances ought to be inadmissible, because it would expose the inhabitants, who existed in Louisiana when the treaty was made, to be kept out of the enjoyment of rights which have been stipulated for them.

Such is our opinion which we respectfully submit to the committee, praying them to accept our thanks for the permission they have given us to express our sentiments on the subject, and to make some allowance for the disadvantage under which we labor to express them in a language which is not altogether familiar to us.

CANAL FROM THE HEAD TO THE FOOT OF THE RAPIDS OF THE OHIO RIVER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 23, 1805.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 28, 1805.

Mr. DAYTON, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Benjamin Hovey, in behalf of himself and his associates, reported:

That it appears from the representation of the said memorialists, that they have formed an association for commencing, and so far as in their power for completing, a work of no less magnitude than that of opening a passage for vessels of burden from the head to the foot of the rapids of the Ohio river, by a canal and locks on the west side thereof; and their prayer is, that Congress would be pleased to afford them such aid and encouragement as may be deemed commensurate to the undertaking, either by a donation of twenty-five thousand acres of land, or the privilege of a right of pre-emption to one hundred thousand acres, to be located in four several tracts within the Indiana Territory, at the same prices for which the other lands of the United States are sold, but upon more liberal terms of credit, and without demand of interest. Your committee, all of whom have personally visited, and paid some attention formerly to this difficult and dangerous part of the navigation of the Ohio, impressed with a belief of the practicability of the undertaking, of its vast benefit and importance to our whole country, especially to that part of it which is connected with the western waters, and that it must necessarily enhance the value, and greatly increase the sales of the public lands, feel no hesitation in recommending a compliance with the request of the memorialists, by either making to them a gratuitous donation, or granting a right of pre-emption on the terms and to the extent prayed for. As, however, these associates, although believed to be highly respectable in point of numbers, character, and property, have not yet been regularly organized and incorporated, your committee forbear to offer any specific proposition upon the subject, as the foundation of an act of the Legislature, believing that such a measure would be premature and improper, until those necessary preliminary steps have been taken by the memorialist and those who are or may be associated with him.

APPLICATION FOR EXTENDING THE JURISDICTION OF THE CIRCUIT COURTS IN FAVOR OF ALIENS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 31, 1805.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry British merchants and others, subjects of his Britannic majesty, submitted the following report:

The object of this petition is to procure an act for extending the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, so that the said courts shall have cognizance of "all cases arising under treaties," and of controversies in which an alien is a party, without restriction as to sum, though the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, should be under the sum or value of five hundred dollars; or that some other competent tribunal, to take cognizance of such causes, be established under the authority of the United States.

The petitioners ground their application to the Legislature on the following authorities, viz:

The second section of the third article of the constitution of the United States, which establishes the judicial power of the United States.

The fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace between the United States and his Britannic majesty, wherein "it is agreed that creditors on either side shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money, of all bona fide debts heretofore contracted;" and,

The second article of the convention, made the 8th day of January, 1802, which recognizes and confirms the said fourth article of the definitive treaty.

As reasons for making this application, in support of which they have presented a view of the section of the constitution and the articles of the treaty and convention, which have been recited, the petitioners alleged "that a number of small debts are due from individuals, widely dispersed throughout the State of Virginia, to British creditors, contracted before the peace of 1783, and that for want of a tribunal, whose jurisdiction shall embrace debts of a smaller magnitude than five hundred dollars, they and their agents are exposed to much trouble, incur a heavy expense, and frequently with the eventual and entire loss of debts, supported by such documents and principles as have, in a number of similar cases, insured them a recovery in the federal circuit court. That the inferior and some of the superior courts of the commonwealth are not influenced by any uniform course of decision, so that claims resting upon precisely the same principles of law and evidence receive different decisions in the different courts; and that these courts do not in practice respect the decisions of the circuit court and the Supreme Court of the United States, on the construction of the said fourth article of the British treaty, in relation to British debts."

The committee deem it their duty, first to consider, whether such a provision, as that which is solicited by the petitioners, be expedient and proper, as a general regulation, before they inquire how far the special cases alluded to in the petition have a claim to the measure. As connected with this view of the subject, a principle of the federal constitution presents itself, which is believed to merit serious attention. It is to be remarked that in the formation of this constitution, it appears to have been a fundamental principle of great and leading influence, that the powers of the General Government should be so apportioned as not to produce any unnecessary diminution in the powers of the State Governments. In conformity with this principle, the powers originally appertaining to those Governments are left in their possession, except those, by the exercise of which the general purposes of the Union might be contravened; they are therefore delegated to the Federal Government. This principle strongly characterizes the distribution of the legislative power, and it is to be traced in that part of the constitution which prescribes the limits of judicial power; although, in assigning to that power the objects of its jurisdiction, the principle does not operate so extensively as it does in assigning to the legislative power the objects of its jurisdiction. We find that the judicial power does not extend to controversies between citizens of the same State, except in the particular cases where lands are claimed under grants of different States, and obvious is the reason. The State courts, as they always were, so are they still equally competent to the cognizance of, and a due administration of justice in all such cases, while they are more convenient to the parties litigant. A transfer of jurisdiction to the federal courts in these cases would unnecessarily diminish the authority of the States, and is not necessary to the purposes of the Union; it remains, therefore, exclusively vested in the State courts. We find that the power does not extend to controversies between citizens of different States; but here the jurisdiction is not exclusively vested in the Federal Government; in the exercise of it, this Government only participates with the State Governments. So far, however, as this concurrent jurisdiction is actually exercised, the sphere of State authority is contracted. This authority dwindles and shrinks into narrower limits, as such jurisdiction descends lower in the scale of controversies, embracing in its descent a greater variety of cases. Thus the increment of federal authority produces a proportionate decrease of State authority. To extend this process further than a due administration of justice requires it to deviate from an important fundamental principle of the constitution.

It is presumable, that inasmuch as the Federal Government was instituted for the benefit of every citizen within the United States, this concurrence of jurisdiction, in the cases last recited, might have been considered as one of the purposes proper to be provided for in this system; that a citizen of one State having a matter of controversy within the territorial limits of another State, and with a citizen of that State, might take his option of resorting either to the State or to the federal tribunal for its adjustment and decision. A similar consideration might have induced the extension of jurisdiction to the federal tribunal, in controversies between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States. In cases of this description the extension might have been as strongly recommended on the ground of convenience to the parties, as in ordinary controversies between citizens of different States. Yet, while regard is thus had to the convenience of those who, residing in one State have to prosecute in another State, the convenience of the parties on the other side ought not to be entirely neglected; equal attention is due to each; and the Legislature will respect both alike in the arrangements it makes towards carrying the power into execution. If citizens of one State are entitled, from the nature and general design of the Government, to draw those of another State before the federal tribunal, in matters of controversy between them, it is believed to be a question of no inconsiderable moment how far a provision for that purpose may be extended, without operating a greater inconvenience on the one side than any rightful claim to such provision on the other side would justify. This question involves an estimate of the degree of interest which may constitute a proper subject of controversy between the parties litigant before such tribunal. It is believed, that in making this estimate the just rule of calculation is deduced from the following considerations, viz:

The inconveniences to which the parties on one side will generally be subjected from attendance on a single court, sitting at one particular place in the State, contrasted with the situations of the State courts, so numerous and so dispersed, that almost every man finds one convenient to him; and,

The excess of costs and charges incident to prosecutions in the former beyond those which are incurred from prosecutions in the latter courts.

From this view of the question, which presents itself to the committee as a correct one, their impressions are, that matters of controversy between citizens of different States, which do not involve a very considerable interest to the parties, ought not to be subjected to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; that, where the interest involved is considerable, a provision extending their jurisdiction to such cases might operate a degree of oppression to the parties on one side, while those on the other side could derive no greater benefits than what are afforded by the State courts. If this be a well-founded opinion, can subjects or citizens of a foreign State have a better claim to such provisions? If neither the principles of the constitution, nor any sound maxims of distributive justice are favorable to the idea of extending the jurisdiction of the federal courts to controversies of minor importance between American citizens residing in different States, can those principles or maxims be more favorable to such enlargement of jurisdiction, as to similar controversies wherein aliens are parties? Every consideration, opposed to such a measure in relation to the former cases, must resist that idea with at least equal force, when applied to the cases last mentioned. No good reason, in the opinion of this committee, can exist in favor of recommending such a discrimination.

Having contemplated this subject, on general principles, and having made the foregoing deductions, the committee then directed their attention to the peculiar situation of the petitioners, as stated in their memorial. In respect to the trouble and expense to which they allege their agents and themselves are exposed in prosecuting suits, for the recovery of their debts, in different courts of the commonwealth of Virginia, it is to be remarked that, if the inconveniences suggested should be removed from them by the establishment of the tribunal they solicit, what would be the consequence? From their own showing, it is evident that a considerable number of individuals, a number much greater than their own number, together with that of their agents and those they represent, would be exposed to greater inconveniences, trouble, and expense in attending court at one particular place, from many of whom that place would necessarily be very remote. To grant the prayer of the petitioners merely on this ground of complaint, would be to oppress a considerable number of citizens, for the accommodation of a much smaller number of persons who are not citizens. A principle which would justify this step is a sort of principle totally inadmissible by this committee as a rule by which to decide on what is just and proper.

As to the allegation that they have frequently incurred "entire loss of debts supported by such documents and principles, as have in similar cases ensured their recovery in the federal court," the committee would observe that, however such different decisions may have taken place, it is not admitted, as a necessary inference, that the decisions complained of were not as just as those from which recoveries were obtained. And as to that part of the petition which complains that some of the State courts are influenced by no "uniform course of decision," in cases supported by the "same principles of law and evidence," the committee would remark that, if such be the fact, (of which, however, no evidence has been submitted,) the inconvenience cannot be peculiar to the petitioners; it must extend to all the citizens of the State, who have controversies in the different courts. The committee cannot perceive any propriety in making a provision for the sole purpose of meeting their special cases.

As another ground of complaint, it is stated, that the courts of Virginia do not "in practice respect the decisions of the circuit and supreme courts of the United States," in relation to British debts. While the committee think it proper to observe that this part of the complaint is also unsupported, but by the mere allegation of the petitioners, they would remark, at the same time, that it is not deemed material to inquire into that circumstance, in order to make up their own opinion as to the competency of those courts to administer justice between the parties, in deciding the cases in question.

In whatever point of view this subject is considered, this committee perceive no just ground to disapprove of the policy which dictated the existing limits in the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, so as to deem it proper to recommend any extension of that jurisdiction, or the establishment of any other tribunal, to meet the wishes of the petitioners. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

INQUIRY WHETHER A MILITARY APPOINTMENT CONFERRED ON A MEMBER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES HAD BEEN ACCEPTED.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 1, 1805.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

JANUARY 31, 1805.

In compliance with the desire of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of yesterday, I have to inform them that, by a letter of the 30th of May last, from the Secretary of War to Samuel Hammond, a member of the House, it was proposed to him to accept a commission of colonel commandant for the district of Louisiana, when the new Government there should commence. By a letter of the 30th June, he signified a willingness to accept; but still more definitively by one of October 26th, a copy of which is, therefore, now communicated. A commission had been made out for him, bearing date the 1st day of October last, and forwarded before the receipt of his letter of October 26. No later communication has been received from him, nor is any thing later known of his movements.

TH: JEFFERSON.

SIR:

VARELLO, NEAR AUGUSTA, GEORGIA, October 26, 1804.

Your favor of the 17th ultimo is this moment received, and its contents noticed. I had written to you on the 30th June, in reply to your letter of the 30th May. As I had no reply to that letter, on the 1st of August I transmitted a duplicate thereof, under cover of letter, requesting that you would favor me with a line in reply as early as convenient after its receipt; and, as I had heard nothing from you the first week in this month, I then wrote you again, soliciting a reply to my former communication, and expressed my surprise that I had received no instructions relative to the appointment which had been proposed for me, and which I had concluded to accept.

I am now to conclude that neither of my letters had been received prior to the date of your last letter, which is now before me. There must have been some improper management in some of the post offices between us. My first letter was put into the Augusta post office the day of its date; the second, covering a duplicate, was put into the post office at Campbelltown on the day of its date; and my last was delivered to the Augusta deputy post master on the day of its date. Their detention has been a serious inconvenience to me; indeed, I have been much embarrassed to determine whether I ought to prepare to commence my journey to the city of Washington to attend the approaching session of Congress, or to direct my arrangements for executing the trust proposed for me. I had finally concluded to set out for Washington on Monday next, believing, that if it had been expected I should go to St. Louis before the end of the session, I should before then receive instructions to that effect.

Your letter changes my route, and will delay my leaving this a few days, as a different mode of travelling will be necessary. I shall, however, hasten my departure as much as possible, and shall expect to find the necessary instructions at St. Louis; and, as soon after my arrival there as opportunity will serve, I shall write you. The journey, at this season of the year, through the mountains and wilderness, will be uncomfortable and difficult. I think an inquiry should be made into the causes of delay in the post offices. Your last letter has been more than double the time in coming to hand than it ought, or than is usual from Washington; say from 17th September to 26th October. The public must experience some inconvenience on such occasions as well as individuals. I shall be happy to hear from you occasionally when I arrive at St. Louis, and during my stay there, when public duty will allow the time, and inclination prompt it.

Accept my sincere wishes for your health and prosperity,

And am, with esteem and much respect, your obedient fellow-citizen,

S. HAMMOND.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC RIVER AT WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 4, 1805.

Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, from the committee to whom were referred the several petitions of sundry inhabitants of the District of Columbia, praying that a company may be incorporated for the purpose of erecting a bridge over the river Potomac, and the remonstrance of other inhabitants of the District against the same, made the following report:

That doubts had formerly been entertained by some of the members of your committee of the right of Congress to legislate on the subject referred to their consideration; but inasmuch as an exercise of power, as long as that exercise is uncontroverted, may perhaps be considered as deciding the question of right, your committee are of opinion that a late law renders an investigation of the legitimate powers of Congress in the case unnecessary. The only inquiry is, what would be the advantages or disadvantages attending the erecting of a bridge over the Potomac.

It appears to your committee that, by the proposed bridge, a saving of several miles of distance over a very bad road between the seat of Government and the town of Alexandria would be made; that, consequently, the southern mail would be transmitted to and from the city of Washington with greater expedition and security than at present; the communication between Alexandria and the northern cities would be rendered more easy and safe, and the general interests of the commerce of the United States, as far as respects the transmission of mercantile information between the northern and southern sections of the Union, would be much promoted. The commerce of Georgetown, it is alleged, will be materially injured by any obstruction which may be caused in the navigation of the river Potomac, and that the erection of a bridge would be an obstruction of such a nature as almost to destroy that commerce. That the inhabitants of that town, having generally settled there with views connected with the exercise of mercantile profession, those views would be counteracted, and their property considerably diminished in value. Your committee have little doubt but that the delay in ascending and descending the river, produced by the erection of the contemplated bridge, would, in some measure, affect the trade of Georgetown; but that trade is so small that it could scarcely have any great operation on the value of property, or on the prosperity of the town. Georgetown owes its present flourishing state to its vicinity to the city of Washington, and not to any commercial profit arising from the enterprise of its inhabitants. And although some small individual injury might be the effect of erecting a bridge, yet that injury would be far more than counterbalanced by the public benefits arising from the measure. Your committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners that a company should be incorporated for the purpose of erecting a bridge over the river Potomac is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

EXTENSION OF THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, AND AN INCREASE OF THE MEMBERS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 9, 1805.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, made the following report:

The memorialists represent that, by that part of the ordinance for the Government of the Mississippi Territory, which requires a freehold in fifty acres of land as a qualification of an elector of representatives, many of their respectable citizens, who are possessed of considerable personal property, houses, town lots, and small tracts of land, are deprived of their elective franchise; and that, by the act authorizing the establishment of a Government in the said Mississippi Territory, the apportionment of representatives is very unequal in the different counties mentioned in that act; they, therefore, solicit that the aforesaid ordinance may be so amended that, having been a citizen of one of the United States, and having resided in the Territory one year next preceding an election, or, if not a citizen of one of the United States, having resided two years in the Territory, and, in either case, having paid a county or territorial tax, assessed at least six months previous to such election, may be the qualification required of an elector of representatives; and that the aforementioned act, authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory, may be so amended that the General Assembly of the said Territory may have power to apportion the representatives in the different counties, according to the number of free male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, in such counties; so that there shall not be less than ten, nor more than twelve, of the whole number of representatives.

From a recurrence to the ordinance for the Government of the Mississippi Territory, it appears that there is no difference between the qualifications required therein, and those solicited in the memorial, except the freehold in fifty acres of land, which has been already mentioned. The only question, therefore, relative to this part of the subject, is, whether it be expedient to dispense with such a qualification.

If the possession of property were at all essential to the qualification of an elector of representatives, your committee cannot see any good reasons why persons possessing considerable personal property, houses, town lots, and tracts of land less than fifty acres, and otherwise qualified, should be precluded from a participation in the right of suffrage with those who possess a freehold in fifty acres of land, which the ordinance requires. But, believing it inexpedient to limit the exercise of that right by any species of property qualification, your committee conceive that it ought to be extended agreeably to the wishes of the memorialists.

In the first section of the act of May the 10th, 1800, supplemental to the act authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory, it is "Provided, That, until the number of free male inhabitants of full age, in the said Territory, shall amount to five thousand, there shall not be returned to the General Assembly more than nine representatives."

Your committee have no means of ascertaining the number of inhabitants of the above description, at this time, in the Mississippi Territory. But believing that no objection, except that of some additional expense to the Territory, can arise to the admission of two or three additional representatives, they can perceive no necessity for a continuance of the restrictive provision above quoted. Nor can they perceive any impropriety in authorizing the Legislature of the Territory to apportion the representatives in the manner requested. And your committee ask leave to report a bill for effecting the purposes which they herein consider as expedient.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF COWLES MEAD, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 18, 1805.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Spalding, claiming a seat in this House, as a representative of the State of Georgia, in the place of Cowles Mead, who has been returned, and has taken a seat in the House, having had the same under consideration, and heard the petitioner and the sitting member thereon, made the following report:

That, by a standing law of the State of Georgia, the election of persons to represent that State in this House was required to be holden on the first Monday of October, 1804, in the respective counties throughout the State; that three or more county magistrates were required to preside at the election, in each of the counties, to return the names of the candidates, and the number and names of the voters, with an accurate state of the poll, and to transmit their said returns, by express, to the Governor of the State, within twenty days after closing the poll at said election; that the Governor was required, within five days after the expiration of the said twenty days, to count up the votes from the several counties, or such of them as might have made returns, for each person, and immediately thereafter to issue his proclamation, declaring the persons having the highest numbers of votes to be elected to represent the said State in the House of Representatives of the United States, and to grant a certificate thereof, under the great seal of the State, to each of them; that, by an official certificate from the Secretary of said State, it appears that the votes from the counties of Tatnall, Liberty, and Camden, were not returned to the Governor within the said term of twenty days after the election, nor within the said further term of five days thereafter; and that, of the votes given at the said election, and returned to the Governor, within the said term of twenty days,

Cowles Mead had	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4438
And Thomas Spalding had	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4269

Giving the said Mead, a majority of	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	169
-------------------------------------	---	---	---	---	---	---	---	-----

That the Governor, in pursuance of the law aforesaid, counted up the votes, so returned to him within twenty days, and thereupon issued his proclamation, declaring that the said Cowles Mead was elected, and granted him a certificate thereof.

By another certificate from the Secretary of said State, it appears, that after the Governor had issued his proclamation as aforesaid, that is, on the twenty-seventh day of November, 1804, the returns of the votes given at the said election, agreeably to the law aforesaid, in and by the counties of Tatnall, Liberty and Camden, were received by the Governor, being transmitted by the presiding magistrates of said counties respectively; that both of the said certificates from the Secretary are in due form of law; that the said returns of votes, from the three last-mentioned counties, are conformable to law, in every respect, except that they were not transmitted to the Governor within the limited time of twenty days after the election; that, of the votes so returned from the said three counties, after the expiration of said twenty days,

Cowles Mead had -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	27
And Thomas Spalding had -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	235

which, added to their respective numbers of votes returned to the Governor within the term of twenty days, and counted by him as aforesaid,

Give to Cowles Mead, in the whole -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4465
And to Thomas Spalding, in the whole -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4504

Leaving the said Thomas Spalding a majority of - - - - - 39

The petitioner offered depositions to prove that the cause of the failure in the transmission of the returns from the three last counties to the Governor, within the twenty days after the election, was a hurricane, which rendered the roads impassable; but, as the sitting member was not notified to be present at the taking of those depositions, the committee were of opinion that they were not admissible evidence.

The petitioner then proposed to procure other evidence of the same fact, and the sitting member proposed to procure evidence to the contrary, that the roads were passable; but the committee being of opinion that it was not material to the question before the House, whether the said failure was caused by the act of God, as alleged by the petitioner, or by the fault of the returning officers, or the defect of the law, in not providing a penalty upon officers for neglecting their official duty of transmitting the returns, did not receive any evidence on that point.

The sitting member stated to the committee that he could, as he was assured, by sending to Georgia, obtain proof that the election in the county of Tatnal was irregularly held, so that the whole return of that county ought, for that cause, to be rejected; but finding, by calculation, that if the votes of that county, of which twenty-four were for himself and forty for the petitioner, were set aside, it would not affect the result of the election, he waived that objection, and rested his claim upon the principle that the votes of all the three last-mentioned counties are void by the law of Georgia, not having been returned to the Governor within the time prescribed by said law.

There is no suggestion of any fraud or intentional unfairness in the election; and the committee add, with pleasure, that the conduct of both the gentlemen claiming the contested seat appears to have been candid and honorable.

Upon the foregoing state of facts, as the constitution has made this House the judge of the elections and returns, as well as the qualifications of its members; as the returns from the State authorities, therefore, are only prima facie evidence of an election, but not conclusive upon this House; as there is, in the present case, satisfactory proof that the votes of the three counties in question, although the returns thereof were not transmitted to the Governor in season to be considered by him, were originally good, lawful, constitutional votes; having been given by qualified voters, on the day, at the places, and in the manner prescribed by law; and as neither the voters who gave them, nor the candidates in whose favor they were given, have done or omitted any thing, on their part, to forfeit their respective rights, the committee are of opinion that those votes ought to be allowed, and therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That Cowles Mead, returned to this House as a member thereof from the State of Georgia, is not entitled to a seat; and that Thomas Spalding is entitled to a seat in this House, as a representative of the State of Georgia.

No. 195.

[1st SESSION.]

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 19, 1805.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred the examination of the act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State Government; and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes;" and to report the manner, in their opinion, the money appropriated by said act ought to be applied, made the following report:

That, upon examination of the act aforesaid, they find "the one-twentieth part, or 5 per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the State of Ohio, and sold by Congress from and after the 30th day of June, 1802, is appropriated for the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the river Ohio, to said State, and through the same; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass."

They find, that, by a subsequent law, passed on the 3d day of March, 1803, Congress appropriated 3 per cent. of the said 5 per cent. to laying out and making roads within the State of Ohio, leaving 2 per cent. of the appropriation contained in the first-mentioned law unexpended, which now remains for "the laying out and making roads from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the river Ohio, to said State."

They find that the nett proceeds of sales of land in the State of Ohio, from July 1st, 1802, to June 30th, 1803, both inclusive, were -	-	-	-	-	-	$124,400 92
From 1st July, 1803, to June 30th, 1804, -	-	-	-	-	-	176,203 35
From 1st July, 1804, to June 30th, 1805, -	-	-	-	-	-	266,000 00
From 1st July, 1805, to 30th Sept. 1805, -	-	-	-	-	-	66,000 00

Amounting, in the whole, to - - - - - $632,604 27

Two per cent. on which sum amounts to 12,652 dollars.

Twelve thousand six hundred and fifty-two dollars were, therefore, on the 1st day of October last, subject to the uses directed by law, as mentioned in this report; and it will be discerned that the fund is constantly accumulating, and will, probably, by the time regular preparations can be made for its expenditure, amount to eighteen or twenty thousand dollars.

The committee have examined, as far as their limited time and the scanty sources of facts within their reach would permit, the various routes which have been contemplated for laying out roads pursuant to the provisions of the act first mentioned in this report.

They find that the distance from Philadelphia to Pittsburg is 314 miles by the usual route, and on a straight line about 270.

From Philadelphia to the nearest point on the river Ohio, contiguous to the State of Ohio, which is probably between Steubenville and the mouth of Grave creek, the distance by the usual route is 360 miles, and on a straight line about 308.

From Baltimore to the river Ohio, between the same points, and by the usual route, is 275 miles, and on a straight line 224.

From this city (Washington) to the same points on the river Ohio, the distance is nearly the same as from Baltimore; probably the difference is not a plurality of miles.

From Richmond, in Virginia, to the nearest point on the river Ohio, the distance by the usual route is 377 miles; but new roads are opening which will shorten the distance 50 or 60 miles; 247 miles of the contemplated road, from Richmond northwesterly, will be as good as the roads usually are in that country, but the remaining 70 or 80 miles are bad, for the present, and probably will remain so for a length of time, as there seems to be no existing inducement for the State of Virginia to incur the expense of making that part of the road passable.

From Baltimore to the Monongahela river, where the route from Baltimore to the Ohio river will intersect it, the distance as usually travelled is 218 miles, and on a straight line about 184. From this point, which is at or near Brownsville, boats can pass down, with great facility, to the State of Ohio, during a number of months in every year.

The above distances are not all stated from actual mensuration, but it is believed they are sufficiently correct for the present purpose.

The committee have not examined any routes northward of that leading from Philadelphia to the river Ohio, nor southward of that leading from Richmond, because they suppose the roads to be laid out must strike the river Ohio on some point contiguous to the State of Ohio, in order to satisfy the words of the law making the appropriation; the words are, "leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the river Ohio, to the said State, and through the same."

The mercantile intercourse of the citizens of Ohio with those of the Atlantic States is chiefly in Philadelphia and Baltimore; not very extensive in the towns on the Potomac within the District of Columbia, and still less with Richmond, in Virginia. At present, the greatest portion of their trade is with Philadelphia; but it is believed their trade is rapidly increasing with Baltimore, owing to the difference of distance in favor of Baltimore, and to the advantage of boating down the Monongahela river, from the point where the road strikes it, about 70 miles by water, and 50 by land, above Pittsburg.

The sum appropriated for laying out and making roads is so small, that the committee have thought it most expedient to direct an expenditure to one route only; they have, therefore, endeavored to fix on that which, for the present, will be most accommodating to the citizens of the State of Ohio; leaving to the future benevolence and policy of Congress, an extension of their operations on this or other routes, and an increase of the requisite fund, as the discoveries of experience may point out their expediency and necessity. The committee being fully convinced that a wise Government can never lose sight of an object so important as that of connecting a numerous and rapidly increasing population, spread upon a fertile and extensive territory, with the Atlantic States, now separated from them by mountains, which, by industry and an expense moderate in comparison with the advantages, can be rendered passable.

The route from Richmond must necessarily approach the State of Ohio in a part thinly inhabited, and which, from the nature of the soil, and other circumstances, must remain so, at least for a considerable time; and, from the hilly and rough condition of the country, no roads are or can be conveniently made, leading to the principal population of the State of Ohio. These considerations have induced the committee to postpone, for the present, any further consideration of that route.

The spirit and perseverance of Pennsylvania are such, in the article of road making, that no doubt can remain but they will, in a little time, complete a road from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, as good as the nature of the ground will permit. They are so particularly interested to facilitate the intercourse between their trading capital, Philadelphia, not only to Pittsburg, but also to the extensive country within that State, on the western waters, that they will, of course, surmount the difficulties presented by the Allegany mountain, Chesnut Ridge, and Laurel Hill, the three great and almost exclusive impediments which now exist on that route.

The State of Maryland, with no less spirit and perseverance, are engaged in making roads from Baltimore, and from the western boundary of the District of Columbia, through Fredericktown, to Williamsport. Were the Government of the United States to direct the expenditure of the fund in contemplation upon either of these routes, for the present, in Pennsylvania or Maryland, it would, probably, so far interfere with the operations of the respective States, as to produce mischief instead of benefit; especially as the sum to be laid out by the United States is too inconsiderable, alone, to effect objects of such magnitude. But as the State of Maryland have no particular interest to extend their road across the mountains, (and if they had, it would be impracticable, because the State does not extend so far,) the committee have thought it expedient to recommend the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, on the northerly bank of the Potomac, and within the State of Maryland, to the river Ohio, at the most convenient place between a point on the easterly bank of said river, opposite to Steubenville, and the mouth of Grave creek, which empties into said river Ohio, a little below Wheeling, in Virginia. This route will meet and accommodate the roads leading from Baltimore and the District of Columbia; it will cross the Monongahela river, at or near Brownsville, sometimes called Redstone, where the advantage of boating can be taken; and from the point where it will probably intersect the river Ohio, there are now roads, or they can easily be made over feasible and proper ground, to and through the principal population of the State of Ohio.

Cumberland is situated at the eastern foot of the Allegany mountain, about eighty miles from Williamsport, by the usual route, which is circuitous, owing to a large bend in the river Potomac, on the bank of which the road now runs; the distance on a straight line is not more than fifty or fifty-five miles, and over tolerable ground for a road, which will probably be opened by the State of Maryland, should the route be established over the mountains, as contemplated by this report.

From Cumberland to the western extremity of Laurel Hill, by the route now travelled, the distance is sixty-six miles, and on a straight line about fifty-five; on this part of the route, the committee suppose, the first and very considerable expenditures are specially necessary. From Laurel Hill to the Ohio river, by the usual route, is about seventy miles, and on a straight line fifty-four or five; the road is tolerable, though capable of amelioration.

To carry into effect the principles arising from the foregoing facts, the committee present herewith a bill for the consideration of the Senate. They suppose, that to take the proper measures for carrying into effect the section of the law respecting a road or roads to the State of Ohio is a duty imposed upon Congress by the law itself, and that a sense of duty will always be sufficient to insure the passage of the bill now offered to the Senate.

To enlarge upon the highly important considerations of cementing the union of our citizens located on the Western waters with those of the Atlantic States, would be an indelicacy offered to the understandings of the body to whom this report is addressed, as it might seem to distrust them. But, from the interesting nature of the subject, the committee are induced to ask the indulgence of a single observation: Politicians have generally agreed that rivers unite the interests and promote the friendship of those who inhabit their banks; while mountains, on the contrary, tend to the disunion and estrangement of those who are separated by their intervention. In the present case, to make the crooked ways straight, and the rough ways smooth, will, in effect remove the intervening mountains, and, by facilitating the intercourse of our Western brethren with those on the Atlantic, substantially unite them in interest, which, the committee believe, is the most effectual cement of union applicable to the human race.

All which is most respectfully submitted.

APPLICATION OF OLIVER EVANS FOR AN EXTENSION OF HIS PATENT.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 31, 1805.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: The petition of your petitioner respectfully sheweth:

That your petitioner invented many useful improvements on the art of manufacturing of flour and meal, for which he obtained a patent dated 7th January, 1791, which expired on the 7th January last.

That your petitioner has experienced great and unforeseen difficulties in the introduction of his said improvements, the millers being unwilling to risk the expense until fully convinced of their utility by seeing them long and successfully used by others; and many delayed until your petitioner's patent has expired, although the improvements were proved to be of great utility by all who have used them. Also the wide extent of country which your petitioner and his agent have been obliged to traverse, to make known his inventions, direct their erection, and make collections, has consumed the greatest part of the sums he has been able to collect; whereby the patriotic intention of Congress, in passing the patent law, wherein they contemplated that the inventor of a useful improvement should be well rewarded, has in this case been completely frustrated; so far that your petitioner can, with safety, say that he has already expended more than the nett profits arising from his invention, in bringing forward another and far more useful discovery and improvement on steam engines, the principles of which are extremely abstruse and difficult to investigate, and has been very expensive in the experiments necessary to put them in practice or operation, so as to be applied as a substitute for water falls in all cases where power may be wanted to move machinery, from the power of one man to that of one hundred horses. Also to a great variety of purposes to which the engines heretofore known could not be applied with profit; even to propel boats against the current of the Mississippi, and carriages on turnpike roads; because his engines are from five to ten times more powerful than others, in proportion to their size and weight. But large sums are still necessary to be expended to bring into general use this invention, as it will meet with similar difficulties and delays, unless your petitioner be enabled to apply it himself to several of the purposes for which it is so well adapted. And also to compose and publish a new and expensive work explaining the principles and construction of his said improved engine, by many expensive engravings, without which this, as well as others which he will mention, can progress but extremely slow.

Your petitioner, long since, found it prudent to restrain his strong propensity for making improvements, and to confine them to such arts only as he was immediately engaged in; and to make it a rule that no more than the profits arising from the inventions he had already made should be applied to defray the expense of new ones.

During the American revolution, he engaged in making wire, also wool and cotton cards. His improvements in those arts were profitable to him for a short time. When he commenced the manufacturing of flour in the year 1784, he was led to make his improvements on that art; he then and at that time conceived the principles by which he has now improved the steam engine, but waited until the profits arising from his other improvements on the manufacture of flour should be sufficient to defray the expense of experiments to make the improvement on steam engines, which, after being suppressed for seventeen years, and running the risk of being totally lost, he commenced in the year 1801, and, at the expense of $3,700, including his own time, at last reduced to practice.

Your petitioner finds his knowledge on this subject so much enlarged, that he has conceived still greater improvements on steam engines and other arts intimately connected, which he has not yet put in practice; that is, to cause steam engines to last much longer, increase their power, fit them for peculiar purposes, and lessen their consumption of fuel to about one-fourth; drawings and written explanations of which he prepared and presented for the inspection of your honors last session, and which he deposited in the Patent Office; choosing rather to communicate his discoveries than suffer them to be lost. He does not hesitate to declare his sanguine expectations are, that when all these improvements, in addition to those he has already made, are put in operation and generally used, that they will, in this country, daily save the labor of one hundred thousand men. Under such impressions as these, he cannot willingly relinquish the pursuit of the means of bringing them into operation, without injury to himself, while there remains a gleam of hope.

Your petitioner conceives that the profits that would arise from the exclusive right of his own inventions for another term, would enable him to apply—

1st. For the introduction of his steam engine,	-	-	-	-	$3,000 00
2d. For defraying the expense of experiments to put in operation his new principles to the further improvement of steam engines and other arts,	-	-	-	-	3,000 00
3d. For composing and publishing a new work, to be entitled the "Young Steam Engineer's Guide," with many engravings, explaining the principles of his various inventions,	-	-	-	-	3,000 00
Making, in all,	$9,000, which he wishes to expend for those useful purposes.

Your petitioner, not doubting but that your honorable bodies will be disposed to protect him in the enjoyment of his own inventions, so long as it may appear likely to be the means of bringing into use more useful improvements, the great expense of which must be defrayed from some source, he has therefore made the above statement, and prays for an extension of his patent for his improvements on the art of manufacturing flour and meal for such term as you, in your wisdom, may deem best; and securing to those who have already purchased the privilege of him their right of using the said improvements. This would enable your petitioner to collect the sums with greater facility already due him for the use of said improvements, which will not otherwise be worth the expense of collecting, being scattered over the United States, and which, added to what might become due, might be sufficient for his intended purposes. And your petitioner, on his part, promises faithfully to exert his abilities to bring to perfection and into use his said improvements, and to compose and publish his intended new work, as he may be enabled so to do.

STATE COURTS VESTED WITH POWER TO MITIGATE OR REMIT FORFEITURES, PENALTIES, AND DISABILITIES ACCRUING UNDER THE REVENUE LAWS, IN CERTAIN CASES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 2, 1806.

Mr. SALLY, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of so far amending the act entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accrued in certain cases therein mentioned," as to extend the powers vested in the district judges of the United States to the judges of the judicial courts of the several States, made the following report:

That, by the 30th section of a law of the United States, to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, it is made the duty of any person, having the charge and command of any ships or vessels, to make a report, within twenty-four hours, of the arrival of the said ship or vessel, and within forty-eight hours after such arrival to make another report in form of all the particulars required to be in a manifest, &c.; and that if the said master, or other person having the care of any such ships and vessels, shall neglect or omit to make the said reports, or any of them, he shall, for each and every offence, forfeit and pay the sum of $1,000.

And also, that, by the 50th section of the said law, masters of vessels unloading goods without a permit shall forfeit $400.

That, by the 105th and 106th sections of the said act, goods, wares, and merchandise may be imported in the districts on the northern and northwestern boundaries of the United States, in vessels and boats of any burthen, and in rafts and carriages of any kind and nature, subject to the like regulations, penalties, and forfeitures, as in other districts.

Your committee observe, that the intercourse by water between the inhabitants on the frontier of the United States, particularly of the district of Champlain, and those of Canada, is, in many instances, effected in small boats or canoes, not exceeding three-quarters of a ton burthen; that the intercourse with Canada is not confined to the water communication; that at the place where the line of forty-five degrees of north latitude separates the United States from the British territory, lake Champlain is sixty miles distant from the river St. Lawrence; that the land of that tract is, at several points, inhabited on both sides of the line.

That, by the act under the consideration of your committee, for mitigating or remitting fines, forfeitures, and disabilities, any person that has incurred fine, penalty, or forfeiture, by force of any law of the United States, for the laying, levying, or collecting any duties or taxes, may prefer his petition to the judge of the district, setting forth the circumstances of his case; and, upon an inquiry, it is made the duty of the said judge to cause the facts which shall appear to be stated and annexed to the petition, and to direct their transmission to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit such fine and penalty, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud; and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted, to be discontinued, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and just.

Your committee further observe, that the revenue districts on the northern frontier are at a distance of between three and four hundred miles of the place of residence of the district judges and of the district courts; that any petitioners from those districts would be forced to travel from six to eight hundred miles with their evidences, in order to avail themselves of the benefits contemplated by the law; that the persons who are liable to infringe the laws of the United States, on account of their local situation, are generally poor, or in very moderate circumstances; that they have not the ability to bear the expenses of so long a journey.

That the inhabitants of the northern part of lake Champlain are in the habit of transporting their produce, such as pork, butter, and cheese, in canoes in the summer months, and in sleighs during the winter; that the distance from a direct route by land, to any of the custom-house offices, often exceeds twenty miles; that in many instances those people will, through neglect, ignorance, or necessity, unload the trifling articles they have imported before a previous declaration to the custom-house is made; in which case they are liable to pay a fine of $1,000 for not giving notice of their arrival into the district within twenty-four hours, and to pay another fine of $400 for unloading without a permit.

That the inhabitants of the frontier may, and will, often be driven by want to step over the fictitious barrier, in order to obtain from his neighbor, across the line, a single bushel of corn, perhaps the price of his labor; that, by such an act, the poor man makes himself liable to pay the disproportionate penalty of the law, and that the difficulty or impossibility of petitioning for relief is a stimulus to the rapacity of a wicked informer; and that, on the whole, your committee believe that the law, for mitigating or remitting penalties, is, in its present form, nugatory as it respects the frontier districts; and that the inhabitants of those districts are totally deprived of the means of obtaining relief.

Under these impressions, and agreeable to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, expressed in his letter hereunto annexed, your committee are of opinion that the powers of the district judges, and of the district courts, ought to be extended to the judges and to the judicial courts of the several States, so far as it respects the revenue districts of Champlain, Sackett's Harbor, Oswego, Genesee, Niagara, Buffalo Creek, and Presque Isle; and they have prepared a bill for that purpose.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 26, 1805.

I had the honor to receive your letter of the 19th instant, respecting the propriety of extending the powers vested in the district judges, in relation to the remission of forfeitures and penalties, to the judges of the judicial courts of the several States.

As those forfeitures and penalties can be incurred only on the sea border, or on the northern frontier of the United States, it is only on that frontier that the distance from the residence of the district judge, and from the place where district courts are held, renders it almost impracticable for the parties to avail themselves of the present mode of affording relief.

The inconvenience has been remedied, so far as related to the Territories, by an act of last session. There is a district judge in the State of Ohio, and one in that of Vermont. The only portion of the frontier where there is a just ground of complaint extends from Lake Champlain to the western boundary of Pennsylvania, including the revenue districts of Champlain, Sackett's Harbor, Oswego, Genesee, Niagara, Buffalo Creek, and Presque Isle. I think that it would, on the whole, be in favor of the revenue, as well as of those persons who may inadvertently commit some breach of the revenue laws, were the jurisdiction of the State courts, in those counties which include the above-mentioned districts, extended to all seizures, penalties, and forfeitures arising under the revenue laws of the United States; and the same powers, in relation to the remission or mitigation of such penalties and forfeitures, given to the presiding judges of those State courts, which have been given to the judges of the district courts of the United States.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

OBJECTIONS TO THE ELECTION OF MICHAEL LEIB, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 6, 1806.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred, on the 3d inst., the petition of John Douglass, on behalf of the electors opposed to the election of Michael Leib, made the following report:

A petition against the election of any person returned as a member of the House of Representatives ought to state the ground on which the election is contested with such certainty as to give reasonable notice thereof to the sitting member, and to enable the House to judge whether the same be verified by the proof; and, if proved, whether it be sufficient to vacate the seat; and the petitioner ought not to be permitted to give evidence of any fact not substantially alleged in his petition.

In the present case, the petition contains no direct or specific charge of any illegality in the election. The only allegations are general and indirect, that is, by a history of the proceedings of certain meetings and committees of electors, and by reference to a subjoined report of one of these committees, and the documents accompanying it, which documents appear to be seven ex parte depositions, not admissible in evidence, and not deemed proper to be considered as parts of the petition, by being generally referred to therein.

The committee are of opinion that on such a petition there can be no satisfactory trial of the merits of the election in question, and therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition, and the documents accompanying the same.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 20, 1806.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee to whom was referred the order of the Senate of the 5th December last, that inquiry be made whether a further appropriation ought not to be made for the augmentation of the Congressional library, made a report, (in part) as follows:

By the fifth section of the act, entitled "An act to make further provision for the removal and accommodation of the Government of the United States," passed 24th April, 1800, 5,000 dollars were appropriated for the purchase of such books as might be necessary for the use of Congress, then about to remove from Philadelphia and hold its sessions at Washington, and for fitting up a suitable chamber for containing them, and placing them therein. The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives were directed to be the purchasers, pursuant to such directions as should be given, and such catalogue as should be furnished by a joint committee of both Houses of Congress. The account herewith exhibited shows in what manner, and to what amount, the money so appropriated has been expended.

Afterwards, by the sixth section of the "Act concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress" passed 26th January, 1802, the unexpended balance of the said 5,000 dollars, together with such sums as may be hereafter appropriated to the same purpose, is ordered to be laid out under the direction of a joint committee, to consist of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, for the purchase of books and maps.

The committee almost hesitate to add a sentence, to enforce the propriety of increasing the number already bought for Congress. Every member knows that the inquiries of standing and select committees cannot here be aided by large public libraries, as in New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia. Nor has it hitherto appeared that so much benefit is to be derived from private collections at the present seat of Government, as in those large cities. Every week of the session causes additional regret that the volumes of literature and science, within the reach of the National Legislature, are not more rich and ample. The want of geographical illustrations is truly distressing; and the deficiency of historical and political works is scarcely less severely felt. There is, however, no danger of realizing the story of a parliamentum indoctum in this country, especially if steps be seasonably taken to furnish the library with such materials as will enable statesmen to be correct in their investigations, and, by a becoming display of erudition and research, give a higher dignity and a brighter lustre to truth.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC AT WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 21, 1806.

Mr. PHILIP R. THOMPSON, from the committee to whom were referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; the petition of sundry citizens of the United States, resident in the Territory of Columbia; the memorial of sundry inhabitants of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; the memorial of sundry inhabitants of the city of Washington, residing on the west side of Tiber creek; and the memorial of John P. Van Ness, made the following report:

The petitions of the inhabitants of the town and county of Alexandria, and of the citizens resident in the Territory of Columbia, state: That an easy intercourse between the town of Alexandria and the city of Washington, which is at present prevented by the intervention of the river Potomac, is extremely desirable; that this intercourse is especially interrupted at that season of the year when the river is obstructed by ice; that a bridge from Maryland Avenue to Alexander's island would facilitate the communication, shorten the route of the mail at least six miles, and be generally beneficial to the citizens of the United States; that they are persuaded the bridge contemplated by their petitions will, at some period, be carried into effect, and they view the present time as the most favorable, both in relation to their own and the general convenience, and the interests of those who may be affected by the measure; and that, if the scheme shall be authorized by Congress, it will speedily be carried into effect. They pray that a law may pass to incorporate a company for erecting a bridge across the Potomac from the city of Washington to the county of Alexandria, in some convenient situation, under such regulations and restrictions as the Legislature may deem expedient.

In opposition to these petitions, the committee have referred to them the memorial of the proprietors and inhabitants of Georgetown, which states, that Georgetown was laid out under the sanction of law, previous to the revolution; that it was engaged in foreign commerce before the seat of Government was contemplated to be on the Potomac; that, being at the head of tide-water navigation, the proprietors must have made purchases and improvements with a view to foreign commerce, or some of the trade dependent on it, in the confident expectation that the river would remain free and unobstructed by artificial causes; particularly when they saw Maryland and Virginia make a solemn compact, whereby the river Potomac is declared a common highway for the purpose of navigation and commerce, the navigation whereof is not to be injured or obstructed. They consider that their natural and political rights will be infringed on by the adoption of this measure, as the navigation of the river will be injured and obstructed thereby; that from the meeting of the stream and tide water, at the place where the bridge is contemplated, a tendency will be produced in the impeded stream water to deposit the earthy particles with which it is charged in times of freshets, by which they apprehend the present entire main and deep channel may be divided into many small and narrow passages, to the great injury of the navigation.

There is, likewise, referred to your committee the memorial of the inhabitants of the city of Washington, residing on the west side of Tiber creek; which states, that the memorialists have acquired property on the west side of Tiber creek, in the city of Washington, in confidence that the navigation of the Potomac would not be destroyed by artificial means; that the erection of a bridge at the place contemplated would probably greatly injure the navigation above it, and impair the value of the property of the memorialists; that the project of a bridge across the river is unjust, as no place should calculate on being favored with artificial advantages which cannot be afforded without depriving other places of their natural advantages.

They also find among the documents referred to them the memorial of John P. Van Ness, in opposition to the first-mentioned petitions, on the ground of the measure therein proposed, being (if carried into effect) an injurious infraction of the private rights of most of those, both within the city and Georgetown, and on the opposite shore, who are interested above the proposed site of the intended bridge.

The contrariety of sentiment and of interest which exists in the Territory of Columbia on the subject of the proposition contained in the petitions, praying that the erection of a bridge across the Potomac may be authorized by law, has induced your committee deliberately to examine the ground on which the pretensions of the petitioners in favor of the bridge are founded, and the reasons advanced by the memorialists in opposition to the measure.

Two inquiries present themselves, on the decision of which the propriety of authorizing the proposition entirely depends:

1st. Whether Congress have a right to pass a law, by which the object contemplated by the petitioners can be effected? And

2d. If that right exists, whether the benefit to the District, and the community in general, will be so great as to counterbalance the injury which individuals may eventually sustain from authorizing the measure?

In investigating the first point, it became necessary to advert to the act of the Virginia Assembly passed the 3d of January, 1786, and the act of the Assembly of Maryland passed the 12th of March in the same year, confirming a compact previously entered into between the two States; from which it appears that, among other stipulations entered into between the States of Virginia and Maryland, by their commissioners appointed for that purpose it is agreed, "that the citizens of each State, respectively, shall have full property in the shores of the Potomac river adjoining their lands, with all the emoluments and advantages thereunto belonging, and the privilege of making wharves and other improvements, so as not to obstruct or injure the navigation of the river."

It does not appear to your committee, that the subsequent cession made by the two contracting parties of ten miles square, lying on both sides of the river, under the first article of the constitution of the United States, to wit: by an act of the Virginia Assembly, passed the 3d day of December, 1791, and by an act of the Assembly of Maryland, passed the 19th day of the same month, in any degree impairs the compact previously made by the two contracting States; but that the United States received the territory, subject to the conditions previously imposed by the former possessors.

Under this impression, your committee considered it a matter of the first importance, in the decision of this question, to inquire whether the fact assumed by the counter-petitioners, that the erection of a bridge will obstruct the navigation of the river above it is founded in truth? In examining this part of the subject, your committee could avail themselves of no other evidence than such as is drawn from analogy.

It appeared to them, that the erection of piers in the river at the place contemplated for the site of the bridge, far from having the effect of occasioning a deposition of earthy matter, and filling the channel, would rather have a tendency to keep the channel open, by the increased velocity of the water passing down the main channel of the river, between the two piers which it seemed practicable to erect on each side of it. It likewise appeared to them, if the erection of the causeway from Mason's Island, opposite Georgetown, to the Virginia shore, would produce the effect expected from it, of improving the navigation of the river by means of throwing the whole body of the water of the river into a narrower compass, increasing its velocity, and thereby sweeping out a deeper channel, the same result might reasonably be expected from throwing a greater quantum and force of water into the main channel of the river, between the two piers which would support the bridge across the channel.

Your committee find that the Legislature of Maryland passed a law, on the 29th of December, 1791, previous to the assumption of jurisdiction over the territory by the United States, authorizing the erection of a bridge at or near Georgetown. As the river Potomac is navigable above the town of Georgetown, your committee consider the passage of that law as expressive of an opinion, by the Legislature of Maryland, that the erection of a bridge below the head of tide-water is not such an obstruction or injury as is prohibited by the articles of compact between the two States. And as that arm of the river Potomac between Mason's Island and the Virginia shore was navigable previous to the building of the causeway across that branch of the river, your committee have considered the law passed at the last session of Congress, authorizing the erection of that causeway, as declaratory of the right of the Legislature of the United States (notwithstanding the compact between Virginia and Maryland) to occlude, in a degree, the navigation of the river within their jurisdiction.

If a bridge can be erected with such a draw as will admit the free passage of vessels of any burden for which there is depth of water in the channel, your committee do not consider the passing a law to authorize such a bridge, under proper restrictions, as any violation of the compact before mentioned; and, from the best information they have been able to obtain on this point, it seems very practicable to erect a bridge across the river Potomac, with a draw which will permit the passage of vessels without much detention.

On the second point, whether the benefit to the public would be so great as to counterbalance the inconvenience which might eventually result to individuals from authorizing this measure, your committee have had less difficulty in forming their opinion. From a survey, said to be an accurate one, with which the committee have been furnished, it appears that the distance from Alexandria to Georgetown, (including the river,) by the present route, is eight miles and fifty-five poles; and from the ferry at Georgetown to the Capitol, three miles and a quarter; making, in the whole, eleven miles three-eighths and fifteen poles. From Alexandria to the Capitol, by the intended bridge, six miles and a half and nine poles, being less than the road at present travelled by five miles and seven-eighths. Hence it results, that that distance will be saved to those having communication between Alexandria and that part of the city lying in the vicinity of, and below the Capitol, and to persons travelling from north to south, and e converso.

The casualties, the delays, and the dangers to which the mails of the United States, as well as persons having occasion to pass from one side of the river to the other are subjected from the occurrence of storms, and the formation of ice on the river in winter, (both which occasionally render the Potomac impassable) are cogent circumstances in favor of the expediency of authorizing the erection of a bridge.

Your committee are not furnished with data whereon to form an accurate opinion of the actual saving of distance which will take place (in case of the erection of a bridge) in the transportation of the mails of the United States. This, however, from the facts just stated, must be considerable; and the diminution of expense will be proportionate to the diminution of distance.

On the whole, your committee are of opinion that the public interests will be greatly promoted by the erection of a bridge across the river Potomac, at or near the termination of the Maryland Avenue, in the city of Washington, to the county of Alexandria on the opposite side; and, in conformity with that opinion, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners, in favor of the erection of a bridge across the Potomac, is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

DISPUTED BOUNDARY BETWEEN GEORGIA AND NORTH CAROLINA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 12, 1806.

Mr. SPALDING made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, respecting disputed limits between that State and the State of North Carolina, having taken into consideration the matter of the said memorial, as well as such information as the documents attached to the memorial, and former reports made to this House, afford, beg leave to submit the following report:

Between the latitude of thirty-five degrees north, which is the southern boundary claimed by North Carolina, and the northern boundary of Georgia, as settled by a convention between that State and South Carolina, intervenes a tract of country supposed to be about twelve miles wide from north to south, and extending in length from the western boundary of Georgia, at Nicajack creek, on the Tennessee, to her northeastern limits on the Tugelo. This tract was, consequently, within the limits of South Carolina; and in the year 1787 it was ceded to the United States, who accepted the cession. This territory remained in possession of the United States until 1802, when it was ceded to the State of Georgia. From the most correct information relative to the said territory, it appears that it is inhabited by about eight hundred souls; and, to adopt the words of a former report, it is not shown at what period they made the settlement, nor had they any titles to the land on which they settled and made improvements. No such title, indeed, could have been created, as those lands remained within the boundary of the Cherokees until the year 1798, when a part of this territory was purchased by a treaty held at Tellico. It does not appear that the lines that bound the tract of land in question, and divide it from Carolina, have ever been established by public authority.

After the transfer of this territory by the United States to Georgia, the Legislature of that State, in compliance with the earnest request of those self-governed people, praying that they might be allowed to participate in the civil rights enjoyed in common by the people of the United States, passed an act in the year 1803, to organize the inhabited part of the territory, and to form it into a county; authorizing, at the same time, the Governor to appoint commissioners to meet such commissioners as should be appointed by the Government of North Carolina, to ascertain and plainly mark the line dividing this territory from North Carolina. The Governor of North Carolina expressed a readiness to accede to the proposition, under the provisions of a former act of the Legislature of that State, but clogged with a condition which the Legislature of North Carolina refused to depart from, and which the Legislature of Georgia refused to accede to. Her reason may be found in a letter from General Pickens, of the State of South Carolina, attached to a report made to this House respecting that territory while the property of the United States. The letter states, that before the people now inhabiting that territory settled on the lands, it was surveyed, and grants obtained for most part of it from the State of North Carolina, and probably by men who cared little whether the land was within the Indian claim or the limits of South Carolina. Your committee conceive that they have no right to enter into the feelings of either of the parties, or to pronounce upon the justice of the condition made by North Carolina on the one part, or its rejection by Georgia on the other; and have, therefore, confined their attention to that part of the memorial which calls upon Congress to define and mark out the thirty-fifth degree of latitude, the line which North Carolina admits to bound her State upon the south, and north of which Georgia can have no claim of territory. Your committee, after giving to this point the most deliberate consideration, are of opinion that the United States are bound in good faith to use their friendly offices with the State of North Carolina for obtaining an amicable adjustment of the limits of the territory which they have transferred to Georgia, in all parts where such limits may be disputed. Your committee, therefore, beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint a commissioner to meet such commissioners as may be appointed by the States of North Carolina and Georgia, for the purpose of ascertaining and running the line which divides the territory, transferred by the United States to Georgia, from North Carolina.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Friday, November 29, 1805.

The memorial of the Legislature of the State of Georgia to the Congress of the United States, respectfully sheweth:

That, by the second article of the articles of agreement and cession, entered into the twenty-fourth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, between the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States and the commissioners appointed on the part of the State of Georgia, the United States ceded to the State of Georgia whatever claims, right, or title they had to the jurisdiction or soil of any of the lands lying within the United States, and out of the proper boundaries of any other States, and situated south of the southern boundaries of the States of Tennessee, North and South Carolina, and east of the eastern boundary of the territory ceded by Georgia to the United States, in the first article of the said articles of agreement and cession; which territory so ceded was accepted by the State of Georgia on the sixteenth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and two. From the most correct information which has been collected relative to the said territory, it appears that it is inhabited by about eight hundred souls, over whom the State of North Carolina had never claimed or exercised jurisdiction, had never demanded or received contributions from them, nor extended the protecting arm of Government to them. The State of Georgia, solicitous to afford that protection and security which is due from the Government to its citizens, in compliance with the humble and earnest request of those self-governed people, praying that they might be admitted to participate in the natural and civil rights enjoyed by the rest of their fellow-citizens, on the tenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and three, passed an act to organize the inhabited parts of the said territory, and formed it into a county, by the name of Walton; and by the said act authorized the appointment of commissioners to meet any commissioners who might be appointed by North Carolina, to ascertain and plainly mark the line dividing the two States westward of the western boundary of the State of South Carolina to the eastern boundary of Tennessee. This act was transmitted by the Governor of Georgia to the Governor of North Carolina, with assurances of his readiness to appoint the said commissioners. The Governor of North Carolina, under the provisions of an act of the Legislature of that State, passed the seventh of December, one thousand eight hundred and three, for appointing commissioners to extend the boundary line of the said State and South Carolina, expressed a readiness to appoint commissioners to act in conjunction with those who should be appointed on the part of Georgia, provided the running of the line should not affect the titles of those who held land in the said territory under the grants of the said State. To this provision the Governor of Georgia could not accede, and the ascertaining and running the line was necessarily postponed until legislative interference should remove the difficulty. After the failure of the aforesaid application, the Governor of Georgia proceeded to organize the county of Walton, and to extend the fostering hand of Government to the inhabitants thereof. At this crisis an attempt was made by a few turbulent persons to prevent the operation of the laws of Georgia in that territory, alleging that the jurisdiction of North Carolina extended over the greater part thereof; but the county was so far organized, that an election was holden for representatives, who took their seats in the last Legislature of this State. To obviate all existing differences between the two States, the Legislature of Georgia, during their last annual session, on the tenth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, passed a second act for the appointment of commissioners to co-operate with those who might be appointed by North Carolina, the Legislature whereof also passed an act, at their last annual session, to extend the provisions of their act of one thousand eight hundred and three, so far as to include Georgia as well as South Carolina, but clogged with the same provision as to the legality of their grants. These two last-mentioned acts have been respectively transmitted by the Executive of each State to that of the other, and explanations have been reciprocally made, the result of which was a declaration on the part of the Governor of North Carolina, that although that State did not claim jurisdiction over the territory acquired by Georgia from the United States, yet she would not permit the line to be run, or the State of Georgia to exercise jurisdiction over the said territory and citizens, unless the grants of the description aforesaid should be previously acknowledged to be valid by the State of Georgia. This provision was by the Governor of Georgia held inadmissible, and no commissioners have been appointed. During the last recess of the Legislatures of the two States, a number of disorderly and lawless persons, acting, or pretending to act, under the authority of North Carolina, have invaded the rights of the good citizens of Walton county, and committed the most cruel outrages against their persons and property, have dragged a number of them from their peaceful habitations, and lodged them in the public jails of that State; and, by their violence and oppression, have compelled the wretched inhabitants of that territory to abandon their habitations, and fly for refuge from their oppressors, across the mountains, into the State of South Carolina, and the western counties of Georgia. Such is the dispersed situation of the inhabitants, and so complete is the state of disorganization which prevails in Walton county, that it is at this moment unrepresented in the Legislature of the State.

In rejecting the provision contained in the act of North Carolina, the Legislature of Georgia conceive that they have consulted the true interest of the citizens of and residents in that territory, a very small number of whom, if any, hold land under the State of North Carolina. To accede to the proposition of North Carolina would be improvident and unjust; improvident, because the State of Georgia has paid a valuable consideration for every acre of land in that territory; unjust, because the Legislature of Georgia are informed that large grants have issued to speculators and monopolizers, not only for the most part of that territory the Indian title to which is extinguished, but for a great part of that which is now the property of the aborigines.

The Legislature of Georgia, through every successive stage of these fruitless transactions, have felt with deep concern and tender solicitude for the situation of their unfortunate fellow-citizens, and have made every effort in their power, by direct applications to the State of North Carolina, to remove every obstacle to their peace and welfare. These applications have failed to produce the desired effect. It is with sincere regret that the Legislature of Georgia feels itself constrained to approach the representatives of the nation, and apply to the justice of the Supreme Legislature of the Union.

The Legislature of Georgia are impressed with the most solemn conviction that this application to the National Government is the only mode which is now left them to pursue, and the only source from which they can expect a termination of the contest between the two States; they therefore entreat the Congress of the United States to interpose, and cause the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude to be ascertained, and the line between the two States to be plainly marked. This will completely terminate the question of jurisdiction between the two States, as North Carolina never contended that her jurisdiction or limits extended south of the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude, and Georgia has never claimed jurisdiction north of that line.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA, LOUISVILLE, December 15, 1803.

I have the honor to transmit your excellency an extract of a law passed by the Legislature of this State on the 10th instant.

You will find it expressive of a wish, on the part of this Government, to have the dividing line between your State and the State of South Carolina extended north of the Blue Ridge; Georgia having acquired the territory which was ceded by South Carolina to the General Government, situated south of the southern boundaries of North Carolina and Tennessee.

Within that tract of country are found many settlers, and it is necessary that government should be extended over them. I have to request you, therefore, to lay the extract of the law before the Legislature of your State, in order that a co-operation of measures may be had in fixing the line of demarcation between our States. On being apprized of the steps taken by North Carolina on the subject, I shall appoint commissioners, and attend to such arrangements as may be necessary for carrying the object wished for into effect.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient servant,
JOHN MILLEDGE.

SIR:

RALEIGH, February 25, 1804.

Your excellency's letter of the 15th December last, with its enclosure, has been duly received, but not until after the Legislature of this State had risen. The enclosed authenticated copy of an act of the General Assembly of North Carolina was passed, to meet the wishes of the State of South Carolina, respecting boundary, and to settle a dispute on that subject that has subsisted for many years.

As a provision is made in that act for extending the line between North and South Carolina, until the same shall intersect the eastern line of the State of Tennessee, (the Legislature not adverting, it is presumed, to the circumstance of the western parts of South Carolina having become a part of Georgia,) I am of opinion that the commissioners on behalf of this State, after having extended the line between this State and South Carolina, with commissioners appointed by that State, to the western extremity thereof, will have the right, under the law, to extend, with commissioners appointed by your excellency, the same from thence to the eastern boundary of the State of Tennessee.

If your excellency thinks with me, that the law of this State will authorize the commissioners appointed under that law to fix the line of demarcation between our States, it will be desirable that commissioners should be sent forward at the same time, that those of South Carolina may meet those of this State, as thereby a considerable saving of expense would be made to North Carolina, without any additional expense to Georgia.

Your excellency shall be informed of the time and place of meeting of the commissioners of this State, and those of South Carolina, should that State have made provisions to co-operate in the above-mentioned measures.

Your excellency will pardon a seeming delay in not acknowledging the receipt of yours at an earlier day; being in daily expectation of hearing from the Governor of South Carolina on the same subject, was the reason it was postponed.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,
J. TURNER.

AN ACT appointing commissioners to extend the boundary line of this State and the State of South Carolina.

Whereas it is of high importance that the limits of this State should be accurately defined and ascertained: and whereas all former laws have heretofore failed to have the desired effect:

Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That there shall be appointed, by joint ballot of both Houses of the General Assembly, and commissioned by the Governor, three commissioners to meet the commissioners who already are, or hereafter may be, appointed by the State of South Carolina, at such time and place as the Executive of the two States shall or may direct, and with them to settle all and singular the differences, controversies, disputes, and claims, that may subsist between this State and the State of South Carolina; and to fix and establish permanently the boundary line between this State and the State of South Carolina; and the same to mark and ascertain as distinctly as may be, as far as the eastern boundary of the territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That the extension of the said line shall not affect the titles of any person or persons to the lands entered in either of the said States; and this State will, at all times hereafter, ratify and confirm all and whatsoever the said commissioners, or a majority of them, shall do in and touching the premises, by virtue of this act; and the same shall be binding on this State.

And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That the commissioners appointed in pursuance of this act shall, for their personal services, be allowed the sum of forty shillings per day, and forty shillings for every thirty miles in travelling to and from the business contemplated by this act; and they shall make a return of their proceedings to the next General Assembly, after the time they shall have perfected the purposes of their appointment. And further, said commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to employ one or more surveyors, and such number of markers as they, or majority of them, shall deem necessary; and there shall be allowed to each and every surveyor appointed by the commissioners forty shillings per day for their services, and forty shillings for every thirty miles in travelling to and from the duties imposed upon them by this act; and to each marker or chain-carrier twenty shillings for every day they shall be employed in running and marking the lines as aforesaid, and twenty shillings for every thirty miles in travelling to and from the duties imposed upon them by this act.

And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That in case of death, resignation, or refusal to act, of any of the commissioners herein appointed, the Governor of the State is hereby empowered to appoint and fill up any vacancy occasioned in manner as aforesaid; and that the Governor for the time being shall, as soon as may be, after the ratification of this act, transmit a copy thereof to the Executive of the State of South Carolina, accompanied with a request that the State of South Carolina should co-operate without delay with this State in effecting the purposes of this act.

And be it further enacted, That the Governor shall issue his warrant upon application of said commissioners, declaring that they are ready and about to proceed to the running of the said line, on the treasury, for the sum of two hundred pounds, and such further sum as the Governor may deem necessary for carrying this act into effect.

And be it further enacted, That all former acts and parts of acts, coming within the meaning of this act, are hereby repealed and made void.

Read three times, and ratified in General Assembly the seventh day of December, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and three.

SIR: EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA, LOUISVILLE, April 6, 1804.

I have had the satisfaction to receive your excellency's letter of the 25th of February last, in answer to the one I wrote you some time since, and regret much that my letter was not received early enough to have been laid before your Legislature when last in session. I have perused the act of your State, which you had the goodness to enclose me, and find that it vests the commissioners appointed under it with power to ascertain and mark the boundary line of North Carolina, as far as the State of Tennessee.

Though it was made to operate with commissioners to be appointed on the part of South Carolina, that State having long since ceded her territory west of the Blue Ridge of mountains to the United States, and the General Government having conveyed the same to Georgia, I feel no difficulty in appointing commissioners to co-operate with the commissioners under the act of your State, for the purpose of ascertaining and marking the line of limits between North Carolina and Georgia; but I cannot consent that titles to the lands entered in either of the States of North Carolina or South Carolina shall not be affected by the extension of the line, if such lands should fall within the limits of Georgia; because, while the territory in that quarter, which is now attached to Georgia, was vacant, the State of South Carolina yielded it to the General Government; and any grant given by either of the States for land within it must consequently be void.

It is highly important that the limits of States should be accurately ascertained and defined: as this is not the case in regard to North Carolina and Georgia, and it appears, from the acts of the two States, to be their wish to effect so desirable an object, the present opportunity ought, without hesitancy, in my opinion, to be embraced. If, therefore, your excellency will give the commissioners, on the part of your State, instructions accordingly, and notify me of the time and place at which they will attend, commissioners on the part of this State shall join them. I could wish this object to be accomplished as early as possible, as, by referring to the extract of the law I enclosed you, your excellency will perceive that it is not to take effect until the dividing line between the two States shall be run, provided it is done within six months after its passage.

I am, sir, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,
JOHN MILLEDGE.

His Excellency JAMES TURNER, Governor of the State of North Carolina.

SIR: RALEIGH, May 8, 1804.

The letter your excellency did me the honor to address to me the 6th ultimo I now have before me. I am informed by the Governor of South Carolina, that my letter to him, on the subject of boundary, with which was enclosed an authenticated copy of an act passed by our Legislature at their last session, on that subject, which letter was alluded to in mine to your excellency of the 25th of February last, was not received in time to be submitted to the Legislature of that State, at their last session. He informs me that an extra session of the Legislature of that State will be held in the present month; that he will submit to their consideration the law of this State, and entertains no doubt but such measures will be adopted by them as will tend finally to close the differences between the two States respecting boundary. Should that be the case, it is highly desirable, on the part of this State, that the line of demarcation between North Carolina and Georgia should be ascertained and marked at the same time. The proviso, made in the law of this State, to secure to individuals the entries of lands made in either State, (if any such there be,) is the only part of that law to which your excellency has objections. That proviso, in itself, is so just and reasonable, that I was persuaded no objections could be made to it. The policy of both nations and States, in similar situations, justified such a belief. The discontents, jealousies, controversies, and probably violences which might ensue, if such provision be not made, are such that I am persuaded your excellency, on more mature consideration, will be induced to entertain a different opinion than the one expressed in your letter to me on that subject. Upon those considerations I can, by no means, take upon myself the responsibility of instructing the commissioners, appointed by the Legislature of this State, to extend the line between North Carolina and Georgia, with commissioners on behalf of your State, unless that proviso is adopted by Georgia.

I will, in justice to the Legislature of this State, mention to your excellency that it is my belief that they have no knowledge of any lands being granted by this State that will fall in Georgia, on the lines being extended. I have seen a paragraph in the public papers, mentioning that the Legislature of your State would be in session in the course of the present month: should that information be correct, I should be glad if your excellency would represent the matter to them; and, if a similar proviso is adopted on the part of Georgia, it will be highly agreeable to me, and I am persuaded it will be to the Legislature, to finally ascertain and mark the line of limits between our States.

Your excellency shall be informed when and where the commissioners of this State and South Carolina meet, should that State (as is fully expected) make provision at the approaching session to co-operate with the measures of this State.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high consideration and respect,

Your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. TURNER.

His Excellency GOVERNOR MILLEDGE.

Copy of a letter to his excellency James Turner.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA, LOUISVILLE, May 23, 1804.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 8th instant, in answer to mine of the 6th ultimo. Impressed with the correctness of my objection to the proviso contained in the act, a copy of which you enclosed me, and having been vested by an act of this State with the power of making the necessary arrangements for running and marking the dividing line between our States, I did not think it necessary to lay the subject again before the Legislature; and your last letter did not reach me until that body had completed the business for which it was convened, and adjourned.

Had titles to the land which is now claimed by Georgia been given by either of the States of North or South Carolina, previous to its cession by the latter State to the United States, such a proviso might, in my conception, with more propriety than at present, be contended for. But when it is recollected that the titles (should there be any) entered in either North or South Carolina for that land was given at a time when it was the property of the General Government, the justice of my objection presents itself to me too forcibly to be conceded. If, therefore, your excellency will not consent to the running of the dividing line, under the superintendence of commissioners from both States, without a proviso on the part of Georgia, similar to the one made by North Carolina, that object cannot be in that way accomplished, until the Legislatures of the two States come to some understanding on the subject.

I am, sir, with great consideration, respectfully, your excellency's most obedient servant,

JOHN MILLEDGE.

A copy of a letter from his excellency the Governor of North Carolina, dated

SIR:

RALEIGH, October 20, 1804.

Information has been lately made to me, by one of the representatives to our State Legislature for the county of Buncombe, that the State of Georgia had assumed jurisdiction over a settlement which lies on the head of French Broad river and the waters thereof, which settlement was made under, and has ever since been subject to, the laws of North Carolina, and is within the limits and jurisdiction of Buncombe county. The information states that the civil officers of this State are impeded in the performance of their duties, and that considerable confusion, in consequence thereof, is likely to ensue.

Your excellency well knows that the first representation made by Gurgin to this State, claiming, under the convention with the United States, the territory, of which that settlement is by Georgia supposed to be a part, and the wish to have the boundary line between the two States ascertained and marked, were contained in your letter to me of the 15th of December last, with which was enclosed an extract of a law of Georgia, passed at their then late session, providing for ascertaining and fixing the line of demarcation between that and this State, and for other purposes. It is also known to your excellency that that communication was not received until after the Legislature of this State had risen; of course they had not, nor will they have, an opportunity of acting on those propositions until their next annual meeting, which will be on the third Monday in next month.

From these circumstances being known to your excellency, I was really surprised on hearing that Georgia had extended her jurisdiction so as to interfere with that of North Carolina, and that, before the claim set up by Georgia had ever come, or even had an opportunity of officially coming, to the knowledge of the Legislature of this State; and more particularly when your excellency had just reasons to believe, from the letters which had passed between us, that North Carolina would promptly adopt measures, to co-operate with those of Georgia, to ascertain and finally fix the line of demarcation between the two States.

Had the information respecting the assumption of jurisdiction by Georgia been received at any other period than that so immediately preceding the meeting of the Legislatures of the two States, I certainly should (however disagreeable the consequences might have been) have deemed it my duty to have enforced the execution of the laws of this State in that quarter, and to have continued their authority until the line between the two States should be ascertained; but, being fully impressed with the belief that the Legislature of North Carolina is truly desirous of having the limits of the State accurately defined and marked, and that they will, at their approaching session, make ample provision for that purpose, I shall let the matter be over until their meeting. From the perusal of your excellency's favor of the 23d May last, which was duly received, I find you still adhere to your opinion, that it would be wrong for Georgia to agree to confirm the titles of lands, which may be granted by either of the States, that may fall into the other, on the lines being established. On that subject I entertain the same opinion I heretofore expressed.

To disturb or nullify titles to lands which individuals have honestly acquired, would be cruel to the last degree, and a matter of more serious consequence, and probably more difficult to reconcile, than at first view would appear, especially in quarters the furthest removed from the seat of Government of each of the States; though this is quite an abstract question from ascertaining and marking the line, and which either State may adopt or reject, as their feelings or policy may dictate.

I shall submit the extract of the law, forwarded to me by your excellency, and the correspondence which has taken place between us since, to the consideration of the approaching session of the Legislature; and I make no doubt but they will adopt such measures as will, by a co-operation on the part of Georgia, tend to the ascertaining and finally fixing the line of demarcation between our States.

Your excellency may rest assured, that, as far as I can, consistent with my duty, be instrumental in accomplishing so desirable an object, I shall do it with pleasure.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration and respect,

Your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

J. TURNER.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR of the State of Georgia.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA, LOUISVILLE, December 11, 1804.

I have the honor to transmit your excellency an official copy of an act of the General Assembly of this State, passed the 10th instant. The importance of the subject to which it relates induces me to request that you will lay it before the Legislature of your State, should they be in session when you receive this letter.

If commissioners are appointed on the part of North Carolina for designating the line of limits between the two States, on your excellency's notifying me of the same, agreeably to the power I am vested with, I shall immediately appoint commissioners to join them.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,

JOHN MILLEDGE.

---

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, NORTH CAROLINA, RALEIGH, December 26, 1805.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose herewith to your excellency an authenticated copy of an act of the General Assembly of this State, passed at their late session, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act appointing commissioners to extend the boundary line of this State and the State of South Carolina,'" passed at Raleigh, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three. Your excellency will observe that, by this amendment, the provisions of the act of eighteen hundred and three, made for the purpose of extending the boundary line between this State and South Carolina, is extended to Georgia, for the same purpose.

If the Legislature of Georgia has made provisions to co-operate with the measures of this State, it is desirable that the business be proceeded on immediately. So soon as I am informed of their having done so, I shall be ready to fix with your excellency the time and place of meeting of the commissioners.

Your excellency, I am persuaded, is fully impressed with the importance of having the line of demarcation between our two States accurately defined and marked. Irregularities, I have understood, have already taken place; and if that country remains in its present situation, further disturbances may be expected, and probably of more serious consequences.

Your excellency may be assured, that as far as I can contribute to the amicable accomplishment of so desirable an object, consistent with my duty and the laws of the State, it will afford me particular pleasure.

I have the honor to be, with respect and esteem,

Your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

J. TURNER.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR of Georgia.

AN ACT to amend an act entitled "An act appointing commissioners to extend the boundary line of this State, and the State of South Carolina," passed at Raleigh, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That from and after the passing of this act, the Governor, for the time being, and his successor, shall be, and he is hereby, vested with full power and authority to enter into any compact or agreement that he may deem most advisable for the interest of this State, with the legislative or executive powers of the States of South Carolina and Georgia, relative to the establishing permanently the boundary line between this State and the said States of South Carolina and Georgia, and for the extension of the same: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to affect any part or clause of the above-recited act.

SIR:

RALEIGH, January 8, 1805.

I had the honor of enclosing to you, the 26th ultimo, the copy of an act of our Legislature, passed at their late session, extending the provisions of an act passed in 1803 for ascertaining and fixing the boundary line between this State and South Carolina to Georgia. Since which time, I have received your excellency's favor of the 11th ultimo; also, the act of your State for the same purpose.

By a perusal of the act last forwarded to your excellency, the following proviso will be observed: "Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to affect any part or clause of the above-recited act;" which confines the Executive of this State, in any agreement he may make with Georgia on the subject of boundary, to the provisions of the first-mentioned act.

It is presumed your excellency has authority given to comply with the terms of that act by the late act of Georgia, which authorizes and requires you to appoint commissioners with full and competent power, &c.

If your excellency think proper to proceed on those terms, and will name the time and place for the commissioners to meet, I will direct the commissioners, on the part of this State, to attend them. The month of March appears to me the most proper time; but, should your excellency think any other preferable, I shall have no particular objections, provided it is not later than the middle of April.

For the same reasons mentioned in mine to your excellency of the 26th ultimo, it is desirable that something should be done as soon as possible.

Be assured it will afford me pleasure if we can adjust this matter to the satisfaction of the citizens of each of our States.

I have the honor to be, with high respect and consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. TURNER.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR of Georgia.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA, LOUISVILLE, February 5, 1805.

Your two letters, one of the 26th of December, with its enclosure, and the other of the 8th of January, I had the honor to receive by the last northern mail. I find that the Legislature of North Carolina has not in the least removed the difficulty by their late act, which I objected to in 1803. It is probable the Legislature of this State will be in session the latter end of April or first of May next, which will afford me an opportunity of laying your communication to me before them. If circumstances should not authorize an extraordinary call at the time I have mentioned, I will then apprise you of the measures I shall pursue; in the mean time, I feel persuaded that your excellency will use every proper measure to discountenance irregularities by the citizens of your State on the inhabitants residing on the land the subject of controversy. I have this day received a letter from that quarter; and the outrages which are represented to me as having been committed by an armed force, said to be sent on purpose from one of the counties of your State, resembles more the doings of men warring against an enemy, than the acts of citizens of the same nation towards each other; more especially, as the right of jurisdiction still remains matter of doubt between the two States.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

JOHN MILLEDGE.

A copy of a letter to his excellency James Turner, Governor of the State of North Carolina.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA, LOUISVILLE, February 17, 1805.

Since writing you on the 5th instant, two persons of respectable character, residing in the settlement at the head of French Broad river, now called Walton county, have visited this place. I herewith enclose you copies of affidavits which they have laid before me, stating the impressions under which they settled in that county, the subsequent steps taken by them, and the outrages committed within the settlement by the citizens of North Carolina.

The situation of those people must, in my opinion, be viewed by every dispassionate person as truly deplorable. If I am correctly informed of the history of the tract of country whereon they reside, I believe it to be this: Some short time previous to the year 1786, several individuals of the State of South Carolina formed themselves into a company, and obtained a grant or grants from that State for the lands which are now within the limits of Walton county; in 1786, the Legislature of South Carolina annulled the grants, as being improperly obtained; and, in the year following, ceded that country to the General Government; and Congress (the North Carolina representation being present) accepted of the cession, according to the limits particularly specified in the deed of South Carolina. You will find, from a perusal of one of the affidavits, that the people settled on the land ceded by South Carolina to the United States, who are the same that now reside within the limits of Walton county, never contributed, by the payment of taxes, to the support of the Government of North Carolina, nor did your State attempt to demand it from them, it being generally acknowledged that they resided without her limits. Thus circumstanced, and desirous of living under some regular constituted authority, they applied to the State of South Carolina to be admitted as members of her Government, long before the deed of cession and agreement between the General Government and this State was entered into; they received for answer to their application, that South Carolina had yielded her right to the land on which they lived to the United States. They then petitioned Congress at different sessions, stating fully their situation, and requesting that Congress would retrocede the territory to South Carolina. This, however, was also denied them. They then brought with them to this place, while the Legislature of the State was in session, in the year 1803, the decision of Congress relative to their last memorial to that body, by which they were referred to Georgia. With a full view of all the circumstances I have mentioned, this State extended her government over them, not calculating in the least that the State of North Carolina, who had remained silent and inactive both as it regarded the conduct of the State of South Carolina and the settlers, would ultimately contend on any principle for the right of soil. Georgia obtained the district of country described in the deed of cession of South Carolina from the General Government, by giving a valuable consideration for it; in doing so, the desire of an extension of jurisdiction did not so much influence her as the value of the soil. Should she agree to the running of the line under the provision of the act of North Carolina, there would not be, if the information I have had is correct, a single acre at her disposal, the whole being covered by grants of North Carolina, and what extent of country those grants might embrace is uncertain. Further, it is a principle justly established in law, that to make an act binding on each party, there must be some show of reciprocity. From the provision of the act of your State, Georgia derives no advantage; North Carolina has the entire benefit. The provision, however, as it regards South Carolina, is correct. It would have been unjust that the citizens of your State, or those of South Carolina, who claim under ancient grants, should be dispossessed of their lands, on finding, by adjusting the boundary line, that they were thrown without the State they had derived their title from; but Georgia having never granted a single acre of land in the settlement in question, or near the boundary line of the two States, there is not the least prospect that any of her citizens will have, upon the limits being extended, a claim upon land within the limits of your State. The provision, therefore, ought to extend no further than South Carolina has exercised her patent authority, and she never legally extended it west of the ridge of mountains which is now the dividing line between that State and Walton county. If the persons claiming under North Carolina were the actual inhabitants at the head of French Broad, who have encountered all the difficulties attendant on settling a mountainous and frontier country, then, indeed, would the zeal which North Carolina discovers on this occasion be truly laudable; but when there is every reason to apprehend that, if her wish is consented to by this State, grants, some of which, if information says true, were obtained previous to the extinguishment of the Indian title, and some after the territory was known to be ceded to Georgia, will be confirmed to persons who reside at a considerable distance from the land, and who were induced to run it from motives of speculation only. I cannot feel justified in consenting that the proviso of the act of your State shall extend to this. I have to assure your excellency that there is not a State in the Union more desirous than Georgia to be on terms of harmony and good-will with her sister States, or that would more deeply regret any cause which would induce her to depart from that good understanding which it is her anxious wish to maintain with the respective States; and that there is no measure to obviate or remove any cause of dispute or irritation, consistent with the principles of justice and propriety, but the State would cheerfully acquiesce in. But from a mature examination of all the circumstances of this case, I feel myself bound to say that I cannot consent to the running the line under the provision of the act of your State, and dissent to the same.

In order, however, to restore harmony, and prevent further disturbances among the inhabitants of Walton county and those of your State, I feel persuaded that your excellency can have no objection to have the boundary line run, and let the proviso of your act be a subject for the after deliberation of the Legislatures of the two States. Should this proposition meet with your assent, you have only to notify me, and commissioners on the part of this State shall be appointed, and your excellency shall be apprized of the time and place at which they will meet those of North Carolina. In the mean time, I have to request that your excellency will discountenance, and by proper measures prevent, the outrages which the citizens of North Carolina are in the practice of committing on the unfortunate persons residing on the land, the subject of controversy.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,
JOHN MILLEDGE.

GEORGIA, Jefferson county:

Personally appeared Richard Williamson, of the county of Walton and State aforesaid, who being duly sworn, depose and saith: that, on the 19th day of December last, his county was invaded by a band of armed men, about the number of sixty or seventy, from the county of Buncombe and State of North Carolina, who were joined by twenty-four men, citizens of his own county, and there, with force and arms, did take him (said Williamson) with nine other citizens of his county prisoners, and removed them, under guard, to Buncombe county, North Carolina, and confined them in the jail of said county for several days, upon no other charge than executing the laws of Georgia in said Walton county.

GEORGIA, Jefferson county:

Personally appeared, Richard Williamson and Reuben Allen, both of the county of Walton and State aforesaid, who being duly sworn, depose and saith: that they both settled in that country in the years 1793 and 1794, under a full conviction that the lands on which they resided and made settlement were within the limits of South Carolina, until sometime afterward being informed that South Carolina had ceded that tract of country to the General Government. We then remonstrated to the Government of the United States to recede said tract of country to South Carolina again; some time afterwards we received information that Congress had ceded said tract of country to Georgia; and further saith, that they never paid any tax, nor were taxes exacted of them from the State of North Carolina, nor ever applied to the Government of North Carolina for protection.

A copy of a letter from his excellency James Turner, Governor of the State of North Carolina.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, NORTH CAROLINA.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's favor of the 17th February last, covering two affidavits, which came to hand but a few days past; for the cause of such a long passage I am at a loss to account.

I wrote your excellency the 12th of that month, and enclosed an extract from a letter I had received from Joshua Williams, Esq., one of the members of the Legislature from the county of Buncombe, on the subject-matter contained in the affidavits your excellency enclosed, which, when received, I hope explained satisfactorily what actuated the citizens of North Carolina in doing what your excellency deems an outrage on the citizens of Walton county.

The situation of any people must be truly deplorable, when a due course of law and justice cannot be exercised; but doubly so when jurisdiction is claimed and alternately exercised by different Governments, and the people divided in opinion among themselves, as to which of the Governments jurisdiction rightly belongs. Such, if I am rightly informed, is the situation in which the settlers at the head of French Broad river at present are placed; and thus they are doomed to remain, by the dissent your excellency has made to one of the most important principles contained in the laws of North Carolina passed for the purpose of adjusting the boundary between our States, until a meeting of the Legislatures of the two States shall take place, and relieve them, by enacting such laws as will insure the boundary between the States to be ascertained.

The history your excellency has given respecting the manner the territory ceded by South Carolina to the United States was acquired by Georgia, I believe correct; and that the impressions of many might be the same, in settling on that territory, as those of the persons whose affidavits you have enclosed me, I am not disposed to doubt; for it is well known that there were settlers on that territory which North Carolina never did consider under her jurisdiction or within her limits.

Had Georgia extended her jurisdiction no further than over the settlers of that description, her right of doing so would not have been questioned by North Carolina, neither would there have been any interference of jurisdiction; but there are settlers of another description, said by Georgia to be on that territory, and over whom she claims jurisdiction. Her right of doing so never has been, nor ever will be, acknowledged by North Carolina, until the boundary between the two States is ascertained, and it shall appear to be her right.

It has been the cause of no small inquiry, to know by what right or by what authority Georgia has assumed jurisdiction over a tract of territory settled by, and at all times considered by the citizens themselves, as well as by Government, under the jurisdiction of North Carolina. Surely, it will not be contended for, on behalf of Georgia, that North Carolina ought to relinquish the jurisdiction which she has exercised for many years over a settlement which she believes to be within her boundary, and without being even consulted on the occasion, merely because Georgia may imagine herself entitled to it.

If I am rightly informed as to the cause of an interference of jurisdiction between North Carolina and Georgia, it is this: the line between North Carolina and South Carolina never was extended (if as far) beyond the Blue Ridge of mountains which now divides South Carolina and Georgia. When North Carolina extended her settlements to the west of those mountains, and established the county of Buncombe, which was bounded on the south by South Carolina, there was nothing to direct the citizens (who in frontier countries are not the best informed as to fixing on proper degrees of latitude) where the limits of the State probably would be. Under these circumstances, entries of land were made, and titles granted to a number of individuals who settled on them, believing, at the time, they were within the limits of North Carolina, and still continue in that opinion, although Georgia claims jurisdiction over them.

The honest and innocent individuals of the above description, "who encountered all the difficulties attendant on settling a mountainous and frontier country," whose rights may be affected on running the line, are the persons which North Carolina discovers such "zeal" to protect in their property, honestly acquired, as well as to preserve her faith inviolate; that induces her strenuously to insist on the titles to lands, granted by either of the States, to be confirmed on the lines being run, not because the advantage may be thought to be on her side, and that she may be benefited in a pecuniary point of view—such a principle she disdains, and the sacrifices she has heretofore made, on similar occasions, are sufficient proof of it—but because she considers the faith of a State, when fairly and honestly pledged to individuals, sacred, and not to be violated or broken but in the most extreme cases; denying, in the most positive and unequivocal manner, that she ever granted an acre of land knowingly without her limits.

The information your excellency has received, and that which I have been able to collect, respecting the quantity of land granted by North Carolina, either previous or subsequent to Georgia's having acquired the territory ceded by South Carolina to the General Government, within that territory, is very different. The information I have received on the subject is, that but a small quantity, if any, of either description, will be affected, should the proviso in the act of North Carolina be consented to by Georgia. As to the grants of former description, no knowledge can be obtained but from the opinions of those acquainted with the transactions of that country; but of the latter, some opinion, though not a correct one, may be formed. The enclosed paper, which I have procured from the Secretary's office, and which may be relied on as correct, contains a list of every grant, and the number of acres in each, that have issued to the county of Buncombe, (the only county grants can issue to, by which Georgia can be affected,) since April, 1802, (the time Georgia acquired that territory;) from a view of which, I am persuaded, your excellency will think, with me, that, to judge from the quantities contained in the several grants, but a small quantity, if any, was entered or secured through motives of speculation; nor will the quantity granted appear otherwise than small, when the situation and extent of that country are viewed, it being one hundred and thirty miles in extent and from sixty to seventy in breadth, the most recently settled of any other county in the State, and abounds, in every part, in unappropriated lands. Allowing a proportionate quantity of the land granted to be in the quarter to affect Georgia, it cannot be an object with her, who abounds as much, or probably more, than any other State in the Union in unappropriated lands, to insist on the establishment of a principle that manifestly tends to individual oppression.

Your excellency's apprehensions, therefore, that the whole of the territory in question is covered by the grants of North Carolina, I conceive are not well founded. Neither is your information correct, if I am rightly informed, that very few of the inhabitants on the territory in question are holders of land granted by North Carolina, but that the holders under the North Carolina grants reside at a considerable distance from the land. Should the boundary of Georgia extend as far north as she claims jurisdiction, my information induces me to believe that many of the present inhabitants are holders of land under North Carolina titles, which will become forfeited, unless the proviso mentioned is agreed to by Georgia.

The usage of nations, as well as the uniform policy adopted by every State in the Union, (Georgia, in this instance, excepted,) on fixing their boundary with a sister State, tends to prove that individuals' property, in such cases, ought to be protected; and as the territory in question, at the time it was acquired by Georgia, was known by her to be in the situation it now is, as respects the line and the lands entered, or very nearly so, there appears no reason, founded on justice, why she should depart from the uniform custom that has prevailed.

Your excellency may be assured that North Carolina is as truly desirous as Georgia can be, and as much so as any State in the Union, of living on terms of harmony and good understanding with her sister States; nor is there a State in the Union who would regret more than she would a departure on her part from those just principles which free and independent States ought at all times to observe towards each other; nor would she on the present occasion persevere with such earnestness, were she not fully persuaded of the justness of the principle for which she contends.

On mature reflection, I am compelled to decline acceding to the proposition made by your excellency, of running the line between our States, and leaving the question of the proviso in the act of this State to the after deliberation of the Legislatures of the two States, from a thorough belief that, were I to accede to it, I should be acting directly in opposition to the known will and intention of the Legislature, and contrary, in my opinion, to propriety; nor do I think that any partial proceedings would be attended with beneficial effects; indeed, it is to be apprehended they might tend to irritate more than conciliate.

I have, and shall continue to discountenance, by every means in my power, all outrages and violences, on the part of the citizens of North Carolina, towards those of Georgia, in the quarter now the subject of controversy; and hope the like will be done by your excellency, on the part of the citizens of your State, to prevent, as far as possible, those animosities which but too frequently prevail in such cases.

I very much lament that so desirable an object as that of having the line ascertained and marked between the two States must be postponed for such a length of time; but it appears inevitable, under the laws of this State, while your excellency retains your present opinion.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. TURNER.

AN ACT to lay out and establish a county in the territory lately acquired by cession from the General Government.

Whereas, by certain articles of agreement and cession entered into on the 24th day of April, 1802, by and between the commissioners of the State of Georgia on the one part, and the commissioners of the United States on the other part, a tract of territory, situated south of the southern boundary of the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, and adjoining this State, was ceded by the United States to the State of Georgia; and whereas the Indian claim to that part of the said territory lying at the head of French Broad river, and within the following boundaries, to wit: beginning on the summit of the ridge of mountains called the Blue Ridge, where the same is crossed by the latitude thirty-five degrees north of the equator; thence, with the said ridge of mountains, to the temporary boundary line, run by General Pickens, between the Cherokee tribe of Indians and the State of South Carolina; along the said boundary line, north, forty-five degrees east, to an ash tree, at the distance of forty miles on the said line from Tugalo river, near the mouth of Brass Town creek; thence, along the boundary line run by Colonel Meigs, under the authority of Congress, north, fifty degrees west, to the intersection of the said line with parallel of latitude thirty-five degrees north of the equator; thence, along the said parallel of latitude, to the summit of the Blue Ridge aforesaid, was extinguished by treaty held and concluded near Tellico, on the 2d day of October, 1798; and a considerable settlement has been formed thereat, and the inhabitants thereof have petitioned this Legislature to be incorporated in the Government of this State:

SEC. 1. Be it therefore enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, in General Assembly met, That the territory lying within the boundary last mentioned, to which the Indian claim hath been extinguished, shall be a county, to be called and known by the name of Walton.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That Richard Williamson, Kitt Smith, James Lefoy, Ebenezer Fain, and Reyben Allen, be, and they are hereby, appointed justices of the inferior court of the said county, which court shall have the same powers and jurisdiction as the inferior courts of other counties within this State.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the justices of the inferior court aforesaid, or any three or more of them, shall be, and they are hereby, invested with full power and authority to decide and fix upon some convenient situation, as nearly central as circumstances will admit of, on which shall be erected a court-house and jail; to define the militia company districts, not exceeding two in the said county, which shall be added to and become a part of the third brigade of the third division of the militia of this State; to appoint two constables, one for each militia company district, who shall severally hold their appointments for two years from and after the date of their appointments, and until successors shall be appointed and qualified; to levy a county tax on the inhabitants of the said county, in such manner as they may deem least oppressive, for the purpose of raising a fund for building the court-house and jail, and other county purposes; and to appoint a collector to collect the same, who shall give bond, in the penalty of double the sum to be collected, with such security as the said justices may approve of, for the faithful discharge of his duty and the trust reposed in him.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, until a court-house shall be completed at the permanent seat, to be fixed upon as aforesaid, the court shall be holden, and other public business of the county transacted, at the dwelling-house of William Allen.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the justices of the inferior court aforesaid, or any three or more of them, shall assemble at the place herein before pointed out for holding courts, on the first Monday in January, 1804; and after publicly administering to each other, and severally subscribing the oaths prescribed by the laws and constitution of this State to be administered to the justices of the inferior courts, they shall nominate two justices of the peace in each militia company district, and transmit such nomination to his excellency the Governor, without delay, in order that commissions may issue for such justices of the peace.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said county shall be entitled to elect and return one senator and one representative to the Legislature, under the same regulations and restrictions as other counties in this State; and to elect militia officers in the manner pointed out by the militia laws of this State.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said justices of the inferior court, or any two or more of them, to give notice at the place appointed for holding courts, and at two other of the most public places within the county, twenty days previous to the day appointed for holding an election, and shall hold an election for clerk of the said court, sheriff, coroner, and county surveyor, which election shall be by ballot of all the free male citizens of the said county above the age of twenty-one years, and shall be opened, held, and conducted by the said justices, in the same manner as other elections for county officers are held within this State; and the persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected, and shall hold their offices during the time prescribed by the laws and constitution of this State, and shall be commissioned by the Governor, and take the oaths of office prescribed by law.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all free white persons, citizens of the United States, being actual settlers within the limits of the said county on the 16th day of May last past, who may henceforward conform to the laws and Government of this State, shall be entitled to a preference, founded on occupancy, to the lands on which such persons were so settled, not exceeding two hundred acres to any one family, and shall receive grants for the same, free of purchase, office fees excepted, when, or so soon after as an office shall be opened for granting out the said land, as circumstances will permit.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That his excellency the Governor be authorized, and he is hereby requested, to make immediate application to the Government of North Carolina to co-operate with this State in running out and plainly marking the dividing line between the States, without delay, and for this purpose to appoint three fit and proper persons, with full power, on the part of this State, to join such persons as may be appointed with like powers, on the part of the State of North Carolina, to run and plainly mark the said dividing line. And this act shall stand suspended, and not take effect, until the aforesaid line shall have been run accordingly; provided the same shall be so run and marked within six months of the passing of this act.

AN ACT appointing commissioners for ascertaining and fixing the dividing line between this State and the State of North Carolina.

Whereas, by an act of the Legislature of South Carolina, passed the eighth day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, certain delegates were fully authorized to assign over to the United States all that tract of territory within the chartered limits of the said State, lying and being within the boundaries and limits hereinafter described, that is to say, all the territory or tract of country included within the river Mississippi and a line beginning at that part of the said river Mississippi which is intersected by the southern boundary line of North Carolina, and continuing along the said boundary line until it shall intersect a ridge or chain of mountains which divides the eastern from the western waters; thence along the said ridge of mountains to where it intersects a line to be drawn due west from the head of the southern branch of Tugaloo river to the said mountains, and thence to run a due west course to the river Mississippi; and whereas the United States did accept of a deed of cession, executed by the said delegates in due form, on the seventh day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven: and whereas, that previous to the date of the aforesaid deed of cession, that is to say, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-two, the Governors of the then provinces of North and South Carolina, by virtue of an order of George the Third, King of Great Britain, appointed commissioners to alter the line between the two provinces aforesaid, now States of North and South Carolina, which said line was actually run and ascertained by the said commissioners; and that the said line was continued from the end of the line northwest from Little River, a due west course, to the lands belonging to the Catawba nation of Indians; thence northwardly with their lands, so as to leave the same in South Carolina; thence due west; by which proceeding it evidently appears that all the land comprehended within the limits of Walton county, and as far as the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude, continued to be the property of South Carolina, until their deed of cession to the United States: and whereas articles of agreement and cession were entered into, and signed, sealed, and executed by commissioners duly authorized by the United States and this State, respectively, on the twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and two, which were ratified by this State on the sixteenth day of June following, by which articles of agreement and cession aforesaid the United States conveyed to this State both the right of soil and jurisdiction to all the territory within the aforesaid boundaries and limits which the State of South Carolina had any claim to at the time that State made a cession of the same to the General Government:

And whereas the State of Georgia did, being vested by the articles of agreement and cession aforesaid with the right of soil and jurisdiction of the lands within the limits of the county of Walton, pass an act on the tenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and three, entitled "An act to establish a county in the territory lately acquired by a cession of the United States," which said act has been carried completely into effect; and the said county of Walton, in pursuance of the same, hath been duly organized, and the authority of this State exercised therein:

And whereas it is necessary that commissioners, on the part and behalf of this State, should be appointed to meet any commissioners which may hereafter be appointed by the State of North Carolina for the purpose of marking more plainly the line, in every part, designating the county of Walton.

SEC. 1. Be it therefore enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, in general assembly met, and by the authority of the same, That his excellency the Governor be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to appoint two or more fit and proper persons, as commissioners on the part and behalf of this State, with full and competent power, to meet any two or more commissioners that may be appointed by the State of North Carolina for the purpose of designating more plainly and clearly the lines of the aforesaid county of Walton.

SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 13, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

It is to us a subject of deep regret that circumstances once more command an address to you in the language of solicitation. In thus calling your attention from objects of importance to those which may perhaps be deemed of inferior moment, we are not actuated by an ignoble passion for renown. Far otherwise; we are perfectly content to pass down the stream of time unnoticed by the world, unrewarded by celebrity. If the purposes which we hold up to view for attainment are but accomplished, entire satisfaction will be ours, though fame record not our actions. The existence of injustice and a wish to eradicate it, have alone drawn us from the obscurity of private life.

Sources of affliction still force themselves upon the feelings of your memorialists in viewing the land of their nativity and affection. Though the horizon in some places has resumed its native lustre, dark clouds intercept its splendor in others. We still hear the clanking fetters of slavery in the dominions of liberty; and we hear them with increasing noise.

That the cause of this injurious change should be legalized, we can but lament. We ask not the interposition of Congress. Though it is believed to be within their inclination, we know it is beyond their power. The object of this memorial is the removal of other evils.

Eminence in the slave trade has long disgracefully distinguished a number of the citizens of an eastern State. Regardless of their own or their country's reputation, they have long been the inhuman forgers of chains for the sons of Africa. By their means the American flag still continues to flutter on an insulted territory, the witness of the greatest enormities. Parents are torn from children, husbands from wives; in a word, thousands of freemen are annually dragged into slavery, through the instrumentality of the vessels, the citizens, and the produce of the United States; and this, too, in undisguised contravention of the laws of their country. To one of the practices, to which the African traders of the place alluded to have resorted for escaping even a chance of punishment, we beg leave to call the attention of the wisdom of the Union. We say chance of punishment, for he who there dares to step forward to assert the laws of the land hazards his life.

It is declared, in the first section of an act of Congress, passed May 10, 1800, unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person residing within the United States, directly or indirectly, to hold any right or property in any vessel employed in the transportation of slaves from one foreign country to another; and any right or property belonging as aforesaid shall be forfeited, and may be libelled and condemned for the use of the person who shall sue for the same, &c. Under this act, giving the whole forfeiture to the informer, the vessels of those who incur its penalties are libelled and condemned by collusion with their friends. The defendants, by this mockery of justice, purge their vessels from crime, subjecting themselves merely to an inconsiderable expense. From unquestionable authority we are assured of several evasions of this description. To prevent them, and strengthen the provisions of the acts generally upon the subject of the slave trade, we would suggest to Congress the propriety of such an alteration in the law as to entitle the United States, in all cases, to a proportion of the condemned article; and annexing to the persons engaged in this traffic (since shame is a powerful motive to action) a disqualification to hold any office under the United States.

Your memorialists would further suggest another alteration of the penal code. By the same law of 1800, voluntarily serving on board vessels employed in the transportation of slaves from one foreign country to another is declared unlawful. The punishment of this offence is directed to be by indictment. By the existing law, criminal prosecutions can only be supported, with some few exceptions, by viva voce testimony. The accused, upon the trial, must be confronted by the witnesses against him. To seamen the knowledge of infractions of the part of the law last alluded to is usually confined. Persons whose avocations constantly lead them from their homes to distant places, and whose attendance at trial it is of course generally impossible to secure, without subjecting them to the palpable injustice of confinement, or an inconvenience equally great, that of compelling by surety their presence at a particular day, on which, unexpectedly and unavoidably, they may be hundreds of miles from the scene of trial. This difficulty, it is apprehended, would be obviated by removing from written testimony the objection to which it is now liable in criminal prosecutions under the law of 1800, and giving it, in such cases, the force which it possesses in civil actions. We have not been able to discover any objection to depositions fairly taken in the presence of prosecutor and prosecuted. It is, however, with great deference, submitted to the superior judgment of Congress.

We hope that, in thus concisely urging upon your notice some apprehended defects in the laws for the discouragement of the worst of crimes, impertinence will not be discoverable. Though the prospect is brightening on the eye of humanity, though the period rapidly advances in which Congress will acquire a capacity of performing, by a single unexpensive act, more good than perhaps ever fell to the lot of a Legislature to accomplish, we have not, hence, conceived ourselves at liberty to view with inactive zeal present excesses, to remedy which a competent authority exists.

Signed, by order of the American convention for promoting the abolition of slavery, &c., held at Philadelphia, from the 13th to the 15th day of January, 1806.

EXTENSION OF THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE, AND THE ADMISSION OF SLAVERY, FOR A LIMITED TIME, IN THE INDIANA TERRITORY, AND THE DIVISION THEREOF.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 14, 1806.

Mr. GARNETT, from the committee to whom were referred the report of a select committee, made on the 17th of February, 1804, on a letter of William Henry Harrison, president of a convention held at Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory, declaring the consent of the people of the said Territory to a suspension of the sixth article of compact between the United States and the said people; also on a memorial and petition of the inhabitants of the said Territory; also on the petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the said Territory; together with the petition of certain purchasers of land, settled and intending to settle on that part of the Indiana Territory west of Ohio, and east of the boundary line running from the mouth of the Kentucky river; and on two memorials from the inhabitants of Randolph and St. Clair—made the following report:

That, having attentively considered the facts stated in the said petitions and memorials, they are of opinion that a qualified suspension, for a limited time, of the sixth article of compact between the original States and the people and States west of the river Ohio, would be beneficial to the people of the Indiana Territory. The suspension of this article is an object almost universally desired in that Territory. It appears to your committee to be a question entirely different from that between slavery and freedom, inasmuch as it would merely occasion the removal of persons, already slaves, from one part of the country to another. The good effects of this suspension, in the present instance, would be to accelerate the population of that Territory, hitherto retarded by the operation of that article of compact, as slave-holders emigrating into the Western country might then indulge any preference which they might feel for a settlement in the Indiana Territory, instead of seeking, as they are now compelled to do, settlements in other States or countries permitting the introduction of slaves. The condition of the slaves themselves would be much ameliorated by it, as it is evident, from experience, that the more they are separated and diffused, the more care and attention are bestowed on them by their masters, each proprietor having it in his power to increase their comforts and conveniences in proportion to the smallness of their numbers. The dangers, too, (if any are to be apprehended,) from too large a black population existing in any one section of country, would certainly be very much diminished, if not entirely removed. But whether dangers are to be feared from this source or not, it is certainly an obvious dictate of sound policy to guard against them, as far as possible. If this danger does exist, or there is any cause to apprehend it, and our Western brethren are not only willing but desirous to aid us in taking precautions against it, would it not be wise to accept their assistance? We should benefit ourselves, without incurring them, as their population must always so far exceed any black population which can ever exist in that country, as to render the idea of danger from that source chimerical.

Your committee consider the regulation, contained in the ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States, which requires a freehold of fifty acres of land as a qualification for an elector of the General Assembly, as limiting too much the elective franchise. Some restriction, however, being necessary, your committee conceive that a residence continued long enough to evince a determination to become a permanent inhabitant, should entitle a person to the rights of suffrage. This probationary period need not extend beyond twelve months.

The petition of certain settlers in the Indiana Territory, praying to be annexed to the State of Ohio, ought not, in the opinion of your committee, to be granted.

It appears to your committee that the division of the Indiana Territory, in the manner directed by the ordinance of 1787, and for which the people of Randolph and St. Clair have petitioned your honorable body, would be inexpedient at this time. The people of the two sections have lately entered into the second grade of government, the whole expense of which would fall on the people of one section, if a division were now to be made. This, in the opinion of your committee, would be neither politic nor just. But, although a division of the Territory appears improper at this time, we think it should be made as soon as the population of either section has increased so far as to entitle them to form a State Government. The petition which prays that such a Government may be formed, by uniting the two sections as soon as their inhabitants shall have augmented so far as to authorize it, your committee conceive ought not to be granted. A Territory, when once erected into a State, cannot be divided or dismembered without its own consent; the formation, therefore, of two States out of this Territory, originally intended by the ordinance of 1787, could not constitutionally be effected, if the two sections were once permitted to form one State, without the consent of that State, however necessary the extent and population of that Territory might render such division.

After attentively considering the various objects desired in the memorials and petitions, the committee respectfully submit to the House the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787, which prohibits slavery within the Indiana Territory, be suspended for ten years, so as to permit the introduction of slaves, born within the United States, from any of the individual States.

2. Resolved, That every white freeman of the age of twenty-one years, who has resided within the Territory twelve months, and within the county in which he claims a vote, six months immediately preceding the election, shall enjoy the rights of an elector of the General Assembly.

3. Resolved, That the petition of certain settlers in the Indiana Territory, praying to be annexed to the State of Ohio, ought not to be granted.

4. Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to grant that part of the petition of the people of Randolph and St. Clair which prays for a division of the Indiana Territory.

5. Resolved, That so much of the petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory as prays that the two sections may be united into one State Government, ought not to be granted.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES INTO THE TERRITORIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 17, 1806.

Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any additional provisions are necessary to prevent the importation of slaves into the Territories of the United States, made the following report:

That the act of Congress, passed the 7th April, 1798, authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory, permits slavery within that Territory, by excluding the last article of the ordinance, of 13th July, 1787. The seventh section of this act prohibits, after the establishment of a Government, the importation of slaves from any port or place without the limits of the United States; of course, the right to import slaves from any place within the limits of the United States is not restricted.

The act of 2d March, 1805, further providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans, secures to its inhabitants "all the rights, privileges, and advantages, secured by the ordinance of 13th July, 1787, and now enjoyed by the people of the Mississippi Territory;" The importation of slaves, from any place within the limits of the United States, is one of those rights; consequently, the inhabitants of the Territory of Orleans may exercise it also.

The tenth section of the act of 26th March, 1804, "erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof," prohibits the introduction of slaves into that Territory, from any place, "except by a citizen of the United States, removing into said Territory for actual settlement, and being at the time of such removal bona fide owner of such slave or slaves." This tenth section, being repugnant to the first section of the act of 2d March, 1805, was repealed by the last section of said act, which declares: "that so much of an act, entitled An act, erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof, as is repugnant with this act, shall, from and after the first Monday of November next, be repealed."

The committee are in possession of the fact, that African slaves, lately imported into Charleston, have been thence conveyed into the Territory of Orleans; and, in their opinion, this practice will be continued to a very great extent, while there is no law to prevent it.

Upon this view of the subject, the committee believe it is expedient to prohibit any slave or slaves, who may be hereafter imported into the United States, from being carried into any of the Territories thereof; they, therefore, respectfully recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to import or bring into any of the Territories of the United States any slave or slaves that may hereafter be imported into the United States.

JOURNALS OF CONGRESS UNDER THE CONFEDERATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 19, 1806.

Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Levis and Hugh Maxwell, made the following report:

That, on a member taking his seat in Congress for the first time, it has been heretofore customary to supply him with a copy of the journals of the Congress under the confederation. For this purpose, by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, approved on the 2d day of March, 1799, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives were authorized and directed to subscribe for 400 copies of the said journals, then proposed to be published by Richard Folwell. Those copies were accordingly procured, and have been distributed to members of each Congress, until the present. At the meeting of the present Congress it has been found that only ten copies remain, which are by no means sufficient to supply those members who have not served a former Congress with one copy each.

The petitioners offer to furnish 130 copies, bound in boards, to be delivered at Washington, at $16 a set. This is the price, including binding and the expense of transportation, at which former sets were furnished, and is, as the committee are informed, at a much less rate than that at which the journals could now be printed.

Provision ought, perhaps, to be made for printing at the public expense another edition of these important journals; this, however, is not a subject on which your committee will, at this time, offer an opinion; but they can see no reason why the members, who have now taken their seats in Congress for the first time should be denied those journals with which members of every former Congress have been supplied. They, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and directed to purchase, for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives, from William Levis and Hugh Maxwell, 130 copies of Folwell's edition of the journals of the Congress under the confederation, at such price, not exceeding sixteen dollars per set, as they may deem eligible.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 5TH OF MARCH, 1806.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the petition and memorial of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, made the following report:

That it appears a company has been incorporated by the respective States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, for the purpose of forming a navigable canal over the isthmus which separates the bays of Chesapeake and Delaware; that, in pursuance of the several acts of incorporation passed by the said States respectively, a large number of subscriptions were made by divers citizens of the United States, and a board of president and directors were duly elected for carrying the project into effect.

That the said president and directors, in pursuance of their appointment, have procured skilful engineers to explore and survey the ground across the aforesaid isthmus, and have fixed on a route or position for the canal, calculated, as they conceive, in every respect, to secure the great and important purpose of an uninterrupted navigation, and have made considerable progress in the work. They find, however, that to accomplish it, a greater portion of fortitude and perseverance, and more ample resources, will be necessary, than the individuals who are embarked in it can be supposed to possess. The importance of the undertaking, and the immense national advantages which may ultimately result from it, they hope will be sufficient inducements to prevail on Congress to grant them such assistance as will enable them to complete the business agreeably to their original plan.

The committee cannot hesitate a moment in deciding on the importance and extensive utility of connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware by a navigable canal. To adopt a phrase familiarized by use, they consider the project as an opening wedge for an extensive inland navigation, which would at all times be of an immense advantage to the commercial as well as to the agricultural and manufacturing part of the community. But, in the event of a war, its advantages would be incalculable. The reasoning of the petitioners is conclusive on this point. If arguments are necessary, their petition furnishes an ample supply to prove that no system of internal improvement which has yet been proposed in this country holds out the prospect of such important national advantages as will naturally result from a successful termination of their undertaking.

Did the finances of the country admit of it, the committee would feel a perfect freedom in recommending to the House the propriety, in their opinion, of extending to the petitioners such aid as the difficulty and importance of their enterprise would be thought to justify. But it is a question whether, at this moment, the state of the treasury would admit of any pecuniary assistance being granted. The amount of the public debt yet to be extinguished, the embarrassed state of our commerce, and the critical situation of the country in relation to foreign Governments, might perhaps be considered as insurmountable objections against applying any public money to internal improvements at this particular time. Under an impression arising from these circumstances, the committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That it would not be expedient, at this time, to grant any pecuniary assistance to the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

EXTENSION OF PATENT RIGHTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 17, 1806.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of George Dodge and others, merchants of Salem, in the State of Massachusetts, submitted the following report:

The petitioners were the proprietors of the valuable nail factory at Amesbury, in the State of Massachusetts. They have owned the works about three years, with the patent granted originally to Jacob Perkins, of Newburyport, for a new and useful improvement in the mode of manufacturing nails; and they also are the assignees of another patent, granted to Samuel Guppy and John Warren Armstrong, for a further improvement in the manner of cutting nails, discovered by the said Jacob Perkins. They have expended large sums of money in repairs and additions to their buildings; and the whole was in a capital state of improvement, when, on the 24th of December last, the buildings accidentally took fire, and were entirely consumed, with all their tools, machinery, and a considerable quantity of stock on hand. The loss is estimated at a sum exceeding $30,000. This was a most useful establishment; it supplied the neighboring country with large quantities of nails at a reasonable price, as they could be sold at a cheaper rate than the imported nails; and the works being on an extensive plan, the supply was abundant. The petitioners are disposed to rebuild their works if they could be encouraged to proceed; and it would be a great inducement with them to commence the undertaking, if they could be permitted to renew their patent right for a period of seven or fourteen years from the time they will expire by the present limitation.

The first patent was granted on the 20th December, 1794, and will expire on the 14th December, 1808; and the second is dated 14th February, 1799, and will expire on the 14th February, 1813, each being limited to a period of fourteen years, agreeably to the act entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose passed the 21st February, 1793."

In considering the merits of this application, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures will not give an opinion on a case not properly before them; but they may be permitted to observe, that, had the loss actually happened to the original patentee, they should probably have deemed themselves justified in proposing to the House to grant the extension of the patents for a short period of time, with a view to encourage the inventors of useful machines to prosecute and extend their discoveries. But, although the committee acknowledge the present petitioners have sustained a severe loss, they do not seem justly entitled to a renewal of their patents after the limitation may expire. No consideration could have been paid to the inventor at the time of the purchase of the patent right for the use of it, beyond the stipulated period of fourteen years. It is understood the right will then be in the public; every individual in the community ought then to be entitled to make use of the machine. Indeed, after being deprived of its advantages for fourteen years, unless under a title acquired by purchase from a patentee, it might be supposed that the citizens of the United States have a fair claim to participate in the enjoyment of a right, and in the free use of an invention, the benefits of which may have been so long exclusively withheld from them. It might be objected, also, that other applications would be made to Congress should the rule once be established that the purchaser of a patent right might calculate on its extension, although no compensation had been allowed at the time of making the purchase, for the use of it beyond the period fixed by law. Under this view of the subject, the committee are induced to recommend that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition and the documents which accompany it.

CANAL FROM THE HEAD TO THE FOOT OF THE RAPIDS OF THE OHIO RIVER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 19, 1806.

Mr. BOYLE, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Kentucky, soliciting the co-operation and aid of the United States in opening a canal to avoid the rapids of the river Ohio, made the following report:

That, of the practicability of opening the proposed canal, and of its preference to one contemplated on the opposite side of the river, as well on account of the greater facility of its accomplishment, as of the superior advantages that would result to the navigation of the river, when accomplished, may, in the opinion of the committee, be correctly estimated by reference to a draught of part of the river, and notes explanatory thereof, which accompany the memorial. Of the immense utility of the proposed canal, no one can doubt who reflects for a moment upon the vast extent of fertile country which is watered by the Ohio and its tributary streams, and upon the incalculable amount of produce which must, of course, necessarily find its way to market by descending that river and encountering the danger and difficulties of passing its rapids. But, besides the general advantages which would result from the completion of the proposed canal, it is, in the opinion of the committee, particularly interesting to the United States, inasmuch as it would greatly enhance the value of the public lands northwest of the Ohio. There can be but little doubt that, by the additional value it would give to the public lands, the United States would be more than remunerated for the aid which the Legislature of Kentucky have solicited.

From these considerations, the committee would not hesitate to recommend a donation or subscription of shares to the amount contemplated by the law of the Legislature of Kentucky incorporating the Ohio Canal Company, if they believed the state of the public finances was such as to justify it. But, from the applications already made for aid in opening canals, it is probable that if the United States enter upon expenses of this kind, those expenses cannot be inconsiderable; and, as the revenue of the United States is already pledged, almost to the full amount, for purposes, though not more useful, yet more urgent, the committee are induced to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant, at present, the aid solicited by the Legislature of Kentucky, in opening a canal to avoid the rapids of the Ohio.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 21, 1806.

Mr. LOGAN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 28th of January last, the memorial of the President and Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, made the following report:

That it appears that a company has been incorporated and established by concurrent acts of the Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, for the purpose of cutting a canal across the isthmus separating the waters of the Delaware and Chesapeake bays. The capital of the company consists of two thousand six hundred shares, and $200 constitute a share. The sum, of consequence, contemplated to complete this work, is $520,000. Of this sum nearly $400,000 have been subscribed by individuals, and between five and six hundred shares remain unsubscribed for.

The site of the canal has been fixed, and its embouchures established at Welch Point, on the Elk river, and Mendenhall's ferry, on Christiana creek. It is intended to furnish a navigation to vessels drawing upwards of seven feet water. The work has been commenced, and a canal to supply the necessary water to the main canal has been opened from the head waters of the Elk river, nearly to the line of the route of the grand canal. This canal of supply communicates with populous and productive tracts of country in the three States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, and is calculated for barge navigation.

The length of the main canal, as the route has been established, is twenty-one miles; and the expense of cutting it is estimated at $25,000 a mile.

The committee are of opinion that the work designed to be accomplished by the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company is one of great interest and importance, not only to the three States whose laws have incorporated the company, but generally to the United States. By opening the proposed communication between the two bays, a safe inland navigation of twenty-one miles supplies the place of a circuitous and an exposed navigation of five hundred. The large tracts of country in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, connected with the waters of the bays, will be furnished with a safe water communication, and will immediately feel the great benefit of the work. In the event of a war, the facility, celerity, safety, and cheapness in the transportation of troops and ordnance and military stores from remote parts of the United States, present an object at once of sufficient magnitude to interest the General Government in the undertaking. The importance, however, of the proposed canal, though great in itself, is not justly appreciated by considering it as a separate work; it must be viewed as the basis of a vast scheme of interior navigation, connecting the waters of the lakes with those of the most southern States; a plan certainly within the compass of industry and art; and, if beyond the present means, unquestionably within the growing resources of the country.

The following statement and illustration of the plan the committee have extracted from the memorial, furnishing a correct view of the subject, well deserving the serious consideration of the Senate:

“It is easy, however, to see, by examining any map of the United States, that this extent may be carried much further. To the southward, the canal through the Dismal Swamp, now in execution, will open the communication to the waters of Albemarle Sound, and from thence through the inlets to South Carolina and Georgia. To the northward, a communication is now nearly opened from Albany, up the Mohawk river, to Lake Ontario and all the upper lakes; if a similar one be made from Hudson river to Lake Champlain, it will extend the navigation to Quebec. And to the eastward, if the pass from Buzzard's to Boston bay be opened, which has been contemplated, it will in like manner extend it to Boston and all the coast of Massachusetts. Thus, with opening only a few short passes, of which the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal is the great and preliminary one, a communication may be made, nearly free from all the dangers of the ocean, along the whole coast of the United States.”

The committee are of opinion that it is among the first duties of a Government to promote public improvements of a general nature. No work deserves the character of public improvements more than canals. The one proposed by the memorialists is of the first magnitude and importance; it, therefore, well deserves the assistance and encouragement of the Government. Considering that a large capital has been subscribed; that an expensive part of the work is nearly completed; that, probably, without the countenance and aid of Government, the work will cease, to the loss of a number of public spirited individuals, and the destruction of a great public improvement, it is the opinion of the committee that aid ought to be granted to the memorialists.

If it be inconvenient at this moment to spare money from the treasury, the United States have it in their power to contribute the assistance prayed for by a grant of land. The grant may be either gratuitous, or the company enjoined to dispose of it, and to credit the United States with shares of their stock equal to the proceeds of the land, at the established rate of $200 for each share. The committee therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That ——— acres of land be granted to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, upon their giving bond, conditioned to transfer to the United States a number of the shares of the capital stock of said company, at the rate of $200 a share, equal to the proceeds of the sales of land granted to them; and conditioned to sell the said land within ——— years, and to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury a true account of the sales.

This report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: the memorial and petition of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, respectfully sheweth:

That, by sundry acts of the several Legislatures of the States of Maryland, Delaware, and Pennsylvania, passed in the years 1799, 1801, and 1802, a company was incorporated for the purpose of forming a navigable canal over the important isthmus which separates the bays of Chesapeake and Delaware; in pursuance of which acts, a large number of subscriptions were made by divers citizens of the United States, and a board of president and directors duly elected for carrying the execution of the said canal into effect.

That, in pursuance of their appointment, the said president and directors procured able engineers and other persons well qualified to make the necessary surveys of the ground and waters across the aforesaid isthmus; and, after the most mature deliberation, fixed upon a route or position for the said canal, calculated in every respect to secure the great and important purpose of an uninterrupted navigation; since which, they have steadily pursued the execution of the said work, and made considerable progress therein.

Your memorialists, however, have already experienced that a public work of such magnitude and importance, and of a kind nearly new in the United States, requires not only more extensive funds, but a greater portion of fortitude and perseverance than the individuals who are embarked in it can be supposed to possess, and demands for its support the aid and countenance of the public.

They are, therefore, at once compelled and emboldened to apply for that aid and countenance to the Legislature of the United States; and beg leave most respectfully to mention to Congress the facts and reasons which appear to them such as highly to merit the attention and interest of your honorable House.

The general utility of those public improvements which rank themselves under the head of political economy, and particularly those of roads and canals, have been so universally acknowledged, and they have become so much the objects of encouragement to the Governments of all free and enlightened nations, that, at this period, they require no argument in their support; but your memorialists beg leave to call the attention of Congress to a few of the great effects which are known to have been produced by them, and particularly to the immense wealth, power, and resources which they have given to the English nation; to the powerful rivalry and zeal for imitation which the success of them there has created in other nations; to the unceasing attention which is bestowed upon them throughout Europe; and to the conviction which exists in every country there, that, without an attention to these objects, the nation who neglects them must not only cease to increase in its agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing importance, but must sink below the level of its neighbors in its political consequence.

Your memorialists apprehend, that if ever any country or period of time was more particularly interested or proper for the zealous encouragement of these works, it is the United States in its present situation, and at the present period.

The immense public wealth and private happiness which agriculture has already introduced; the vast extent to which this happiness and wealth may be carried; the progress which our manufactures have already made, and the struggles they are yet making to advance to maturity; the resources which our commerce has given us, and the rapid increase it experiences as fast as means can be furnished to supply it—all prove the unbounded spirit and energy of our citizens in every thing which can promote the private or public good; and that it is only from the want of population that spirit and energy are repressed. Whatever, therefore, can tend to increase that population, or whatever arts and improvements can supply its place, and assist the productions of labor, are peculiarly appropriate to the present period, and mark it out as the moment for public encouragement.

The situation of the United States is, by nature, one of the most happy that is possessed by any nation of the earth; it extends over almost every climate, and furnishes nearly every production; its many noble bays and rivers diffuse foreign commerce through all its eastern boundary, by which our wants are supplied with the manufactures of other nations, and our produce conveyed abroad; but so near do these bays and rivers approach to each other, that nature seems to have left but a few objects for art to accomplish, in order to establish the incalculable advantages which domestic commerce and internal communication will afford, by creating a universal interchange of produce through all parts of the United States, not only to supply thereby our mutual wants, and give the utmost encouragement to our own agriculture and manufactures, but by mingling the habits, manners, and interests of all the States together in one general commercial and social intercourse, unite their affections, and more and more blend the interests of our common country.

Your memorialists beg leave to remind Congress that each of the States possesses so many local or domestic objects for the application of their respective resources, in opening their rivers and roads to internal communication among themselves, that it seems, with propriety, they look to Congress for the promotion of those works of the same kind, whose advantages are of general importance to the Union, and justly designate them as great national objects claiming the protection of the General Government.

Such is the opening of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal; for if the important isthmus between those waters and another between Trenton and the Raritan in New Jersey, which is also contemplated, be reduced to practicable navigation, an easy and direct communication will be established from the southern limits of the Chesapeake to New York, and from thence by the river Hudson to Albany on the one hand, and by the Sound to the New England States on the other; which communication may be extended both to the southward and northward, so as to form a direct and easy internal navigation from the lakes of Canada through the whole eastern boundary of the United States.

The easy practicability of the work now immediately placed before the attention of your honorable House admits of proofs so decisive, as to banish every doubt of its execution in a very short period of time; nor does the pass through Jersey, or any others which have been contemplated, furnish any of those important difficulties which have often occurred, and been surmounted in other countries, where, indeed, such has been the improvement in public works of this kind, that no difficulties seem to have retarded, or been subdued by human genius.

The utility of a communication through the United States of the kind which your memorialists have mentioned, is so great, and its description diffused under so many heads, that the detail of them would extend far beyond the limits of a memorial; but the more important parts of them are so striking, as at once to be comprehended, and their importance appreciated, from the general view of the subject which has thus been placed before your honorable House. Your memorialists, however, leaving to your honorable House the appreciation of those advantages when confined to a state of peace, and in promoting the general benefit of the United States, cannot but mention the immense accumulation of benefits which must arise from this internal communication in time of war and hostile aggression, which it may be our lot to experience.

It is a fact well known, that, during the late revolutionary war, no circumstance was so injurious to our defence, or so much assisted our enemies, as the difficult and tedious communication between the Eastern and Southern States; since the advantages possessed by the enemy at sea, to block up our ports, to conquer our maritime towns, to invade us in numerous positions at once, and to convey their armies along our coast with a celerity which no means could guard against or army defend, formed almost every difficulty and the source of every danger we experienced.

But if the communication in question be established, not only would internal commerce be completely retained, and foreign supplies landed in one State be quickly diffused through the rest, but, by securing the mouths of a few rivers, our cities would be protected, and our armies in every position conveyed wherever necessity should call them, and a cheap and easy defence established through the Union.

Your memorialists further beg leave to state, that, though they have exerted every degree of attention, enterprise, and fortitude to the work under their care, and though no serious difficulty in point of execution has occurred, yet, without the continuance of public patronage, and some aid from your honorable House, they have every reason to fear that their future efforts will be unavailing, and the progress of the work suspended, solely from that despondence, which, in a new country, and with limited fortunes in individuals, will unfortunately depress the hopes and overcome the exertions of private support.

Of how much injury, therefore, the delay of this important work will prove to the Union, how widely the example of its failure will increase the public despondence, and protract for a long period of years all great improvements, your honorable House can fully judge.

Your memorialists beg leave, therefore, most respectfully to state, whether, among all the numerous objects of public patronage and expenditure, any can be found, which, in point of utility and greatness, more forcibly invites the attention of the Government of a great and free country; and to pray that, taking the premises into your serious consideration, you will grant to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company your protection and aid, in such manner as to your honorable House may seem most proper.

By order and on behalf of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company:

JOSEPH GILPIN,

BOOKS, DRAUGHTS, AND MODELS, FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 1, 1806.

Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, from the committee to whom was referred the letter of William Tatham, and the papers accompanying it, made the following report:

That your committee have examined the books, draughts, papers, and models in the possession of Colonel Tatham, and are fully convinced of the value of the collection. Many of the books in his library relate to subjects intimately connected with useful science and with the early history of our country; and, on this account, as well as on account of their scarcity, would be a very great acquisition to the Government. His collection of papers includes, besides many manuscript maps of parts of the United States, and the adjacent countries, compiled by himself, draughts and plans of different military posts on the American continent, of barracks, magazines, storehouses, and other buildings, and of the forts and fortifications formerly erected, or intended to be erected, not only in the neighborhood of the United States, but within the actual territory of the Union. Nor ought this to be considered as of little value. A knowledge of the places selected by other Governments as sites of military stations either for invasion or defence, must essentially assist the inquiries which may be hereafter conducted for similar purposes by officers of our own. In affairs of war, the experience of our predecessors is peculiarly valuable; and, by combining the views of different men under different circumstances, but all looking at the country with military eyes, we are better enabled to choose those points which are best suited to protection or offence, than by our own unaided talents. Together with these must be considered a vast variety of topographical maps and charts of our present northern and southern frontiers, made under the orders of the British, French, and Spanish Governments, with the minute details of the soundings, shoals, and harbors. Of the accuracy of these, your committee must necessarily be but imperfect judges—their only means of forming opinions being a mere general knowledge of the geography of the country, and the internal evidence arising from the excellence of the execution, the minute particularity, the number of persons employed, and the official stations occupied by those under whose superintendence the surveys appear to have been made. The southern frontier is an object of peculiar importance, and the charts of the different parts of the Floridas attracted the attention of your committee. As far, then, as circumstances enabled them to judge, they were decidedly of opinion that these charts were highly deserving of the consideration of the public, and that copies of them ought to be obtained for the United States. The mathematical instruments, models of machines for saving labor, of railroads, and plans of public improvement, some of which are of Colonel Tatham's own invention, and the others collected at much expense and with great perseverance, all evince great ingenuity and attention to the subject; and, indeed, after the efforts of thirty years which your committee understand have been spent for this purpose, it was to be expected that a valuable accumulation must be the result.

It would appear from the letter referred to your committee, that it is the wish of Colonel Tatham that the public should purchase the whole of his collection, in order to form the basis of a national institution under the control of the executive branch of the Government, in the nature of a department of public economy. Your committee can have no doubt of the utility of such a plan, particularly if connected with other branches of general science. By it the American youth might have an opportunity of enjoying the best kind of instruction, that which unites theory with practice, which adds to an acquaintance with principles a knowledge of the best means of bringing those principles into actual use. But while they thus express their opinion of the ultimate good which might be produced by such a plan, they have strong doubts of its being feasible in the present situation of the United States.

Laboring, as our country is, under a load of debt, the price of our independence, and which justice and policy require to be discharged as speedily as possible—a debt the payment of the interest of which absorbs so large a portion of the annual revenue—it appears impracticable, and unwise if it were practicable, to divert any considerable portion of our income from this great object. Doubts also have been suggested respecting the powers of the General Government to contribute to any actual improvement of the means of internal intercourse, unless requested by the individual States, or confined to the existing roads; and this improvement seems to be no minor object in the proposition of Colonel Tatham. Without expressing any opinion on this last subject, but from a deliberate review of all the circumstances connected with the matter referred to them, your committee would not recommend the present adoption of a plan such as is suggested in the letter. Convinced, however, of the value to the public of many of the materials in the collection, and desirous that the Government may be possessed of them, the committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in addition to the appropriation already made by law, a sum not exceeding _____ dollars be appropriated as a part of the fund for the purchase of books, maps, and charts, for the Department of War, to enable the Secretary of War to purchase from William Tatham such parts of his collection as may be, in the judgment of the Secretary, of public use, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SIR:

JEFFERSON STREET, GEORGETOWN, February 10, 1806.

I beg leave to communicate to you, through the medium of a concise letter, rather than by a voluminous memorial, a proposal which I am disposed to make to Congress, through a persuasion that I am in a condition to offer to them certain objects of the first importance, and more especially deserving their attention at the present critical juncture.

I have been engaged, sir, more than thirty years, most earnestly, and at great expense, in the study and promotion of the public economy of the United States, and in helping to bring up the arrears of their history and topography.

Having devoted my mind principally to a knowledge of their financial powers; their agricultural and commercial resources; the best means of drawing their latent treasures from the wilderness; of improving their commerce by more efficient roads, bridges, rivers, and canal navigation; of bettering the condition of their seacoast economy, piers, inlets, harbors, light-houses, buoys, and landmarks; of lessening the burden of animal labor by the application of mechanical powers; of enhancing the value of their pacific interests and intercourse, I have succeeded beyond expectation in the accumulation of many inestimable materials in these several respects, which, through their voluminous extent, must form the subject of a separate schedule.

During the last ten years I have experienced considerable vicissitudes through my perseverance in these scientific pursuits, chiefly in Europe; but I have been for the most part employed professionally as a civil engineer in England, where I was, for some time, honored with the commencement and command of the operations of the London docks, a work of considerable magnitude, wherein, I flatter myself, I have profited by experience and practice.

My desire is, that the result of my labors should be applied to public benefit for a fair and honorable compensation; that my collection should form the basis of a practical public institution, under control of the executive branch of the Government; and that the President for the time being be authorized to draw the pecuniary means from some suitable fund, and to disburse them in such manner as may seem best for promoting the public good, and most conducive to instructing your rising youth in the great science of a public economy inseparable from an alliance with public virtue and private happiness.

As the present President and three of the honorable Secretaries, (State, War, and Treasury,) have honored me with a separate day each, in a more minute investigation of the premises than the subject would be capable of before a committee, it will probably be most satisfactory to refer to them (so far as may be proper) for such primary facts as Congress may desire to know in these particulars; and, if it should ultimately be deemed advisable, also to compensate me for a surrender of certain patent rights to improvements which go to aid the public gain at the least possible expense, and by the most simple and powerful means. It would leave my mind more free to communicate every where such a stimulus to public and private industry as may have arisen from my investigations, or the improvements which have followed them.

I have the honor to be, sir, your humble servant and fellow-citizen,

WM. TATHAM.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

A general schedule of the manuscripts, materials, instruments, apparatus, &c. applying to promote the science and practice of public economy, and to improve the public and individual wealth of the country, as referred to in William Tatham's letter to the honorable the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in Congress assembled, bearing date the 10th day of February, 1806; and of several principal benefits which it is supposed Government may derive from the establishment of a department of works and public economy, subject to the control and direction of the executive branch of the Government.

MANUSCRIPTS.

A promiscuous collection relating to the history, topography, commercial, agricultural, and hydraulic improvements of the country, &c. &c.

SURVEYS.

These are, perhaps, the greatest and most interesting collection ever made by an individual, or which concern the power and prosperity of the United States. They comprehend all, or nearly all, of the actual surveys which are known to have been made in North America, by the whole corps of topographical engineers of England, France, and Spain, prior to, and partially in, the American revolution. These were necessarily taken under the protection and support of armies for a series of years, at an expense, it is presumed, of some millions of dollars. They describe adjacent countries, beyond the limits of the United States, in many instances on very large scales and minutely, and apply to render the public collection more perfect in that which essentially concerns them in the lake countries, in Canada, in Nova Scotia, Labrador, &c. to the northward and westward; and in the Floridas, and

Louisiana, to the southward and eastward; besides a very extensive collection made within the United States by the said William Tatham and others. These comprehend the documents for completing the several interesting maps on which the said William Tatham has been many years engaged, at his own expense and risk, (though at the primary instance of the General Government in February, 1790,) with a very great extension of the original design. They include his large and smaller maps of the southern States, the latter on four atlas sheets; his James river navigation, and State of Virginia, on six sheets; his divisions of the southern and western States, on sixteen sheets; his northern States, and United States, each on four sheets; and his proposed American atlas on one hundred plates. In this branch of his pursuits, it is to be regretted that he has been disappointed in two extensive contracts, made by him in Europe: the one by pecuniary failure of the party; and the other by the death of his professional geographer, a man of talents inferior to none left behind him. As it is, nevertheless, his intention to persevere in his undertakings till the public are supplied in this particular, in spite of misfortunes, he reserves to himself the right of all necessary access to these documents; the right of retaining detail duplicates, and of taking detail copies for his professional occasions, (as also of his collection of instruments, models, and apparatus to the same use and end,) from time to time, as they may be required, without interrupting the public convenience. Among this collection are many fine surveys of the Mississippi, of the Mobile, the St. Lawrence, the lakes, &c. with surveys of the coasts and harbors of many parts of the continent.

PLANS AND DRAWINGS.

These embrace the plans of, perhaps, nearly all the towns, suburbs, harbors, environs of fortified places, &c. topographically delineated; together with the plans, sections, and elevations of the barracks, fortifications, &c. of each, with partial estimates, &c. in various methods done by the best masters and engineers, in their respective styles of finishing; the whole forming an excellent collection of examples for the imitation and instruction of young civil engineers, (either agricultural or commercial,) military or maritime pupils, &c.

There are among them many of the original documents of General Wolfe, and of others who served under and succeeded him in Canada, on the lakes, on the Mississippi, &c. &c. with plans, sections, and elevations of the block houses and other works, which proved so essentially serviceable in those campaigns against the French and the Indians. Also, all the similar documents of the operations in Florida, together with most part of the collection of the late British engineer, General Montresor, (an officer of high merit and experience, who died above eighty years of age,) with many of the originals of General Howe's campaigns in the Jerseys, &c.

There also are a few landscapes of interesting parts of the country; aqueducts, engineering, and architectural drawings which merit notice, &c.

MAPS AND CHARTS.

A collection of maps and charts of various parts of the world well selected; but more particularly in America. It may be said of these, at least, that they will help to accumulate the stock for public reference, and probably add to it, in some degree, where it may not be perfect.

ENGRAVINGS.

Besides a vast collection of these in books applicable to public economy, and the science of civil engineering, there are a considerable collection on both large and small scales, in portfolios, and on separate sheets, of various port improvements, containing all those recently made in London, from the actual surveys of the city, parliamentary surveys and reports, the surveys of eminent engineers, their reports, estimates, &c., things only to be procured by favor, and not by purchase. These include a large collection on the subject of bridge building; all the late designs for bridges, docks, quays, &c. collected and engraved at parliamentary expense, on very large and highly finished plates; many other bridges, aqueducts, mill-works, water-works, &c., with many machines and contrivances for saving and abridging animal labor in various agricultural, commercial, and mechanical employments; together with an extensive assortment of locks, basins, canals, river and road plans of various descriptions, and examples, from other parts of Europe, &c. of great importance to public and private prosperity, with many interesting descriptions of the most suitable instruments, implements, tools, utensils, and apparatus in these pursuits.

BOOKS.

This small library (allowed by many men of science to be the completest of its kind) has been selected from the great mass in London and other places, by many years of research, industry, perseverance, and sacrifice of time and expense by the proposer in person. It consists of a few hundred volumes, most of which, perhaps, are not to be had elsewhere, as they are chiefly books out of print, and others the result of actual operations, facts, and experience, brought forward by professional men of superior talents, at the public expense, or at the charge of incorporated companies, societies, wealthy proprietors, &c. These have been carefully collected together, classed, arranged, and bound in volumes suitable to the respective topics on which they treat, and suitable tables of contents added to each collective volume in manuscript. They are wholly scientific and useful; it having been an invariable rule with the selector to reject plays, farces, novels, romances, fabulous stories, and all that trash and fashionable nonsense which tends to give a contaminated tone to the popular morals and habits; to disseminate indolence, dissipation, immorality, vice, artificial wants, false luxury, envy, hatred, ambition, mental inquietude, individual strife, and the more lamentable mania of foreign wars, bloodshed, and contention, too often about a mere definition of words and terms, which both parties would construe alike under the governance of reason.

The subjects treated of and relative are agriculture; horticulture; irrigation; drainage and embankments; commerce; finance; internal economy; domestic and rural economy; architecture in general; rural, hydraulic, military, and maritime architecture; arithmetic, mathematics, surveying, levelling, mechanics, hydraulics, hydrostatics, pneumatics, natural and experimental philosophy, and those sciences in particular which relate to civil engineering; chemistry of nature and art; the use of instruments, apparatus, and machines for saving labor, canal navigation, river navigation, and roads; parliamentary proceedings and reports in these respects; the works of Governments, incorporated companies, and engineers, throughout the world; the more detail knowledge of water-works, mill-works, engines, &c.; the knowledge of tides and land floods, with the means of converting their mechanical powers to useful purposes, and of counteracting their evils by efficient means; the whole deduced from the results of practice and actual experience.

In general and local history and topography, the collection has been chiefly confined to domestic matter, (more peculiarly applicable to our public economy,) and to that which is most immediately relative on either our Atlantic or Pacific coasts, or in the interior. In the latter, Canada, Hudson's bay, the Russian confines, California, Mexico, South America, Louisiana, and the Floridas have been attended to, and will be found copious and instructive.

On the subject of public institutions, useful societies, public boards, charities, useful economical improvement, the economy of public roads, the general and local jurisdiction of the public sewers and estuaries, and metropolitan police, there has been a careful selection, as there has been also a tolerable complete one of contemporary facts during the revolution of America, brought into a few chronological volumes: though this is rather to be esteemed as a work of convenient reference, than one which should interfere directly with the pursuits of the proposed department. Upon the whole, it is to be hoped that this little collection will be found no fault with in that which it does contain, but that it will at least form a basis, and prove a stimulus for the public industry, in addition to it that which it ought to hold, yet does not contain. The proprietor reserves also the right of use and access to these, for his professional occasions.

MODELS.

The models are as many and as peculiarly and usefully applicable to improve the condition of the country as could have been expected from the exertions of one single citizen; though, doubtless, public force might have been more productive. They consist of, first, a fine collection (executed by the first mathematical instrument makers in London, at great expense,) of demonstrative models in the rudiments of natural philosophy, hydraulics, hydrostatics, pneumatics, the mechanical powers, optical apparatus, &c.; secondly, of valuable and some expensive models, (constructed by the proprietor's own workmen,) of his own and other recent improvements in land and water conveyance, agricultural and commercial intercourse, improvements in raising and regulating water, water-works, wind machines, &c., with various machines, inventions, and contrivances for saving time and expense, and for lessening the burden of animal labor in public and private pursuits, agriculture, commerce, and domestic economy; and of a new mode of building, securely termed "clump," or clamped architecture, &c. He has also a great number of improvements yet in sketches and drawings, which his modeller has not had time to complete; but, in the event of a public institution to this end, he flatters himself that this branch will afford to the community a constant and most useful employment for accumulating the national stock, and enhancing the value of the aggregate collection; for demonstrating the advantages and susceptibilities of our general increase of wealth and power; and for communicating the same to each individual State, to the several public works, and to our popular seminaries and institutions, in duplicates from the federal repository, to be modelled at their respective charges.

INSTRUMENTS AND APPARATUS.

These are wholly professional, I believe, well chosen and a plentiful stock for commencement, both in large and portable ones, even some on so small a scale as to enable a person to carry a complete set of instruments concealed in his clothes; which may often prove important in an uninhabited desert country.

They consist of several sets of surveying and levelling instruments, so as to employ a dozen assistants at the same time, on one and the same kind of work, if need be. Also, several sets of excellent drawing instruments, both large and small; working levels, and banking levels, &c., maritime and lake instruments, comprising portable compasses, sextants, time glasses, &c.: one very fine perambulator (for measuring distances expeditiously;) one good common fashioned camera-obscura, reflecting objects on ground glass, for drawing machines, &c.; one large pyramidal camera-obscura, of an improved construction, for taking landscapes, views, machinery, &c., (the same as the one procured by the proprietor for the President of the United States from London,) which throws the landscape or other object on the paper itself in its natural colors, lights, and shades, ready for the hand of the delineator.

There are, moreover, many less important instruments, and some to be yet constructed from the proprietor's improvements when time and circumstances permit.

TOOLS, IMPLEMENTS, AND UTENSILS.

Under this general head may be comprehended a convenient sized portable tool-chest, containing almost every kind of tool requisite for the primary establishment of the proposed institution, or for making and repairing its models, apparatus, utensils, &c.

The implements, utensils, &c. may be promiscuously comprehended among the office furniture; such as tables, desks, drawing boards, straight edges, squares, scales, parallels, &c. There are, also, two improved polygraphs (or writing machines) of the best simple construction, on the proprietor's own plan: These are for writing two letters at a time in the one case, and three letters at a time in the other, by no more than the usual action or movement of one single pen; and these are of material importance in giving despatch to duplicates, or triplicates, by post, despatching business in public offices, merchants, counting houses, individual correspondence, &c., where copies of the transaction are required to be kept. The proprietor has also found that great advantage is to be derived from this invention in making out copies of surveys, maps, plans, drawings, colorings, &c. at the same time that the originals are executed.

PATENT RIGHTS.

The proprietor of this collection possesses many patent rights for inventions and improvements made by himself, several of which are applicable to the improvement of agricultural and commercial conveyance by land and water, mill-works, &c., and are stated in a voluminous specification, filed by him in the Patent Office about twelve months ago, together with another specification on clamped or "clump" architecture; nor does he quit his pretensions to the hydraulic improvement, (acting by natural impulse on valves and air vessels,) claimed, it seems, by Messrs. Boulton & Watt, Montgolfier, Bettancourt, &c., but which (he verily believes, as informed by William Friend, Esq., the algebraist,) was invented and used by a gentleman in the Fens of Lincolnshire, in England, about forty years ago.

Should Congress, however, conclude to compensate these rights, he will endeavor to increase their powers to the unrestrained use and advantage of society; and, upon the whole view of the case, the foregoing premises are submitted, with this one further respectful remark, only: that, if such has been the result of an obscure individual's industry and perseverance, when often thwarted by poverty, hunger, nakedness, family neglect, the persecution of a rich and powerful kindred, national prejudices, political factions, and speculative versatility, both at home and abroad, shall we say what might not have been achieved by affording a public support towards these great and pacific ends, in the hands of some more competent character, some more shining man, in the prosperous glare of popular opinion?

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM TATHAM.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Of several principal benefits which it is supposed Government may derive from the establishment of a department of works and public economy, subject to the control and direction of the executive branch of Government.

In a department of works and public economy, subject to the direction and control of the President of the United States, it would seem that the following advantages are offered efficiently, viz:

1st. In all their civil engineering concerns they will be prepared for

1. Investigations and surveys of all public works and proposals, to be laid before Congress, for their information, as often as they may require such.
2. Reports and elucidations for ascertaining the true state of propositions and works, such, for example, as bridges, roads, navigations, docks, harbors, light-houses, piers, and other subjects of internal economy, can be thus obtained from the least partial source; that of their own officers acting under immediate control of the Government, amenable to them, and assisted by their own pupils (say the apprentices of the public establishment).
3. Plans, sections, elevations, &c. will form suitable lessons for instruction; and may be always ready for the inspection of Congress when sitting, or of the Executive during their recess.
4. The public correspondence, in these particulars, might be here carried on; their reports and projects matured; and originals, copies, or duplicates of all such documents, should be here regularly entered, enrolled, and deposited; to the end that the American archives should not be less complete than those of other nations, and their transactions still more correct. Fair copies of all necessary documents and designs should be from hence transmitted to the heads of the departments to which they respectively appertain.
5. Models, instruments, apparatus, tools, implements, &c. within the province of this institution should be carefully deposited here; and suitable duplicates should be constructed for transmitting examples of the aggregate knowledge to the several States, the respective public works and seminaries, popular institutions and societies, and to enterprising individuals when time and circumstances allow, according to their several orders, at their particular cost and charge. Even a transfer of the patent models would be material in promoting their introduction, by means of lectures on the public uses they were designed for, after they have answered the particular end of their deposite in the office of the Secretary of State.
6. Periodical or occasional lectures might be usefully introduced here in aid of practical employments; and an explanation of the mechanical powers, hydraulics, hydrostatics, pneumatics, chemistry, and its application to domestic and useful purposes, agriculture, commerce, architecture, &c., in a way similar to the recently established lectures of the Royal Institution in London, it is respectfully presumed would form a much more satisfactory amusement for rational adults, of both sexes, than those monkey tricks imported, after which we sometimes squander our dollars without any thing in return.
7. Tuition in the actual practice of young clerks, draughtsmen, civil engineers, officers, &c., destined for employments in the several civil departments of the State, would be found an acquirement of vast utility to the community, and highly gratifying to the individuals, who would be thus rendered competent to despatch many points of lateral concern in life without waiting for assistance.

2d. In Topography.

The Union will be benefited by employing its young topographical engineers in bringing up and compiling the arrearages of our general geography; in preparing detail maps of the country, and of its local operations; to be finished, classed, deposited, and fair copies furnished to the several departments of Government.

3d. In American History.

All new materials, ancient works, tracts, &c. should be carefully collected, classed, arranged, methodized, and the most material substance published in neat, cheap, periodical numbers, accessible to the great bulk of the people, for the popular information, and more particularly for your rising youth, who should be thus taught to know and respect the most distant parts of the Union as one common people, linked together by the ties of reciprocity, mutual affection and general interest; and who should be kept to more useful employments than they meet with in taverns, cards, dice, theatres, cock-fights, and horse-races, which, being once rendered unfashionable, would soon become odious.

4th. In Agriculture.

1. Books; proceedings of foreign agricultural boards and societies; reports of the result of experimental farming, its progressive changes and effects, &c.
2. Instruments, implements used in husbandry, tools, utensils, &c. of various countries, to be collected, classed, and others to be occasionally manufactured from them, for the use and example of the respective States. This would enable us to profit by the experience of other nations.
3. Tracts and communications, on the results of actual practice, should be received, and occasionally published in volumes, or by numbers.
4. Irrigation and drainage, forming a distinct branch of agricultural pursuits, works hereon should be collected, models of machines, tools, &c. to this end should be constructed, experiments communicated, and occasional lectures and illustrations delivered and published in the periodical work, which should be edited for this particular science, and those topics which go to illustrate and improve it in practice.

5th. In Commerce.

Books on this subject should be procured, taking care to accumulate whatsoever is relative. Roads, river and canal navigation, with every other means which may tend to lessen the burden of carriage, and rescue latent resources from the wastes of the wilderness, should be carefully attended to. Improved means of conveyance should be constantly investigated, and all economical projects, in this respect, matured and put forward for promoting the public wealth, power, and respectability in the interest of its individuals.

6th. In respect to Naval and Military Pupils.

Though the direct tuition of these has not yet, perhaps, entered into any general plan for promoting the public economy of society, there can be no doubt but that those who are destined for these professions may be abundantly benefited by the practical knowledge and information they may reap in such a seminary; and, considering the precarious situations to which they will necessarily become professionally exposed, certainly none have more need of being armed with all the points of science. As many young gentlemen cadets, &c. will be constantly in waiting for berths or promotion, they may receive here much useful instruction and accomplishment; they may be constantly employed in drawing, designing fortifications, naval and military architecture, and in writing, copying, &c.; and books and apparatus for their tuition, as well as accessible models in their respective lines of employment, may be of material advantage to the individuals, and enable them to return a plentiful remuneration to their country, both from their observations abroad, and from the culture of their several talents within the bosom of their native land.

All which is respectfully submitted by, sir, your humble servant,

WILLIAM TATHAM.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives, &c.

DEAR SIR:

LONDON, September 25, 1804.

This will be delivered to you by Colonel Tatham, whom I have known for more than twenty years, at first a clerk of the Council at Richmond. I have seen him here from my arrival to this period, frequently; and, at his request, as he is about setting out for America, give him this to you. I consider him as a firm friend to the United States, of which he is a citizen, being there through the whole of our revolution. He has been employed here in considerable trust, in the care of the London docks, as an engineer, and is thought to possess much information in all questions in mechanics, the use of water to mechanical purposes, in canals, &c. I think him an honest and active man, and am persuaded that opportunities may be offered in the United States in which he may be useful to his country, while he draws from his services some emolument to himself.

I am, dear sir, sincerely, your friend and servant,

JAMES MONROE.

JAMES MADISON, Sec. State, Washington.

9th CONGRESS.]

No. 211.

[1st SESSION.]

MICHIGAN TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 15TH OF APRIL, 1806.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

On the twenty-third of December last, a message of the President of the United States, transmitting a report from certain officers of Michigan, relative to a destructive conflagration of the metropolis of that Territory, and the state of the country in consequence of the present situation of their lands, was communicated to the Senate of the United States, and was by them referred to the consideration of a select committee.

Before the committee to whom the consideration of these matters was consigned were prepared to act on the same, a committee of the House of Representatives matured the several subjects, and their deliberations resulted in the passage of three several acts by that House, one of which, referred to a special committee, has already received the sanction of the honorable the Senate.

With respect to the other two acts passed by the House of Representatives, the committee to whom they were referred have determined on a postponement of them, excepting so far as relates to the laying out a town, and the enacting instead of adopting laws, under the idea that there is not now time to consider the subject.

The consequence of a concurrence, on the part of the Senate, with this proposition, will be so ruinous to that country as fully to justify the calling of the attention of that honorable body, precious as it even now is, to that particular question.

It is well known that, with scarcely any exceptions, the inhabitants of this country were formerly subjects of a foreign Power, and the greater part of them born and reared in the use of a foreign language. In the year 1794, when they first came to feel that it was to the American Government this country was hereafter to appertain, it became, of course, a matter of consideration, as a right of choice was reserved to which of the two nations they would attach themselves. The ties which bind human minds to the Governments, laws, and characters, to which they have been accustomed, were strong enough to induce many to select our rival in preference to ourselves. Those who selected the American jurisdiction were, however, by no means, an inconsiderable body of men: they were ancient inhabitants of these countries, and men of the most virtuous characters and habits. Both descriptions were alike destitute of titles to land, clothed with the regular sanction of Government. Their determinations were, therefore, probably governed more by their expectations of liberal treatment from the one or the other Government, in this respect, than, perhaps, by any other circumstance. It has so happened that the British Government has been much more liberal in these respects than the American Government has been, or, indeed, can ever be expected to be. Even at the present day, a gratuitous concession of two hundred acres awaits all those who may choose to settle in their country. Notwithstanding this difference in the conduct of the two Governments, it will be inconvenient to the greater part of the inhabitants to change their country at this day, and they are content to confine their expectations, with respect to land, to the quantities which they already possess and are in the cultivation of. Nothing, under all the circumstances, can be more reasonable or more moderate than this expectation. Yet, notwithstanding twelve years' anxiety, all they have hitherto been able to obtain is the assignment of persons to investigate and give an opinion on their titles. Those officers find that there are nearly eight good titles in this country, and the remainder abound in defects which they deem fatal. Hence the anxiety, confusion, and distress of the country is such, as it is impossible to describe or to conceive; and their hopes are now all turned to the effects which the exertions of the officers of their Government before Congress in their behalf may have.

By the provisions adopted by the House of Representatives, occupiers under original French titles are confirmed in their possessions: the same provision is extended to British titles. Incomplete titles up to a certain period are confirmed; and to actual settlers, previous to a certain day not claiming under other descriptions, there are allowed two hundred acres. These are usual provisions in similar cases, which result from the nature of the case, and appear immutable, and such as may as well be adopted at this moment as twelve years hence. With respect to settlement rights, indeed, there is room for some diversity of opinion as to the time and as to the quantity; and those points may as well be settled now as hereafter, for the lapse of time is calculated to throw no additional light on them. If the time be fixed to the 1st day of June, 1796, it only drives away a few settlers, who are a loss to us, and an acquisition to the British Government.

The question who shall decide on the titles is of no consequence in itself. Some think that, as the power to hear, examine, and determine a right claimed under a statute, is strictly a judicial power; that it ought to be vested in a judicial tribunal. Others seem to think that, notwithstanding the power to hear, examine, determine, and finally adjust these claims, they may still be a subject of litigation, and that there is an incompatibility in the same tribunal considering the question which they apprehend may thus arise. The reference of them to the executive officers, who had been assigned to investigate them, the register and receiver, is, therefore, proposed. Whether either of these courses is pursued, or special commissioners appointed, is of no consequence to the country; it is only important that some mode should be adopted. The consideration of the claims, in detail, by the Legislature, though some favor it, is certainly impracticable.

By a letter from the clerk of the land officers, hereto annexed, it appears that the details of the claims already occupy one large folio volume of five hundred pages, and that a second has been commenced, which will also probably be full. The transcription of such a mass of matter, and its conveyance to the seat of Government, will consume much time. After its arrival it will not be read. It is only results public men want, and these results are already given; for the officers of the land office say that, having furnished a copy of every species of claim, and the number of claims of such species, no information can be added which does not relate to the merits only of the particular cases.

A copy of the proceedings of the inhabitants, through a convention of delegates from the several militia companies in the Territory, and the address of that convention to the President of the United States on this subject, evincive of their sentiments, and their present miserable state, is also submitted.

A private letter is also annexed, which states the formation of an American company of wealth, intelligence, and spirit, who are about to embark an immediate capital of one hundred thousand dollars in the fur trade. The Western commerce has been so long and so completely engrossed by the British merchants, that the friends of our country have long been desirous of such an event as is now announced. It is certainly very singular that the American commercial capital should, at this day, be found too small to supply American consumption; yet the amount of the revenue derived from this country is a complete test of the imbecility of our commerce; for those duties which would be paid in the Atlantic ports, if American capital were employed in supplying American consumption, are now paid in this country, because a British capital is employed. It is, however, certain that these gentlemen must be disappointed in their objects, unless supported by the whole strength and spirit of the country. This they cannot be while the public mind is kept wavering between two Governments, and while every man who can effect it, without what he deems too great a sacrifice, is removing to the opposite side of the strait, and embarking his personal skill and experience, with his pecuniary resources, in a foreign service.

Immediately after the relinquishment of Detroit by the British, they established rival towns on the opposite side. Sandwich and Amherstburg were struggling hard against the former, yet the American side still kept the superiority. A terrible conflagration in one hour annihilated Detroit, and left to it no longer one single house. With this calamity, added to the others, the spirit of the country would have sunk, had it not been for the critical arrival of a new Government, and the consequent regulation of public affairs, a restoration of harmony, and the assurances given of the disposition of the General Government—assurances, which it was asserted and believed, would not terminate, as heretofore, in general professions of benevolence, but result in prompt and vigorous action. If these expectations are disappointed, in vain can any further professions be offered them; in vain can any further attempts be made to inspire energy into this country. The critical moment will be lost, and the superiority of our rivals is established, beyond further contest, for a great number of years to come.

The House of Representatives, sympathizing with the misfortunes of this country, have given a donation to their relief. Such is the disposition of public bodies, that, at any future day, or on any other occasion than one of such immediate and urgent calamity, the assent of that House to a measure of this description cannot be calculated upon. If, therefore, the honorable the Senate should be disposed to be equally liberal and generous to this country, it now rests with them to exhibit an effectual manifestation of it; for, at a future day, even if a similar disposition should prevail, it may never be equally in their power.

Some minor regulations are also important. One of them is to extend to the people of the Territory a participation in their own Government. This the House of Representatives propose to do by adding to the judges, who now legislate, a small body representing the people. The satisfaction and security this is calculated to give need not be commented on. A legislation gradually and delicately to assimilate the customs of a foreign people to the American, and thus reducing all to one consistent and uniform system, is certainly desirable. The judges being necessarily acquainted with American jurisprudence, are compelled also, by a constant action on the concerns of the people, in the courts, to acquire a knowledge of their laws and customs. This is certainly not an easy task; for, though the coutume de Paris may be considered as a written system, yet as to the parts which apply, and those which do not, there is no written information, and every thing must be gathered from the customs that have prevailed in the country. By thus acquiring both systems of jurisprudence, the one is less violently reduced into conformity with the other; and this is the only rational argument why the judges should be charged with any part of the legislation. Without them, the country is not possessed of the principles of the American jurisprudence; and, without a body of men belonging particularly to the country, the temper and feelings of the people, in gradual changes of their jurisprudence, cannot be correctly apprehended. Perhaps what is termed the second grade of territorial government, however applicable to new settlements strictly American, is not so applicable to an old country, using foreign laws, transferred to American jurisdiction. The situation of the people, with a Legislature under what has been called the second grade, would certainly be more awkward than it is now under the legislation of the judges, without the participation of a representative body. The introduction, however, of such a body, it is not doubted by the officers of this Government, would be highly useful to them.

So many questions are daily arising in legislative bodies, which affect remote districts of country, who are entirely ignorant of what is pending, that the House of Representatives has accorded the privilege of a delegate, without a vote, in their own body. When that House has consented to a measure of this nature, it is scarcely to be apprehended that the Senate will deny their consent to it.

On other provisions no observations will, at present, be made; but the importance of acting on these subjects, without further procrastination, is so great, as to render it highly desirable that they may now be honored with the conclusive decision of the Senate of the United States.

If the principles involved in these questions were really of importance to the General Government, it might not be delicate even after so great a consumption of time, to press a decision of them; but when all minds who think at all on the subject agree in principle, (and it is only on the mode there is any diversity of sentiment, with respect to which it is of very subordinate consequence in what modification a majority concur,) it is certainly hard that a mere want of time should operate so injuriously to a whole people.

By the provisions of the bills which are now pending, the time of presenting the outstanding claims, which are more than one-third of the whole, will be extended; and the existing titles will be completely adjusted, to the satisfaction of the General Government and of the inhabitants. By executive arrangements an extinguishment of Indian title will, at the same time, be made; the sales of the United States' lands opened; and the means afforded to emigrants of acquiring new titles. At the same time, the spirit of individual enterprise, rising now too powerfully to be repressed, will carry forward this quarter of the country so as soon to leave its rival behind; the face of this comfortless region will smile, and a ray of happiness will gleam over its distresses. By further delay, on the contrary, the spirit of the country is suffered to sink under its misfortunes; the feelings and affections of the people are tampered with, until they are irrecoverably lost; discord and discontent are the inevitable concomitants; and years of labor, and even of generosity, cannot restore the position which has been lost.

EXPLORATION OF THE WESTERN WATERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 22, 1806.

Mr. ALSTON, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to the farther exploring of the western waters, made the following report:

That considerable useful information has already been derived from those expeditions which have taken place, under the direction of the President of the United States, in exploring the western waters. The river Missouri has, by Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, been traced nearly to its source; the Mississippi, by Lieutenant Pike, to its source; and the Red River, by Mr. Freeman, about six hundred miles from its mouth, nearly as far as the French settlements extended.

The important surveys made by Messrs. Lewis, Clarke, and Freeman, in addition to those before made, furnish materials for commencing an accurate map of the Mississippi and its western waters; some principal rivers, however, remain still to be explored. The ridges or mountains from which the sources of these rivers spring, in a great measure form the exterior boundary of the newly acquired territory of the United States on the west side of the Mississippi. It therefore makes it the more important that the work commenced of exploring the western waters should be carried on and finally completed.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of $—— be annually appropriated for the term of —— years, for the purpose of enabling the President of the United States further to explore the western waters of the United States.

HIGHLAND TURNPIKE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 5, 1807.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, from the committee to whom was referred the petition and memorial of the president and directors of the Highland Turnpike Company, in the State of New York, made the following report:

That it appears a company has been incorporated, by a law of the Legislature of the State of New York, for the purpose of making a turnpike road from the island of New York to the city of Hudson, passing over the Highland mountains on the east side of Hudson river; and that the said president and directors solicit the aid of the United States, praying that a part of the surplus money arising from the Post Office may be subscribed to the stock of the said company.

Your committee consider the undertaking as an important one, as the mail might be transported in shorter time, and at less expense, if the road were completed; but as they are of opinion that it would be inexpedient for the United States to interfere with or be concerned in any turnpike company, they respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have liberty to withdraw their petition.

COLONIZATION OF PEOPLE OF COLOR FROM VIRGINIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 16, 1807.

IN THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES, December 31, 1800.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to correspond with the President of the United States on the subject of purchasing lands without the limits of this State, whither persons obnoxious to the laws or dangerous to the peace of society may be removed.

A copy from the journal of the House of Delegates.

WM. WIRT, Clk. Ho. Del.

SIR:

RICHMOND, June 15, 1801.

I enclose you a resolution of the General Assembly of this commonwealth, of the last session, by which it is made my duty to correspond with you on the subject of obtaining, by purchase, lands without the limits of this State, to which persons obnoxious to the laws or dangerous to the peace of society may be removed. This resolution was produced by the conspiracy of the slaves which took place in this city and neighborhood last year, and is applicable to that description of persons only. The idea of such an acquisition was suggested by motives of humanity, it being intended by means thereof to provide an alternate mode of punishment for those described by the resolution who, under the existing laws, might be doomed to suffer death. It was deemed more humane, and it is hoped would be found in practice not less expedient, to transport such offenders beyond the limits of the State.

It seems to be the more obvious intention of the Legislature, as inferred from the resolution, to make the proposed acquisition of land in the vacant western territory of the United States, but it does not appear to me to preclude one without the limits of the Union. If a friendly Power would designate a tract of country within its jurisdiction, either on this continent or on a neighboring island, to which we might send such persons, it is not improbable the Legislature might prefer it. In any event, an alternative could not otherwise than be desirable, since, after maturely weighing the conditions and advantages of each position, the Legislature might still prefer that which appeared to it most eligible.

It is proper to remark, that the latter part of the resolution, which proposes the removal of such persons as are dangerous to the peace of society, may be understood as comprising many to whom the preceding member does not apply. Whether the Legislature intended to give it a more extensive import, or rather whether it contemplated removing from the country any but culprits who were condemned to suffer death, I will not undertake to decide. But if the more enlarged construction of the resolution is deemed the true one, it furnishes, in my opinion, a strong additional motive why the Legislature, in disposing of this great concern, should command an alternative of places.

As soon as the mind emerges, in contemplating the subject, beyond the contracted scale of providing a mode of punishment for offenders, vast and interesting objects present themselves to view. It is impossible not to revolve in it the condition of those people, the embarrassment they have already occasioned us, and are still likely to subject us to. We perceive an existing evil, which commenced under our colonial system, with which we are not properly chargeable, or, if at all, not in the present degree; and we acknowledge the extreme difficulty of remedying it. At this point the mind rests with suspense, and surveys with anxiety obstacles which become more serious as we approach them. It is in vain for the Legislature to deliberate on the subject in the extent which it is capable of, with a view to adopt the system of policy which appears to it most wise and just, if it have not the means of executing it. To lead to a sound decision, and make the result a happy one, it is necessary that the field of practicable expedients be opened to its election on the widest possible scale.

Under this view of the subject, I shall be happy to be advised by you whether a tract of land in the western territory of the United States can be procured for this purpose, in what quarter, and on what terms; and also whether any friendly Power will permit us to remove such persons within its limits, with like precision as to the place and conditions. It is possible a friendly Power may be disposed to promote a population of the kind referred to, and willing to facilitate the measure by co-operating with us in the accomplishment of it. It may be convenient for you to sound such Powers, especially those more immediately in our neighborhood, on the subject, in all the views which may appear to you to be suitable.

You will perceive that I invite your attention to a subject of great delicacy and importance; one which, in a peculiar degree, involves the future peace, tranquillity, and happiness of the good people of this commonwealth. I do it, however, in a confidence that you will take that interest in it which we are taught to expect from your conduct through life, which gives you so many high claims to our regard.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, President of the United States.

DEAR SIR:

WASHINGTON, November 24, 1801.

I had not been unmindful of your letter of June 15, covering a letter of the House of Representatives of Virginia, and referred to in yours of the 17th instant. The importance of the subject, and the belief that it gave us time for consideration till the next meeting of the Legislature, have induced me to defer the answer to this date. You will perceive that some circumstances connected with the subject, and necessarily presenting themselves to view, would be improper but for yours and the legislative ear. Their publication might have an ill effect in more than one quarter. In confidence of attention to this, I shall indulge greater freedom in writing.

Common malefactors, I presume, make no part of the object of that resolution. Neither their numbers nor the nature of their offences seem to require any provisions beyond those practised heretofore, and found adequate to the repression of ordinary crimes. Conspiracy, insurgency, treason, rebellion, among that description of persons who brought on us the alarm, and on themselves the tragedy of 1800, were doubtless within the view of every one; but many perhaps contemplated, and one expression of the resolution might comprehend, a much larger scope. Respect to both opinions makes it my duty to understand the resolution in all the extent of which it is susceptible.

The idea seems to be to provide for these people by a purchase of lands; and it is asked whether such a purchase can be made of the United States in their western territory? A very great extent of country north of the Ohio has been laid off into townships, and is now at market, according to the provisions of the act of Congress, with which you are acquainted. There is nothing which would restrain the State of Virginia either in the purchase or the application of these lands. But a purchase by the acre might, perhaps, be a more expensive provision than the House of Representatives contemplated. Questions would also arise whether the establishment of such a colony, within our limits, and to become a part of our Union, would be desirable to the State of Virginia itself, or to the other States, especially those who would be in its vicinity.

Could we procure lands, beyond the limits of the United States, to form a receptacle for these people? On our northern boundary, the country not occupied by British subjects is the property of Indian nations, whose title would have to be extinguished, with the consent of Great Britain; and the new settlers would be British subjects. It is hardly to be believed that either Great Britain or the Indian proprietors have so disinterested a regard for us as to be willing to relieve us by receiving such a colony themselves; and as much to be doubted whether that race of men could long exist in so rigorous a climate. On our western and southern frontiers Spain holds an immense country, the occupancy of which, however, is in the Indian natives, except a few insulated spots possessed by Spanish subjects. It is very questionable, indeed, whether the Indians would sell; whether Spain would be willing to receive these people; and nearly certain that she would not alienate the sovereignty. The same question to ourselves would recur here also, as did in the first case: should we be willing to have such a colony in contact with us? However our present interests may restrain us within our own limits, it is impossible not to look forward to distant times, when our rapid multiplication will expand itself beyond those limits, and cover the whole northern, if not the southern continent with a people speaking the same language, governed in similar forms and by similar laws. Nor can we contemplate with satisfaction either blot or mixture on that surface. Spain, France, and Portugal hold possessions on the southern continent, as to which I am not well enough informed to say how far they might meet our views. But either there or in the northern continent, should the constituted authorities of Virginia fix their attention of preference, I will have the dispositions of those Powers sounded in the first instance.

The West Indies offer a more probable and practicable retreat for them. Inhabited already by a people of their own race and color, climates congenial with their natural constitution, insulated from the other descriptions of men, nature seems to have formed these islands to become the receptacles of the blacks transplanted into this hemisphere. Whether we could obtain from the European sovereigns of those islands leave to send thither the persons under contemplation, I cannot say; but I think it more probable than the former propositions, because of their being already inhabited more or less by the same race. The most promising portion of them is the island of St. Domingo, where the blacks are established into a sovereignty de facto, and have organized themselves under regular laws and government. I should conjecture that their present ruler might be willing, on many considerations, to receive even that description which would be exiled for acts deemed criminal by us, but meritorious, perhaps, by him. The possibility that these exiles might stimulate and conduct vindictive or predatory descents on our coasts, and facilitate concert with their brethren remaining here, looks to a state of things between that island and us not probable on a contemplation of our relative strength, and of the disproportion daily growing; and it is overweighed by the humanity of the measures proposed, and the advantages of disembarassing ourselves of such dangerous characters. Africa would offer a last and undoubted resort, if all others more desirable should fail us. Whenever the Legislature of Virginia shall have brought its mind to a point, so that I may know exactly what to propose to foreign authorities, I will execute their wishes with fidelity and zeal. I hope, however, they will pardon me for suggesting a single question for their own consideration. When we contemplate the variety of countries and of sovereigns towards which we may direct our views; the vast revolutions and changes of circumstance which are now in a course of progression; the possibilities that arrangements now to be made with a view to any particular place may, at no great distance of time, be totally deranged by a change of sovereignty, of government, or of other circumstances, it will be for the Legislature to consider whether, after they shall have made all those general provisions which may be fixed by legislative authority, it would be reposing too much confidence in their Executive to leave the place of relegation to be decided on by them, and executed with the aid of the Federal Executive. They could accommodate their arrangements to the actual state of things in which countries or Powers may be found to exist at the day, and may prevent the effect of the law from being defeated by intervening changes. This, however, is for them to decide. Our duty will be to respect their decision. Accept assurances, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

To Governor MONROE.

RICHMOND, December 21, 1801.

SIR: I have the pleasure to communicate to the General Assembly a copy of my correspondence with the President of the United States, in compliance with the resolution of the 31st of December last, relative to the purchase of lands without the limits of the State, to which persons obnoxious to its laws or dangerous to the peace of society may be removed. As it was known that the United States had lands for sale in the territory lying between the Ohio and the Mississippi, a proposition to make the acquisition by purchase conveyed the idea of a preference for a tract in that quarter; but as such preference was not declared, and a liberal construction of the resolution admitted a greater scope, I thought it my duty to open the subject in that light to the President. His reply has stated fully and ably the objections which occur to such an establishment within the limits of the United States. He also presents to view all the other places on this continent, and elsewhere, which furnish alternatives, with the advantages and disadvantages attending each; and assures us of the promptitude and zeal with which he will co-operate in carrying into effect whatever plan the Legislature may adopt in reference to the object contemplated. It remains, therefore, for the General Assembly to explain more fully the description of persons who are to be thus transported, and the place to which it is disposed to give the preference. As soon as its sense is declared on those points, I shall hasten to communicate the same to the President, and shall not fail to lay the result before you at your next session. It is proper to add, that it is the wish of the President that the communication be considered as confidential.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very humble servant,

JAS. MONROE.

To the SPEAKER of the House of Delegates.

IN THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES, SATURDAY, January 16, 1802.

The Legislature of this commonwealth, by their resolution of December last, having authorized the Governor to correspond with the President of the United States relative to the purchase of lands without the limits of this State, to which persons obnoxious to the laws or dangerous to the peace of society might be removed, from which general expressions a difference of construction has prevailed; to reconcile which, recourse must be had to the actual state of things which produced the resolution: therefore,

Resolved, That as the resolution was not intended to embrace offenders for ordinary crimes, to which the laws have been found equal, but only those for conspiracy, insurgency, treason, and rebellion, among those particular persons who produced the alarm in this State in the fall of 1800, the Governor be requested, in carrying the said resolution into effect upon the construction here given, to request of the President of the United States, in procuring the lands, to prefer the continent of Africa, or any of the Spanish or Portugal settlements in South America.

Resolved, also, That the Governor be requested to correspond with the President of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining a place, without the limits of the same, to which free negroes or mulattoes, and such negroes or mulattoes as may be emancipated, may be sent, or choose to remove as a place of asylum; and that it is not the wish of the Legislature to obtain, on behalf of those who may remove or be sent thither, the sovereignty of such place.

Resolved, also, That the Governor lay before the next General Assembly the result of his communications, to be subject to their control.

GENTLEMEN:

I have the honor to enclose a resolution of the General Assembly, for an explanation of which I beg leave to refer you to the copies of letters which passed between the President of the United States and Governor Monroe, and to one written by the President to me, and by this mail transmitted to our Senators in Congress; but, for more satisfactory information, I have to refer you to the President himself, to whom I shall apologize for requesting you to trouble him on this occasion; but I know that he will with pleasure give you all the information you may require. From the nature of the delicate business contemplated in the resolution, you will see the propriety of its being considered as secret and confidential.

I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN PAGE.

VIRGINIA.—General Assembly begun and held at the Capitol, in the city of Richmond, on Monday, the third day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the commonwealth the twenty-ninth:

Resolved, That the Senators of this State in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and the Representatives requested, to exert their best efforts for the purpose of obtaining from the General Government a competent portion of territory, in the country of Louisiana, to be appropriated to the residence of such people of color as have been or shall be emancipated in Virginia, or may hereafter become dangerous to the public safety: Provided, That no contract or arrangement respecting such territory shall be obligatory on this commonwealth until ratified by the Legislature.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1804.

DEAR SIR:

Resuming the subject of the resolutions of the House of Delegates of December 31, 1800, January 16, 1802, and February 3, 1804, I have it not in my power to say that any change of circumstances has taken place, which enables me yet to propose any specific asylum for the persons who are the subjects of our correspondence. The island of St. Domingo, our nearest and most convenient recourse, is too unsettled in the conditions of its existence to be looked to as yet for any permanent arrangements; and the European nations having territories in the same quarter, and possessing the same kind of population, are not likely to risk any change in the present state of that population. Whether the inhabitants of our late acquisition beyond the Mississippi, or the National Legislature, would consent that a portion of that country should be set apart for the persons contemplated, is not within my competence to say.

My last information as to Sierra Leone, is, that the company were proposing to deliver up their colony to their Government. Should this take place, it might furnish occasion for another effort to procure an incorporation of ours into it. An attack, during the war, has done the settlement considerable injury.

I beg you to be assured that, having the object of the House of Delegates sincerely at heart, I will keep it under my constant attention, and omit no occasion which may occur of giving it effect.

Accept my affectionate salutations and assurances of great respect and consideration.

SLAVERY IN THE INDIANA TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 21, 1807.

Resolved, unanimously, by the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, That a suspension of the sixth article of compact between the United States and the Territories and States north-west of the river Ohio, passed the 13th day of July, 1787, for the term of ten years, would be highly advantageous to the said Territory, and meet the approbation of at least nine-tenths of the good citizens of the same.

Resolved, unanimously, That the abstract question of liberty and slavery is not considered as involved in a suspension of the said article, inasmuch as the number of slaves in the United States would not be augmented by the measure.

Resolved, unanimously, That the suspension of the said article would be equally advantageous to the Territory, to the States from whence the negroes would be brought, and to the negroes themselves.

To the Territory, because of its situation with regard to the other States, it must be settled by emigrants from those in which slavery is tolerated, or for many years remain in its present situation, its citizens deprived of the greater part of their political rights, and, indeed, of all those which distinguish the American from the citizens and subjects of other Governments.

The States which are overburdened with negroes would be benefited by their citizens having an opportunity of disposing of the negroes which they cannot comfortably support, or of removing with them to a country abounding with all the necessaries of life; and the negro himself would exchange a scanty pittance of the coarsest food for a plentiful and nourishing diet, and a situation which admits not the most distant prospect of emancipation, for one which presents no considerable obstacle to his wishes.

Resolved, unanimously, That the citizens of this part of the former Northwestern Territory consider themselves as having claims upon the indulgence of Congress in regard to a suspension of the said article, because at the time of the adoption of the ordinance of 1787 slavery was tolerated, and slaves generally possessed by the citizens then inhabiting the country, amounting to at least one-half the present population of Indiana, and because the said ordinance was passed in Congress when the said citizens were not represented in that body, without their being consulted, and without their knowledge and approbation.

Resolved unanimously, That from the situation, soil, climate, and productions of the Territory, it is not believed that the number of slaves would ever bear such proportion to the white population, as to endanger the internal peace and prosperity of the country.

Resolved, unanimously, That copies of these resolutions be delivered to the Governor of this Territory, to be by him forwarded to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, with a request that they will lay the same before the Senate and House of Representatives, over which they respectively preside.

Resolved, unanimously, That a copy of these resolutions be delivered to the delegate to Congress from this Territory, and that he be, and he hereby is, instructed to use his best endeavors to obtain a suspension of the said article.

BURR'S CONSPIRACY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 22, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Agreeably to the request of the House of Representatives, communicated in their resolution of the 16th instant, I proceed to state, under the reserve therein expressed, information received touching an illegal combination of private individuals against the peace and safety of the Union, and a military expedition planned by them against the territories of a Power in amity with the United States, with the measures I have pursued for suppressing the same.

I had, for some time, been in the constant expectation of receiving such further information as would have enabled me to lay before the Legislature the termination, as well as the beginning and progress of this scene of depravity, so far as it has been acted on the Ohio and its waters. From this, the state of safety of the lower country might have been estimated on probable grounds, and the delay was indulged the rather because no circumstance had yet made it necessary to call in the aid of the legislative functions. Information, now recently communicated, has brought us nearly to the period contemplated. The mass of what I have received, in the course of these transactions, is voluminous, but little has been given under the sanction of an oath, so as to constitute formal and legal evidence. It is chiefly in the form of letters, often containing such a mixture of rumors, conjectures, and suspicions, as renders it difficult to sift out the real facts, and unadvisable to hazard more than general outlines, strengthened by concurrent information, or the particular credibility of the relator. In this state of the evidence, delivered sometimes, too, under the restriction of private confidence, neither safety nor justice will permit the exposing names, except that of the principal actor, whose guilt is placed beyond question.

Some time in the latter part of September I received intimations that designs were in agitation in the western country, unlawful, and unfriendly to the peace of the Union, and that the prime mover in these was Aaron Burr, heretofore distinguished by the favor of his country. The grounds of these intimations being inconclusive, the objects uncertain, and the fidelity of that country known to be firm, the only measure taken was to urge the informants to use their best endeavors to get further insight into the designs and proceedings of the suspected persons, and to communicate them to me.

It was not until the latter part of October, that the objects of the conspiracy began to be perceived; but still so blended and involved in mystery, that nothing distinct could be singled out for pursuit. In this state of uncertainty, as to the crime contemplated, the acts done, and the legal course to be pursued, I thought it best to send to the scene where these things were principally in transaction a person in whose integrity, understanding, and discretion, entire confidence could be reposed, with instructions to investigate the plots going on, to enter into conference (for which he had sufficient credentials) with the Governors, and all other officers, civil and military, and, with their aid, to do on the spot whatever should be necessary to discover the designs of the conspirators, arrest their means, bring their persons to punishment, and to call out the force of the country to suppress any unlawful enterprise in which it should be found they were engaged. By this time it was known that many boats were under preparation, stores of provisions collecting, and an unusual number of suspicious characters in motion on the Ohio and its waters. Besides despatching the confidential agent to that quarter, orders were, at the same time, sent to the Governors of the Orleans and Mississippi Territories, and to the commanders of the land and naval forces there, to be on their guard against surprise, and in constant readiness to resist any enterprise which might be attempted on the vessels, posts, or other objects under their care; and on the 8th of November instructions were forwarded to General Wilkinson to hasten an accommodation with the Spanish commandant on the Sabine, and, as soon as that was effected, to fall back with his principal force to the hither bank of the Mississippi, for the defence of the interesting points on that river. By a letter received from that officer of the 25th of November, but dated October 21st, we learned that a confidential agent of Aaron Burr had been deputed to him, with communications, partly written in cipher and partly oral, explaining his designs, exaggerating his resources, and making such offers of emolument and command, to engage him and the army in his unlawful enterprise, as he had flattered himself would be successful. The general, with the honor of a soldier, and fidelity of a good citizen, immediately despatched a trusty officer to me, with information of what had passed, proceeded to establish such an understanding with the Spanish commandant on the Sabine as permitted him to withdraw his force across the Mississippi, and to enter on measures for opposing the projected enterprise.

The general's letter, which came to hand on the 25th of November, as has been mentioned, and some other information received a few days earlier, when brought together, developed Burr's general designs, different parts of which only had been revealed to different informants. It appeared that he contemplated two distinct objects, which might be carried on either jointly or separately, and either the one or the other first, as circumstances should direct. One of these was the severance of the union of these States by the Allegany mountains; the other an attack on Mexico; a third object was provided, merely ostensible, to wit, the settlement of a pretended purchase of a tract of country on the Washita, claimed by a Baron Bastrop. This was to serve as the pretext for all his preparations, an allurements for such followers as really wished to acquire settlements in that country, and a cover under which to retreat in the event of a final discomfiture of both branches of his real design.

He found at once that the attachment of the western country to the present Union was not to be shaken; that its dissolution could not be effected with the consent of its inhabitants; and that his resources were inadequate, as yet, to effect it by force. He took his course then at once; determined to seize on New Orleans, plunder the bank there, possess himself of the military and naval stores, and proceed on his expedition to Mexico; and to this object all his means and preparations were now directed. He collected from all the quarters where himself or his agents possessed influence all the ardent, restless, desperate, and disaffected persons who were ready for any enterprise analogous to their characters. He seduced good and well-meaning citizens, some by assurances that he possessed the confidence of the Government, and was acting under its secret patronage; a pretence which procured some credit, from the state of our differences with Spain; and others by offers of land in Bastrop's claim on the Washita.

This was the state of my information of his proceedings about the last of November; at which time, therefore, it was first possible to take specific measures to meet them. The proclamation of November 27, two days after the receipt of General Wilkinson's information, was now issued. Orders were despatched to every interesting point on the Ohio and Mississippi, from Pittsburg to New Orleans, for the employment of such force, either of the regulars or of the militia, and of such proceedings also of the civil authorities, as might enable them to seize on all boats and stores provided for the enterprise, to arrest the persons concerned, and to suppress effectually the further progress of the enterprise. A little before the receipt of these orders in the State of Ohio, our confidential agent, who had been diligently employed in investigating the conspiracy, had acquired sufficient information to open himself to the Governor of that State, and to apply for the immediate exertion of the authority and power of the State to crush the combination. Governor Tiffin and the Legislature, with a promptitude, an energy, and patriotic zeal, which entitle them to a distinguished place in the affection of their sister States, effected the seizure of all the boats, provisions, and other preparations within their reach; and thus gave a first blow, materially disabling the enterprise in its outset.

In Kentucky a premature attempt to bring Burr to justice, without sufficient evidence for his conviction, had produced a popular impression in his favor, and a general disbelief of his guilt. This gave him an unfortunate opportunity of hastening his equipments. The arrival of the proclamation and orders, and the application and information of our confidential agent, at length awakened the authorities of that State to the truth, and then produced the same promptitude and energy of which the neighboring State had set the example. Under an act of their Legislature of December 23, militia was instantly ordered to different important points, and measures taken for doing whatever could yet be done. Some boats (accounts vary from five to double or treble that number) and persons (differently estimated from one to three hundred) had, in the meantime, passed the falls of Ohio to rendezvous at the mouth of Cumberland, with others expected down that river.

Not apprized, till very late, that any boats were building on Cumberland, the effect of the proclamation had been trusted to for some time in the State of Tennessee; but on the 19th of December similar communications and instructions, with those to the neighboring States, were despatched by express to the Governor, and a general officer of the western division of the State; and on the 23d of December our confidential agent left Frankfort for Nashville, to put into activity the means of that State also. But by information received yesterday, I learn that on the 22d of December Mr. Burr descended the Cumberland, with two boats merely of accommodation, carrying with him from that State no quota towards his unlawful enterprise. Whether after the arrival of the proclamation, of the orders, or of our agent, any exertion which could be made by that State, or the orders of the Governor of Kentucky, for calling out the militia at the mouth of Cumberland, would be in time to arrest these boats, and those from the falls of Ohio, is still doubtful.

On the whole, the fugitives from the Ohio, with their associates from Cumberland, or any other place in that quarter, cannot threaten serious danger to the city of New Orleans.

By the same express of December 19 orders were sent to the Governors of Orleans and Mississippi, supplementary to those which had been given on the 25th of November, to hold the militia of their Territories in readiness to co-operate for their defence with the regular troops and armed vessels then under command of General Wilkinson. Great alarm, indeed, was excited at New Orleans by the exaggerated accounts of Mr. Burr, disseminated through his emissaries, of the armies and navies he was to assemble there. General Wilkinson had arrived there himself on the 24th of November, and had immediately put into activity the resources of the place for the purpose of its defence, and on the 10th of December he was joined by his troops from the Sabine. Great zeal was shown by the inhabitants generally; the merchants of the place readily agreeing to the most laudable exertions and sacrifices for manning the armed vessels with their seamen; and the other citizens manifesting unequivocal fidelity to the Union, and a spirit of determined resistance to their expected assailants.

Surmises have been hazarded that this enterprise is to receive aid from certain foreign Powers, but these surmises are without proof or probability. The wisdom of the measures sanctioned by Congress at its last session has placed us in the paths of peace and justice with the only Powers with whom we had any differences, and nothing has happened since which makes it either their interest or ours to pursue another course. No change of measures has taken place on our part; none ought to take place at this time. With the one, friendly arrangement was proposed; and the law, deemed necessary on the failure of that, was suspended, to give time for a fair trial of the issue. With the same Power friendly arrangement is now proceeding, under good expectations, and the same law, deemed necessary on failure of that, is still suspended to give time for a fair trial of the issue. With the other, negotiation was in like manner preferred, and provisional measures only taken to meet the event of rupture. With the same Power negotiation is still preferred, and provisional measures only are necessary to meet the event of rupture. While, therefore, we do not deflect in the slightest degree from the course we then assumed, and are still pursuing with mutual consent to restore a good understanding, we are not to impute to them practices as irreconcilable to interest as to good faith, and changing necessarily the relations of peace and justice between us to those of war. These surmises are, therefore, to be imputed to the vauntings of the author of this enterprise, to multiply his partisans by magnifying the belief of his prospects and support.

By letters from General Wilkinson of the 14th and 18th of December, which came to hand two days after the date of the resolution of the House of Representatives, that is to say, on the morning of the 18th instant, I received the important affidavit, a copy of which I now communicate, with extracts of so much of the letters as comes within the scope of the resolution. By these it will be seen that of three of the principal emissaries of Mr. Burr, whom the General had caused to be apprehended, one had been liberated by habeas corpus, and two others, being those particularly employed in the endeavor to corrupt the General and army of the United States, have been embarked by him for ports in the Atlantic States, probably on the consideration that an impartial trial could not be expected during the present agitations of New Orleans, and that that city was not as yet a safe place of confinement. As soon as these persons shall arrive, they will be delivered to the custody of the law, and left to such course of trial, both as to place and process, as its functionaries may direct. The presence of the highest judicial authorities to be assembled at this place within a few days, the means of pursuing a sounder course of proceedings here than elsewhere, and the aid of the Executive means, should the judges have occasion to use them, render it equally desirable for the criminal as for the public, that, being already removed from the place where they were first apprehended, the first regular arrest should take place here, and the course of proceedings receive here their proper direction.

Deposition of General Wilkinson.

NEW ORLEANS, November 25, 1806.

On the 30th of the same month I waited in person on Doctor E. Bollman, when he informed me that he had not heard from Colonel Burr since his arrival here; that he (the said Doctor E. Bollman) had sent despatches to Colonel Burr by a Lieutenant Spence of the navy, and that he had been advised of Spence's arrival at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and observed that Colonel Burr had proceeded too far to retreat; that he (Colonel Burr) had numerous and powerful friends in the United States, who stood pledged to support him with their fortunes, and that he must succeed; that he (the said Doctor E. Bollman) had written to Colonel Burr on the subject of provisions, and that he expected a supply would be sent from New York and also from Norfolk, where Colonel Burr had strong connexions. I did not see or hear from the doctor again until the 5th instant, when I called on him the second time. The mail having arrived the day before, I asked him whether he had received any intelligence from Colonel Burr. He informed me that he had seen a letter from Colonel Burr of the 30th of October, in which he (Colonel Burr) gave assurances that he should be at Natchez with two thousand men on the 20th of December instant, where he should wait until he heard from this place; that he would be followed by four thousand men more, and that he, (Colonel Burr,) if he had chosen, could have raised or got twelve thousand as easy as six thousand, but that he did not consider that number necessary. Confiding fully in this information, I became indifferent about further disguise. I then told the doctor that I should most certainly oppose Colonel Burr if he came this way. He replied, they must come here for equipments and shipping; and observed, that he did not know what had passed between Colonel Burr and myself; obliqued at a sham defence, and waived the subject.

From the documents in my possession, and the several communications, verbal as well as written, from the said Doctor Erick Bollman on this subject, I feel no hesitation in declaring, under the solemn obligation of an oath, that he has committed misprision of treason against the Government of the United States.

JAMES WILKINSON.

Signed and sworn to this 14th day of December, 1806, before me, one of the justices of the peace of this county.

J. CARRICK.

DEAR SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, July 25, 1806.

Mr. Swartwout, the brother of Colonel S., of New York, being on his way down the Mississippi, and presuming he may pass you at some post on the river, has requested of me a letter of introduction, which I give with pleasure, as he is a most amiable young man, and highly respectable from his character and connexions. I pray you to afford him any friendly offices which his situation may require, and beg you to pardon the trouble which this may give you.

With entire respect, your friend and obedient servant,

A. BURR.

His Excellency GENERAL WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter from General James Wilkinson, dated

NEW ORLEANS, December 14, 1806.

After several consultations with the Governor and judges, touching the arrest and confinement of certain known agents and emissaries of Colonel Burr, in this city and Territory, whose intrigues and machinations were to be apprehended, it is with their privity and approbation that I have caused three of them to be arrested, viz: Dr. Erick Bollman, Samuel Swartwout, and Peter V. Ogden, against whom I possess strong facts, and I have recommended to the Governor to have James Alexander, Esq. taken up on the ground of strong suspicion. These persons, and all others, who, by their character and deportment, may be considered hostile to the interests of the United States, or dangerous to this feeble frontier, under the menacing aspect of things from above, will, if my influence can prevail, be seized and sent by sea to the United States, subject to the disposition of Government, and accompanied with such information as may justify their confinement, and furnish a clew to the development of the grounds, progress, and projectors of the treasonable enterprise in which they are engaged.

This letter will accompany Dr. Bollman, who is to be this day embarked in a vessel bound for Charleston, under the charge of Lieutenant Wilson of the artillery, who has orders to land with his prisoner at Fort Johnston or Fort Moultrie, to forward this despatch by mail, and to wait the orders of the Executive. Mr. Swartwout will be sent to Baltimore by a vessel which will sail some time the ensuing week, in custody of another subaltern, who will be the bearer of strong testimony against him and also Colonel Burr; and the others will follow, under due precautions, by the earliest opportunities which may present.

I deem it essential to keep these prisoners apart, to prevent the adjustment of correspondent answers or confessions to any examination which may ensue; and I hope the measures of the Executive may be so prompt and efficient as to relieve the officers in charge of them from their trust before the interposition of the friends of the prisoners may effect their liberation.

By this procedure we may intimidate the confederates, who are unquestionably numerous in this as well as the adjacent Territory, disconcert their arrangements, and possibly destroy their intrigues; and I hope the zeal which directs the measure may be justified and approved, for whilst the glow of patriotism actuates my conduct, and I am willing to offer myself a martyr to the constitution of my country, I should indeed be most grievously disappointed did I incur its censure.

Here, sir, we find the key to the Western States, and here we must form one grand depository and place of arms. Combine to this disposition a river fleet competent to its occlusion, and post it thirty or forty leagues above the Yazoo river, and we may repose in security; for the discontent and sufferings of our insurgent citizens, which must immediately ensue, will soon open their eyes to the wickedness of their leaders, and work a radical reformation without bloodshed. This is my plan for resisting an internal attack; for external defence, gun-boats and bomb-ketches, with floating batteries, at the mouths of the Mississippi and the passes from Lake Pontchartrain, will be necessary.

NEW ORLEANS, December 18, 1806.

SIR:

Since my last of the 14th instant, writs of habeas corpus have been issued for the bodies of Bollman, Swartwout, and Ogden, the two latter by Judge Workman, who is strongly suspected of being connected with Burr in his conspiracy, as I have proof this man declared some time since that "the republican who possessed power, and did not employ it to establish a despotism, was a fool." His writ for Ogden was served on Captain Shaw of the navy, who had him in charge, at my request, on board the Etna bomb-ketch, and delivered him up, and Mr. Workman discharged him, without giving me a word of information, although he knew he was confined by my order for a treasonable combination with Burr, and Mr. Ogden now struts at large. Swartwout I have sent off, and shall so report, holding myself ready for consequences. Bollman was required by the superior court, but I have got rid of that affair also, under the usual liability for damages; in which case I shall look to our country for protection.

I, James Wilkinson, brigadier general and commander-in-chief of the army of the United States, to warrant the arrest of Dr. Erick Bollman, on a charge of treason, misprision of treason, or such other offence against the Government and laws of the United States as the following facts may legally charge him with, on my honor, as a soldier, and on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, do declare and swear, that, on the sixth day of November last, when in command at Natchitoches, I received, by the hands of a Frenchman, a stranger to me, a letter from Dr. Erick Bollman, of which the following is a correct copy:

SIR:

NEW ORLEANS, September 27, 1806.

I have the honor to forward to your excellency the enclosed letters, which I was charged to deliver to you by our mutual friend. I shall remain for some time at this place, and should be glad to learn where and when I may have the pleasure of an interview with you. Have the goodness to inform me of it, and please to direct your letter to me, care of ———, or enclose it under cover to them.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient servant,

ERICK BOLLMAN.

General WILKINSON.

Covering a communication in cipher from Colonel Aaron Burr, of which the following is substantially as fair an interpretation as I have heretofore been able to make, the original of which I hold in my possession.

"I, Aaron Burr, have obtained funds, and have actually commenced the enterprise. Detachments from different points, and under different pretences, will rendezvous on the Ohio 1st November. Every thing internal and external favors views. Protection of England is secured. T.* is gone to Jamaica to arrange with the admiral on that station, and will meet at the Mississippi—England—navy of the United States are ready to join, and final orders are given to my friends and followers. It will be a host of choice spirits. Wilkinson shall be second to Burr only. Wilkinson shall dictate the rank and promotion of his officers. Burr will proceed westward, 1st August, never to return: with him goes his daughter: the husband will follow in October, with a corps of worthies. Send forthwith an intelligent and confidential friend with whom Burr may confer. He shall return immediately with further interesting details: this is essential to concert and harmony of movement. Send a list of all persons known to Wilkinson west of the mountains, who could be useful, with a note delineating the characters. By your messenger send me four or five of the commissions of your officers, which you can borrow under any pretence you please. They shall be returned faithfully. Already are orders to the contractor given to forward six months' provisions to points Wilkinson may name. This shall not be used until the last moment, and then under proper injunctions. The project is brought to the point so long desired. Burr guaranties the result with his life and honor—the lives, the honor, and fortune of hundreds, the best blood of our country. Burr's plan of operations is to move down rapidly from the falls on the 15th of November, with the first five hundred or one thousand men in light boats, now constructing for that purpose, to be at Natchez between the 5th and 15th of December: then to meet Wilkinson: then to determine whether it will be expedient, in the first instance, to seize on or pass by Baton Rouge. On receipt of this send Burr an answer. Draw on Burr for all expenses, &c. The people of the country to which we are going are prepared to receive us: their agents, now with Burr, say that, if we will protect their religion, and will not subject them to a foreign Power, in three weeks all will be settled.

"The gods invite to glory and fortune: it remains to be seen whether we deserve the boon. The bearer of this goes express to you: he will hand a formal letter of introduction to you from Burr, a copy of which is hereunto subjoined: he is a man of inviolable honor and perfect discretion; formed to execute rather than to project; capable of relating facts with fidelity, and incapable of relating them otherwise. He is thoroughly informed of the plans and intentions of ———, and will disclose to you as far as you inquire, and no further. He has imbibed a reverence for your character, and may be embarrassed in your presence: put him at ease, and he will satisfy you. Dr. Bollman, equally confidential, better informed on the subject, and more intelligent, will hand this duplicate.

"29th JULY."

The day after my arrival in this city, the 26th of November last, I received another letter from the doctor, of which the following is a correct copy:

SIR:

Your letter of the 6th instant has been duly received. Supposing that you will be much engaged this morning, I defer waiting on your excellency till you will be pleased to inform me of the time when it will be convenient to you to see me.

I remain, with great respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

BURR'S CONSPIRACY—ARRESTS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 26TH OF JANUARY, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

JANUARY 26, 1807.

I received from General Wilkinson, on the 23d instant, his affidavit charging Samuel Swartwout, Peter V. Ogden, and James Alexander with the crimes described in the affidavit, a copy of which is now communicated to both Houses of Congress.

* Truxton.

It was announced to me at the same time, that Swartwout and Bollman, two of the persons apprehended by him, were arrived in this city in custody each of a military officer. I immediately delivered to the Attorney of the United States in this district the evidence received against them, with instructions to lay the same before the judges, and apply for their process to bring the accused to justice; and I put into his hands orders to the officers having them in custody to deliver them to the marshal, on his application.

TH: JEFFERSON.

I, James Wilkinson, brigadier general and commander-in-chief of the army of the United States, to warrant the arrest of Samuel Swartwout, James Alexander, Esq., and Peter V. Ogden, on a charge of treason, misprision of treason, or such other offence against the Government and laws of the United States, as the following facts may legally charge them with, on the honor of a soldier, and on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, do declare and swear, that, in the beginning of the month of October last, when in command at Natchitoches, a stranger was introduced to me by Colonel Cushing, by the name of Swartwout, who, a few minutes after the colonel retired from the room slipped into my hand a letter of formal introduction from Colonel Burr, of which the following is a correct copy:

DEAR SIR:

Together with a packet which he informed me he was charged by the same person to deliver me in private. This packet contained a letter in cipher from Colonel Burr, of which the following is substantially as fair an interpretation as I have heretofore been able to make, the original of which I hold in my possession.

He has imbibed a reverence for your character, and may be embarrassed in your presence; put him at ease, and he will satisfy you."—29th July.

I instantly resolved to avail myself of the reference made to the bearer, and, in the course of some days, drew from him (the said Swartwout) the following disclosure: "That he had been despatched by Colonel Burr from Philadelphia; had passed through the States of Ohio and Kentucky, and proceeded from Louisville for St. Louis, where he expected to find me; but discovering at Kaskaskias that I had descended the river, he procured a skiff, hired hands, and followed me down the Mississippi to Fort Adams; and from thence set out for Natchitoches, in company with Captains Sparks and Hooke, under the pretence of a disposition to take part in the campaign against the Spaniards, then depending. That Colonel Burr, with the support of a powerful association extending from New York to New Orleans, was levying an armed body of seven thousand men from the State of New York and the Western States and Territories, with a view to carry an expedition against the Mexican provinces; and that five hundred men, under Colonel Swartwout and a Colonel or Major Tyler, were to descend the Allegany, for whose accommodation light boats had been built and were ready." I inquired what would be their course; he said, "this Territory would be revolutionized, where the people were ready to join them; and that there would be some seizing, he supposed, at New Orleans; that they expected to be ready to embark about the 1st of February; and intended to land at Vera Cruz, and to march from thence to Mexico." I observed that there were several millions of dollars in the bank of this place; to which he replied, "we know it full well;" and, on my remarking that they certainly did not mean to violate private property, he said, "they meant to borrow, and would return it; that they must equip themselves in New Orleans; that they expected naval protection from Great Britain; that the captains and the officers of our navy were so disgusted with the Government that they were ready to join; that similar disgusts prevailed throughout the Western country, where the people were zealous in favor of the enterprise; and that pilot-boat built schooners were contracted for along our southern coast for their service; that he had been accompanied from the falls of Ohio to Kaskaskias, and from thence to Fort Adams by a Mr. Ogden, who had proceeded on to New Orleans with letters from Colonel Burr to his friends there." Swartwout asked me whether I had heard from Doctor

Bollman; and, on my answering in the negative, he expressed great surprise, and observed, "that the doctor and a Mr. Alexander had left Philadelphia before him with despatches for me; and that they were to proceed by sea to New Orleans, where he said they must have arrived."

Though determined to deceive him, if possible, I could not refrain telling Mr. Swartwout it was impossible that I could ever dishonor my commission; and I believe I duped him by my admiration of the plan, and by observing, "that although I could not join in the expedition, the engagements which the Spaniards had prepared for me in my front might prevent my opposing it." Yet I did, the moment I had deciphered the letter, put it into the hands of Colonel Cushing, my adjutant and inspector; making the declaration that I should oppose the lawless enterprise with my utmost force. Mr. Swartwout informed me that he was under engagements to meet Colonel Burr at Nashville on the 20th of November, and requested of me to write to him, which I declined; and on his leaving Natchitoches about the 18th of October, I immediately employed Lieutenant T. A. Smith to convey the information in substance to the President without the commitment of names; for, from the extraordinary nature of the project and the more extraordinary appeal to me, I could but doubt its reality, notwithstanding the testimony before me; and I did not attach solid belief to Mr. Swartwout's reports respecting their intentions on this Territory and city, until I received confirmatory advice from St. Louis.

After my return from the Sabine I crossed the country to Natchez, and, on my descent of the Mississippi from that place, I found Swartwout and Peter V. Ogden at Fort Adams; with the latter I held no communication, but was informed by Swartwout that he (Ogden) had returned so far from New Orleans on his route to Tennessee, but had been so much alarmed by certain reports in circulation, that he was afraid to proceed. I inquired whether he bore letters with him from New Orleans, and was informed by Swartwout that he did not; but that a Mr. Spence had been sent from New Orleans through the country to Nashville with letters for Colonel Burr.

I reached this city the 25th ultimo, and on the next morning James Alexander, Esq. visited me; he inquired of me, aside, whether I had seen Doctor Bollman, and, on my answering in the negative, he asked me whether I would suffer him to conduct Bollman to me, which I refused. He appeared desirous to communicate something, but I felt no inclination to inculcate this young man, and he left me. A few days after he paid me a second visit, and seemed desirous to communicate, which I avoided until he had risen to take leave; I then raised my finger, and observed, "take care, you are playing a dangerous game." He answered, "it will succeed." I again observed, "take care;" and he replied, with a strong affirmation, "Burr will be here by the beginning of next month." In addition to these corroborating circumstances against Alexander, I beg leave to refer to the accompanying documents A, B, from all [which I feel no hesitation in declaring, under the solemn obligation of an oath, that I do believe the said Swartwout, Alexander, and Ogden have been parties to, and have been concerned in, the insurrection formed or forming in the States and Territories on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, against the laws and constitution of the United States.

BURR'S CONSPIRACY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 28, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

JANUARY 28, 1807.

By the letters of Captain Bissel, who commands at Fort Massac, and of Mr. Murrell to General Jackson, of Tennessee, copies of which are now communicated to Congress, it will be seen that Aaron Burr passed Fort Massac, on the 31st of December, with about ten boats, navigated by about six hands each, without any military appearance; and that three boats with ammunition were said to have been arrested by the militia at Louisville.

As the guards of militia, posted on various points of the Ohio, will be able to prevent any further aids passing through that channel, should any be attempted, we may now estimate, with tolerable certainty, the means derived from the Ohio and its waters towards the accomplishment of the purposes of Mr. Burr.

TH: JEFFERSON.

SIR:

NASHVILLE, January 8, 1807.

I received your instructions dated the 2d instant, and, agreeably thereto, I delivered your letter, addressed to General Thomas Johnson, to Colonel Cheatham, and it was forwarded to him immediately. I arrived at Centreville on the 4th instant; heard a report there that Colonel Burr had gone down the river with one thousand armed men; arrived at the mouth of Cumberland river that evening, and made inquiry concerning Colonel Burr; and was informed that he left that place on the 28th of December, 1806, with ten boats, of different descriptions; had sixty men on board, but no appearance of arms. I left there on the 5th instant, and arrived at Fort Massac that evening; delivered your letter to Captain Bissel and received his answer; made some inquiries of him, and was informed that Colonel Burr had left that place on the 30th December, 1806, with ten boats. He likewise informed me that he had been on board the boats, and seen no appearance of arms or ammunition. On my return to the mouth of Cumberland river I was informed that three boats had been stopped at Louisville, with a quantity of ammunition. There are about fifty men stationed at the mouth of Cumberland, under command of Colonel Ramsey.

I remain, with the highest esteem, yours,

JOHN MURRELL.

General ANDREW JACKSON.

SIR:

FORT MASSAC, January 5, 1807.

This day, per express, I had the honor to receive your very interesting letter of the 2d instant; I shall pay due respect to its contents; as yet I have not received the President's proclamation alluded to, nor have I received any orders from the Department of War relative to the subject-matter of your letter.

There has not, to my knowledge, been any assemblage of men or boats, at this or any other place, unauthorized by law or precedency; but, should any thing of the kind make its appearance, which carries with it the least mark of suspicion, as having illegal enterprises or projects in view, hostile to the peace and good order of Government, I shall, with as much ardor and energy as the case will admit, endeavor to bring to justice all such offenders.

For more than two weeks last past I have made it a point to make myself acquainted with the loading and situation of all boats descending the river. As yet there has nothing the least alarming appeared. On or about the 31st ultimo, Colonel Burr, late Vice President of the United States, passed this with about ten boats, of different descriptions, navigated with about six men each, having nothing on board that would even suffer a conjecture, more than a man bound to market; he has descended the rivers towards Orleans. Should any thing to my knowledge transpire interesting to Government, I will give the most early notice in my power.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

DANIEL BISSEL, Commanding Captain.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 31, 1807.

JANUARY 31, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In execution of the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," I appointed Thomas Moore, of Maryland, Joseph Kerr, of Ohio, and Eli Williams, of Maryland, commissioners to lay out the said road, and to perform the other duties assigned to them by the act. The progress which they made in the execution of the work, during the last season, will appear in their report now communicated to Congress; on the receipt of it, I took measures to obtain consent, for making the road of the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, through which the commissioners propose to lay it out. I have received acts of the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, giving the consent desired; that of Pennsylvania has the subject still under consideration, as is supposed. Until I receive full consent to a free choice of route through the whole distance, I have thought it safest neither to accept nor reject finally the partial report of the commissioners.

Some matters suggested in the report belong exclusively to the Legislature.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The commissioners acting by appointment under the law of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," beg leave to report to the President of the United States, and to premise that the duties imposed by the law became a work of greater magnitude, and a task much more arduous, than was conceived before entering upon it; from which circumstance, the commissioners did not allow themselves sufficient time for the performance of it before the severity of the weather obliged them to retire from it, which was the case in the first week of the present month (December.) That, not having fully accomplished their work, they are unable fully to report a discharge of all the duties enjoined by the law; but as the most material and principal part has been performed, and as a communication of the progress already made may be useful and proper during the present session of Congress, and of the Legislatures of those States through which the route passes, the commissioners respectfully state: that at a very early period it was conceived that the maps of the country were not sufficiently accurate to afford a minute knowledge of the true courses between the extreme points on the rivers, by which the researches of the commissioners were to be governed; a survey for that purpose became indispensable, and considerations of public economy suggested the propriety of making this survey precede the personal attendance of the commissioners.

Josias Thompson, a surveyor of professional merit, was taken into service and authorized to employ two chain carriers and a marker, as well as one vaneman, and a packhorse man, and horse, on public account; the latter being indispensable and really beneficial in accelerating the work. The surveyors' instructions are contained in document No. 1, accompanying this report.

Calculating on a reasonable time for the performance of the instructions to the surveyor, the commissioners, by correspondence, fixed on the 1st day of September last for their meeting at Cumberland to proceed in the work; neither of them, however, reached that place until the 3d of that month, on which day they all met.

The surveyor having, under his instructions, laid down a plat of his work, showing the meanders of the Potomac and Ohio rivers, within the limits prescribed for the commissioners, as also the road between those rivers which is commonly travelled from Cumberland to Charleston, in part called Braddock's road; and the same being produced to the commissioners, whereby straight lines and their true courses were shown between the extreme points on each river, and the boundaries which limit the powers of the commissioners being thereby ascertained, serving as a basis whereon to proceed in the examination of the grounds and face of the country; the commissioners thus prepared commenced the business of exploring; and in this it was considered that a faithful discharge of the discretionary powers vested by the law made it necessary to view the whole to be able to judge of a preference due to any part of the grounds, which imposed a task of examining a space comprehending upwards of two thousand square miles; a task rendered still more incumbent by the solicitude and importunities of the inhabitants of every part of the district, who severally conceived their grounds entitled to a preference.

It becoming necessary, in the interim, to run various lines of experiment for ascertaining the geographical position of several points entitled to attention, and the service suffering great delay for want of another surveyor, it was thought consistent with the public interest to employ, in that capacity, Arthur Rider, the vaneman, who had been chosen with qualifications to meet such an emergency; and whose service as vaneman could then be dispensed with, he commenced, as surveyor, on the 22d day of September, and continued so at field work until the 1st day of December, when he was retained as a necessary assistant to the principal surveyor, in copying field notes and hastening the draught of the work to be reported. The proceedings of the commissioners are specially detailed in their general journal, compiled from the daily journal of each commissioner, to which they beg leave to refer, under mark No. 2.

After a careful and critical examination of all the grounds within the limits prescribed, as well as the grounds and ways out from the Ohio westwardly at several points, and examining the shoal parts of the Ohio river as detailed in the table of soundings, stated in their journal, and after gaining all the information, geographical, general and special, possible and necessary, towards a judicial discharge of the duties assigned them, the commissioners repaired to Cumberland to examine and compare their notes and journals, and determine upon the direction and location of their route.

In this consultation the governing objects were:

- 1st. Shortness of distance between navigable points on the eastern and western waters.
- 2d. A point on the Monongahela best calculated to equalize the advantages of this portage in the country within reach of it.
- 3d. A point on the Ohio river most capable of combining certainty of navigation with road accommodation; embracing, in this estimate, remote points westwardly, as well as present and probable population on the north and south.

4th. Best mode of diffusing benefits with least distance of road.

In contemplating these objects, due attention was paid as well to the comparative merits of towns, establishments, and settlements already made, as to the capacity of the country with the present and probable population.

In the course of arrangement, and in its order, the first point located for the route was determined and fixed at Cumberland, a decision founded on propriety, and in some measure on necessity, from the circumstance of a high and difficult mountain called Noblely, laying and confining the east margin of the Potomac so as to render it impossible of access on that side without immense expense, at any point between Cumberland, and where the road from Winchester to Gwynn's crosses, and even there the Noblely mountains is crossed with much difficulty and hazard. And this upper point was taxed with another formidable objection; it was found that a high range of mountains called Dan's, stretching across from Gwynn's to Potomac, above this point, precluded the opportunity of extending a route from this point in a proper direction, and left no alternative but passing by Gwynn's; the distance from Cumberland to Gwynn's being upwards of a mile less than from the upper point, which lies ten miles by water above Cumberland, the commissioners were not permitted to hesitate in preferring a point which shortens the portage as well as the Potomac navigation.

The point on the Potomac being viewed as a great repository of produce which a good road will bring from the west of Laurel Hill, and the advantages which Cumberland, as a town, has in that respect over an unimproved place, are additional considerations operating forcibly in favor of the place preferred.

In extending the route from Cumberland, a triple range of mountains, stretching across from Jening's run in measure with Gwynn's, left only the alternative of laying the road up Will's creek for three miles, nearly at right angles with the true course, and then by way of Jening's run, or extending it over a break in the smallest mountain on a better course by Gwynn's to the top of Savage mountain: the latter was adopted, being the shortest, and will be less expensive in hill side digging over a sloped route than the former, requiring one bridge over Will's creek, and several over Jening's run, both very wide and considerable streams in high water; and a more weighty reason for preferring the route by Gwynn's is, the great accommodation it will afford travellers from Winchester by the upper point who could not reach the route by Jening's run short of the top of Savage, which would withhold from them the benefit of an easy way up that mountain. It is, however, supposed that those who travel from Winchester by way of the upper point to Gwynn's, are in that respect more the dupes of common prejudice than judges of their own ease, as it is believed the way will be as short, and on much better ground, to cross the Potomac below the confluence of the north and south branches (thereby crossing these two, as well as Patterson's creek, in one stream, equally fordable in the same season) than to pass through Cumberland to Gwynn's. Of these grounds, however, the commissioners do not speak from actual view, but consider it a subject well worthy of future investigation.

Having gained the top of Allegany mountain, or rather the top of that part called Savage, by way of Gwynn's, the general route, as it respects the most important points, was determined as follows, viz:

From a stone at the corner of lot No. 1, in Cumberland, near the confluence of Will's creek and the north branch of Potomac river; thence extending along the street westwardly, to cross the hill lying between Cumberland and Gwynn's, at the gap where Braddock's road passes it; thence near Gwynn's and Jesse Tomlinson's, to cross the Big Youhiogana near the mouth of Rogers' run, between the crossing of Braddock's road and the confluence of the streams which form the Turkey foot; thence to cross Laurel Hill near the forks of Dunbar's run, to the west foot of that hill, at a point near where Braddock's old road reached it, near Guest's old place, now Colonel Isaac Mason's; thence through Brownsville and Bridgeport, to cross the Monongahela river below Josias Crawford's ferry; and thence on as straight a course as the country will admit to the Ohio, at a point between the mouth of Wheelen creek and the lower point of Wheelen island.

In this direction of the route, it will lay about twenty four and a half miles in Maryland, seventy-five miles and a half in Pennsylvania, and twelve miles in Virginia; distances which will be in a small degree increased by meanders, which the bed of the road must necessarily make between the points mentioned in the location; and this route, it is believed, comprehends more important advantages than could be afforded in any other, inasmuch as it has a capacity at least equal to any other in extending advantages of a highway, and at the same time establishes the shortest portage between the points already navigated, and on the way accommodates other and nearer points to which navigation may be extended, and still shorten the portage.

It intersects Big Youhiogana at the nearest point from Cumberland, then lies nearly parallel with that river for the distance of twenty miles, and at the west foot of Laurel Hill lies within five miles of Connellsville, from which the Youhiogana is navigated; and in the same direction the route intersects at Brownsville the nearest point on the Monongahela river within the district. The improvement of the Youhiogana navigation is a subject of too much importance to remain long neglected; and the capacity of that river, as high up as the falls, (twelve miles above Connellsville,) is said to be equal, at a small expense, with the parts already navigated below. The obstructions at the falls, and a rocky rapid near Turkey Foot, constitute the principal impediments in that river to the intersection of the route, and as much higher as the stream has a capacity for navigation; and these difficulties will doubtless be removed when the intercourse shall warrant the measure. Under these circumstances the portage may be thus stated:

	Miles.
From Cumberland to Monongahela - - - - -	66½
From Cumberland to a point in measure with Connelsville, on the Youghiogana river -	51½
From Cumberland to a point in measure with the lower end of the falls of Youghiogana, which will lie two miles north of the public road - - - - -	43
From Cumberland to the intersection of the route with the Youghiogana river - - - - -	34

Nothing is here said of the Little Youghiogana, which lies nearer Cumberland; the stream being unusually crooked, its navigation can only become the work of a redundant population.

The point which this route locates, at the west foot of Laurel Hill, having cleared the whole of the Allegany mountain, is so situated as to extend the advantages of an easy way through the great barrier, with more equal justice to the best parts of the country between Laurel Hill and the Ohio. Lines from this point to Pittsburg and Morgantown, diverging nearly at the same angle, open upon equal terms to all parts of the Western country that can make use of this portage; and which may include the settlements from Pittsburg, up Big Beaver, to the Connecticut reserve, on Lake Erie, as well as those on the southern borders of the Ohio and all the intermediate country.

Brownsville is nearly equidistant from Big Beaver and Fishing Creek, and equally convenient to all the crossing places on the Ohio between these extremes. As a port, it is at least equal to any on the Monongahela within the limits, and holds superior advantages in furnishing supplies to emigrants, traders, and other travellers by land or water.

Not unmindful of the claims of towns, and their capacity of reciprocating advantages on public roads, the commissioners were not insensible of the disadvantage which Uniontown must feel from the want of that accommodation which a more southwardly direction of the route would have afforded; but as that could not take place without a relinquishment of the shortest passage, considerations of public benefit could not yield to feelings of minor import. Uniontown being the seat of justice for Fayette county, Pennsylvania, is not without a share of public benefits, and may partake of the advantages of this portage upon equal terms with Connelsville, a growing town, with the advantage of respectable water-works adjoining, in the manufactory of flour and iron.

After reaching the nearest navigation on the western waters at a point best calculated to diffuse the benefits of a great highway in the greatest possible latitude east of the Ohio, it was considered that, to fulfil the objects of the law, it remained for the commissioners to give such a direction to the road as would best secure a certainty of navigation on the Ohio at all seasons, combining, as far as possible, the inland accommodation of remote points westwardly.

It was found that the obstructions in the Ohio within the limits, between Steubenville and Grave Creek, lay principally above the town and mouth of Wheeling; a circumstance ascertained by the commissioners in their examination of the channel, as well as by common usage, which has long given a decided preference to Wheeling to a place of embarkation and port of departure in dry seasons. It was also seen that Wheeling lay in a line from Brownsville to the centre of the State of Ohio and Post Vincennes. These circumstances favoring and corresponding with the chief objects in view in this last direction of the route, and the ground from Wheeling westwardly being known of equal fitness with any other way out from the river, it was thought most proper, under these several considerations, to locate the point mentioned below the mouth of Wheeling. In taking this point in preference to one higher up and in the town of Wheeling, the public benefit and convenience were consulted, inasmuch as the present crossing place over the Ohio from the town is so contrived and confined as to subject passengers to extraordinary ferriage and delay, by entering and clearing a ferry-boat on each side of Wheeling island, which lies before the town, and precludes the opportunity of fording when the river is crossed in that way above and below the island. From the point located, a safe crossing is afforded at the lower point of the island by a ferry in high, and a good ford at low water.

The face of the country within the limits prescribed is generally very uneven, and in many places broken by a succession of high mountains and deep hollows, too formidable to be reduced within five degrees of the horizon, but by crossing them obliquely, a mode which, although it imposes a heavy task of hill-side digging, obviates generally the necessity of reducing hills and filling hollows, which, on these grounds, would be an attempt truly Quixotic. This inequality of the surface is not confined to the Allegany mountain; the country between the Monongahela and Ohio rivers, although less elevated, is not better adapted for the bed of a road, being filled with impediments of hills and hollows which present considerable difficulties, and wants that superabundance and convenience of stone, which is found in the mountain.

The indirect course of the road now travelled, and the frequent elevations and depressions which occur, that exceed the limits of the law, preclude the possibility of occupying it in any extent, without great sacrifice of distance, and forbid the use of it, in any one part, for more than half a mile, or more than two or three miles in the whole. The expense of rendering the road now in contemplation passable may, therefore, amount to a larger sum than may have been supposed necessary, under an idea of embracing in it a considerable part of the old road; but it is believed that the contrary will be found most correct, and that a sum sufficient to open the new could not be expended on the same distance of the old road with equal benefit.

The sum required for the road in contemplation will depend on the style and manner of making it; as a common road cannot remove the difficulties which always exist on deep grounds, and particularly in wet seasons, and as nothing short of a firm, substantial, well formed, stone capped road, can remove the causes which led to the measure of improvement, or render the institution as commodious as a great and growing intercourse appears to require, the expense of such a road next becomes the subject of inquiry.

In this inquiry the commissioners can only form an estimate by recurring to the experience of Pennsylvania and Maryland in the business of artificial roads. Upon this data, and a comparison of the grounds and proximity of the materials for covering, there are reasons for belief that, on the route reported, a complete road may be made at an expense not exceeding six thousand dollars per mile, exclusive of bridges over the principal streams on the way. The average expense of the Lancaster, as well as Baltimore and Frederick turnpike, is considerably higher; but it is believed that the convenient supply of stone which the mountain affords will, on those grounds, reduce the expense to the rate here stated.

As to the policy of incurring this expense, it is not the province of the commissioners to declare; but they cannot, however, withhold assurances of a firm belief that the purse of the nation cannot be more seasonably opened, or more happily applied, than in promoting the speedy and effectual establishment of a great and easy road on the way contemplated.

In the discharge of all these duties, the commissioners have been actuated by an ardent desire to render the institution as useful and commodious as possible; and, impressed with a strong sense of the necessity which urges the speedy establishment of the road, they have to regret the circumstance which delays the completion of the part assigned them. They, however, in some measure, content themselves with the reflection that it will not retard the progress of the work, as the opening of the road cannot commence before spring, and may then begin with the marking the way.

The extra expense incident to the service from the necessity (and propriety, as it relates to public economy,) of employing men not provided for by law, will, it is hoped, be recognised, and provision made for the payment of that and similar expenses, when in future it may be indispensably incurred.

The commissioners having engaged in a service in which their zeal did not permit them to calculate the difference between their pay and the expense to which the service subjected them, cannot suppose it the wish or intention of the Government to accept of their services for a mere indemnification of their expense of subsistence, which will be very much the case under the present allowance; they, therefore, allow themselves to hope and expect that measures will be taken to provide such further compensation as may, under all circumstances, be thought neither profuse nor parsimonious.

The painful anxiety manifested by the inhabitants of the district explored, and their general desire to know the route determined on, suggested the measure of promulgation, which, after some deliberation, was agreed on by way of circular letter, which has been forwarded to those persons to whom precaution was useful, and afterwards sent to one of the presses in that quarter for publication in the form of the document No. 3, which accompanies this report.

All which is, with due deference, submitted.

BURR'S CONSPIRACY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 10, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate, for the information of Congress a letter from Cowles Mead, Secretary of the Mississippi Territory, to the Secretary of War, by which it will be seen that Mr. Burr had reached that neighborhood on the 13th January.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, M. T., January 13, 1807.

I have just time by the mail to inform you that I received this morning a letter from Colonel Burr, at Bayou Pierre, avowing the innocence of his views, and the fallacy of certain rumors against his patriotism; his object is agriculture, and his boats are the vehicles of emigration. However, several military corps were ordered to be on the alert, and apprehend him and all suspicious persons, on the day before the reception of his letter; these orders may possibly bring him into my possession. In his letter he hints at resistance to any attempt to coerce him, and deprecates a civil war. These hints will have no influence on my conduct; he will be apprehended, if possible, at the hazard of the lives of our militia and the honor of the Executive. We are all bustle and activity. I hope in a day or two to give you a better account of this troublesome man.

A boat passed Natchez last night, which was hailed and pursued by the guard; they fired two guns at the pursuers, and made their escape, being better manned.

The citizens of this country are republicans and patriots, and on their exertions I have every reliance.

SLAVERY IN THE INDIANA TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 12TH OF FEBRUARY, 1807.

Mr. PARKE, from the committee to whom was referred the letter of William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory, enclosing certain resolutions of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the said Territory, made the following report:

That the resolutions of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory relate to a suspension, for the term of ten years, of the sixth article of compact between the United States and the Territories and States northwest of the river Ohio, passed the 13th July, 1787. That article declares "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory."

The suspension of the said article would operate an immediate and essential benefit to the Territory, as emigration to it will be inconsiderable for many years, except from those States where slavery is tolerated; and although it is not considered expedient to force the population of the Territory, yet it is desirable to connect its scattered settlements, and, in regard to political rights, to place it on an equal footing with the different States. From the interior situation of the Territory, it is not believed that slaves would ever become so numerous as to endanger the internal peace or future prosperity of the country. The current of emigration flowing to the western country, the Territories ought all to be opened to their introduction. The abstract question of liberty and slavery is not involved in the proposed measure, as slavery now exists to a considerable extent in different parts of the Union; it would not augment the number of slaves, but merely authorize the removal to Indiana of such as are held in bondage in the United States. If slavery is an evil, means ought to be devised to render it least dangerous to the community, and by which the hapless situation of the slaves would be most ameliorated; and to accomplish these objects, no measure would be so effectual as the one proposed. The committee, therefore, respectfully submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to suspend; from and after the 1st day of January, 1808, the sixth article of compact between the United States and the Territories and States northwest of the river Ohio, passed the 13th day of July, 1787, for the term of ten years.

BURR'S CONSPIRACY—HIS ARREST.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 19, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a letter from Cowles Mead, Secretary of the Mississippi Territory, acting as Governor, informing us that Aaron Burr had surrendered himself to the civil authority of that Territory.

TH: JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 19, 1807.

Extract of a letter from Cowles Mead, Secretary and Acting Governor of the Mississippi Territory, to the Department of War, dated

SIR:

WASHINGTON, M. T., January 19, 1807.

In obedience to your instructions by express of the 20th of December last, I, immediately after proroguing the Legislature, proceeded to put the Territory in a state of preparation for the arrestation of the suspicious persons and boats, which were contemplated therein. My militia were collecting at particular points on the river, when I received a letter from Colonel Burr, who had landed at Bayou Pierre with nine boats and about one hundred men. This letter went to an avowal of his innocence of the charges which rumor and public apprehension had announced against him, and solicited me to appease the fears which his approach had begotten; at the same time, he guarded me against the horrors of civil war, and the evils resulting from such a state of things. This seeming threat induced me to adopt a different mode of conduct from what the colonel might have expected; and, instead of adopting his pacific admonition, I ordered a very large portion of the militia of the Territory to rendezvous at certain points, and wait further orders. With the promptitude of Spartans, our fellow-citizens shouldered their firelocks, and in twenty-four hours I had the honor to review three hundred and seventy-five men at Natchez, prepared to defend their country. They were ordered, under the command of Colonel Claiborne, to a point on the river, about twenty-one miles above the city, there to remain to guard the river, and intercept, for inspection, all boats that might descend the river. On the 16th I despatched two of my aids to Colonel Burr, who had tendered his respect to the civil authority. These gentlemen engaged on my part to give the colonel an interview in the neighborhood of the detachment stationed at the mouth of Cole's creek; conformably thereto, I met the colonel on the 17th, and, after a lengthy interview, he offered to surrender himself to the civil authority of the Territory, and to suffer his boats to be searched. On the 18th Colonel Burr, accompanied by my aids, Majors Shields and Poindexter, rode down to the place, and was committed to the highest tribunal of the civil authority, where he now remains for trial.

Four gentlemen of unquestionable respectability, with a detachment of thirty men, are now in the act of making the search of the boats, and to-morrow I expect their report.

Thus, sir, this mighty alarm, with all its exaggerations, has eventuated in nine boats and one hundred men, and the major part of these are boys, or young men just from school. Many of their depositions have been taken before Judge Rodney, but they bespeak ignorance of the views or designs of the colonel. I believe them really ignorant and deluded. I believe that they are the dupes of stratagem, if the asseverations of Generals Eaton and Wilkinson are to be accredited.

CANAL FROM THE HEAD TO THE FOOT OF THE RAPIDS OF THE OHIO RIVER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 24, 1807.

Mr. ADAMS made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution proposing the appropriation of a quantity not exceeding _____ acres of land, to assist in cutting out a canal at the rapids of the Ohio, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That they have attentively examined a survey of the rapids of the Ohio and the adjacent shores, accompanied by explanatory notes made by a Mr. Jared Brooks, who appears to be a skilful and intelligent engineer; that this survey exhibits the sites proposed for the canal on the Kentucky shore, and its supposed contemplated route on the Indiana side; and its accuracy is certified by nine respectable gentlemen, who, being appointed by the Kentucky Legislature to promote the execution of an act for incorporating a company for cutting the canal in question, have themselves examined the several objects delineated. Mr. Brooks has sunk, at short and convenient distances, shafts ascertaining the nature of the ground through which the canal is proposed to pass on the Kentucky shore, the various depths to the surface of the rock, and, by his survey and notes, has fully evinced the practicability of the object, and the superior advantages of the Kentucky over the opposite side. On the Kentucky shore the requisite depth of the canal will be less, its length not so great by at least one-third, a better bed afforded, firmer ground for its sides, and far better harbors at its head and foot. From these circumstances, it is presumed the expense of the undertaking will not be so great by one-half on the Kentucky as upon the opposite shore, and, in Mr. Brooks's opinion, will not exceed $200,000.

To open the canal so as to admit of the passage of vessels of any burthen capable of navigating the Ohio, the Legislature of Kentucky, at their session of 1804, passed an act incorporating a company by the name of the Ohio Canal Company, which was amended by an act passed at their session of 1805. By the provisions of these acts, the company is permitted to raise a capital of $500,000, composed of shares of fifty dollars each; is vested with suitable powers to accomplish the work; and, upon its completion, authorized to charge reasonable tolls. On their part, the Legislature of Kentucky have directed a subscription for one thousand shares, and have invited the Governments of the United States, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, Ohio, and New York, all supposed to be more or less interested, to participate in the undertaking.

That the work is one of great and national importance is undeniable. The immense country on the Ohio and its waters above the rapids, in seeking a market for its surplus products, has to encounter the obstruction in the navigation of that stream, which they present. This obstruction, never entirely free from danger, is such as to absolutely preclude the passage of vessels for several months in the year in their descent, and, when laden, for the whole year, in their ascent of the river. The rapidity of the current, (which averages at the rate of from ten to eleven miles an hour through the falls,) leaves no alternative for a safe voyage up as well as down the river but in a canal.

How far it is the policy of the Government to aid in works of this kind, when it has no direct interest—whether, indeed, in such a case it has the constitutional power of patronage and encouragement, is not necessary to be decided in the present instance. Being a proprietor of land bordering upon the Ohio to a greater extent than any individual State, owing to an invaluable saline near the Wabash, there can be no doubt that both policy and power combine in favor of promoting an undertaking by which its property is to be incidentally benefited. If the value and price of land depend as well upon the facility with which its products find a market as upon its capacity to produce, there can be no doubt that the public lands will be increased in value by improvements in the navigation of those streams which water them. The saline alluded to will have its market enlarged by the opening of the proposed canal; and those above the rapids, as well as those below, may in time count upon it as one of the sources from whence salt may be obtained.

But as some contrariety of opinion has existed in relation to the preferable side of the Ohio for the canal, as the information upon which your committee has on this subject acted is rather of an ex parte character, and as any aid this Government may think proper to give ought only to be afforded after the most impartial and thorough investigation of the subject, they beg leave to recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be authorized to appoint three commissioners for the purpose of examining the rapids of the Ohio, to ascertain whether a canal to avoid them be practicable, and which side of the river presents the greatest advantages for its accomplishment; and also whether the bed of the river is capable of being so cleared out as to admit of ascending and descending navigation, and the relative importance of a sluice and canal.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION—JUDICIAL POWERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 3, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The petition and representation of sundry citizens of the United States, inhabitants of that part of Pennsylvania situate north and west of the rivers Ohio, Allegany, and Conewango creek, most respectfully sheweth:

That petitions have been signed by sundry of your petitioners to be forwarded to Congress praying for an amendment to be proposed to the Legislatures of the different States, limiting the judicial power of the United States so that it should not extend to controversies between citizens of different States not claiming lands under grants of different States, or between a State or citizen thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects, in any case when the title to lands might come in question. If, however, contrary to the wishes and expectations of your petitioners, Congress should not think it proper to propose an amendment to the constitution agreeably to the prayer of that petition, they trust that such legislative provision will be made upon the subject as will more fully accord with the spirit of the constitution, and the rights and interests of the people.

Your petitioners beg leave to observe, that it is expressly declared, in the articles in addition to and amendment of the constitution, that "the enumeration in the constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people," and also that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people;" your petitioners beg leave to observe, that, although the constitution of the United States declares that "the judicial power shall extend to controversies between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects," yet the judicial power of the States is not prohibited from extending to such controversies. On the contrary, your petitioners are well aware that in every State, as well as the State in which your petitioners reside, "all the courts are open, and every man, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, may have a remedy by due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial, or delay." Nevertheless, although the act of Congress establishing the courts of the United States declares that the circuit courts have cognizance of such subjects only "concurrent" with the courts of the several States, yet a subsequent section gives the circuit court "exclusive" jurisdiction at the "election" of the alien or citizen of another State, against whom an action may be commenced, to the absolute annihilation and destruction of the judicial power of the States in all such cases; and moreover, although the constitution in all such cases only extends the judicial power to controversies between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects, yet the act of Congress declares if a suit be commenced in any State court against an alien, (without confining it to a suit brought by a State or by a citizen,) the defendant may remove it to the circuit court.

Your petitioners are well aware that an inquiry into the constitutionality of a law is a delicate subject, and is, perhaps, entirely of judicial cognizance; they, therefore, forbear any further observations on this subject, which might appear to have a view of proving the act of Congress to be of that nature. Your petitioners, however, trust that it must be apparent that Congress have the power so far to repeal said law, as to allow the courts of the several States to proceed on to trial, judgment, and execution, in those cases where it is admitted they have a "concurrent" jurisdiction with the circuit courts, without having that jurisdiction impeached or destroyed; and that, although the judicial power of the United States shall continue to extend to such controversies, and it may still remain the right of the alien to sue in either court, at his election, the same right may not be denied to your petitioners, and all other citizens of the United States, and that the judicial power of the States respectively may be left unimpaired.

A. W. FOSTER, and others.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States: The petition and representation of sundry citizens of the United States, inhabitants of that part of Pennsylvania situated north and west of the rivers Ohio and Alleghany, and Conewango creek, most respectfully sheweth:

That during the last session of Congress sundry petitions were forwarded and presented to the Senate and House of Representatives, (as your petitioners have been informed,) praying that an amendment to the constitution of the United States might be proposed to the Legislatures of the different States, limiting the judicial power of the United States, so that it should not extend to controversies between citizens of different States not claiming lands under grants of different States, or between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects, in any case where the title to land might come in question.

Your petitioners beg leave to solicit the attention of Congress again to this interesting subject.

On principles of general policy, as respects foreign nations, it is apprehended, that while "the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and to controversies to which the United States shall be a party," no subject of judicial cognizance can ever become a subject of discussion between the United States and foreign nations, of which the courts of the United States will not retain a competent jurisdiction.

This amendment will also, it is believed, make that branch of the Government more consistent with the general principles and theory of the constitution, which delegates powers respecting general and national concerns to the United States, while those of a local or particular nature are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. If, however, it is conceived that in some cases a deviation from general principles must take place, to suit the peculiar situation of the people, and that in a country where the spirit of commerce is so diffused as throughout the United States, and where the commercial intercourse between the different States is so great, it is necessary, in order to produce confidence, and ensure justice, that citizens of different States should have a right to sue in the courts of the United States. Those rights and interests will be protected, by not extending the amendment to cases of personal contract.

Considering the amendment prayed for by your petitioners merely as a municipal regulation, unconnected with our foreign relations, or with the interests of commerce, your petitioners conceive the arguments in favor of an amendment cogent and irresistible.

It is well known that the construction of the laws of several, perhaps all the States, respecting the original title to lands, depend as well upon their customs and usages as upon the statute book, and that the construction of all statutes depends upon the circumstances of the country, or State, at the time when the law was made. These customs and usages, together with a knowledge of the history of the State at the time when a law has been passed, must be better known by those judges of the State, who have made them their peculiar study during a great part of their lives, than by judges from different parts of the United States, who perhaps have had no knowledge of the existence of such laws or customs until the commencement of the trial, and are unacquainted with the circumstances which induced the law to be passed.

Another consideration your petitioners beg leave to suggest. That, as the power of the courts of the United States are only concurrent with those of the several States, except in particular cases, therefore the courts of the different States are not bound by the construction of the law as declared by the courts of the United States; and as in cases of ejectment one trial is not conclusive, (even between the same parties,) a person who recovers an ejectment in one court may fail in another, even where the facts given in evidence in both courts are the same; or a foreigner may recover possession of a tract of land by a title which will not enable a citizen, perhaps, to hold the adjoining tract against the very same person. The foreigner may hold by both titles, and he will sue for one tract in the State, and for the other in the 'United States' courts, as either may be most favorable to his claims; thus giving a clear and decided superiority and advantage to foreigners over the citizens of the United States.

Your petitioners beg leave further to observe, that this article in the constitution is subject to the greatest fraud. An act of Congress provides that the circuit courts shall not have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note, &c. in favor of any assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court if no assignment had been made; but no effectual remedy exists, nor perhaps can be devised, to prevent fictitious assignments of lands to foreigners or citizens of other States, in order to give the courts of the United States jurisdiction in trials of ejectment for such lands.

Your petitioners would beg leave further to represent, that one of the great benefits derived from the trial by jury is, that the jury are the triers of the credibility of witnesses; and for this purpose the jury originally were summoned from the vicinage, the very neighborhood where the cause of action arose. This advantage, however, is almost altogether lost in the courts of the United States, where the State forms a vicinage, and where even the court may direct a jury from such parts of the district as are most remote from where the cause of action arose.

Your petitioners beg leave further to represent, that as it is the interest of all well regulated societies that there should, with the least possible delay, be an end to strife, so it is also that justice should be administered with the least possible expense. Yet in the country where your petitioners reside, where there are many contested claims to land, the expense of attending a suit in the courts of the United States at so great a distance, would be, in many instances, nearly equal to the value of the property in controversy.

Your petitioners trust, and believe, that the amendment prayed for would promote the great object of the founders of the constitution; that its tendency would be to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, and promote the general welfare.

DECLARATION OF THE PEOPLE OF WASHINGTON COUNTY, MISSISSIPPI, ON THE SUBJECT OF BRITISH AGGRESSIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 27TH OCTOBER, 1807.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of Washington county, Mississippi Territory, at the court-house in the town of Wakefield, on the 8th of September, 1807, in consequence of the attack by the British ship of war Leopard on the United States frigate Chesapeake, the following declaration of the sentiments of the meeting was unanimously adopted:

Situated in a remote corner of the territory of the United States, and unconnected with every other body of American citizens, the people inhabiting the country lying on the waters of the Mobile have at length heard of the outrage which has been committed on our national rights by the arrogant representatives of British despotism. We think and feel on the occasion as every American thinks and feels. We despise the bully and the coward who, as captain of the Leopard, was the instrument of exhibiting the enormous extent of the claims of the pretended mistress of the ocean. But our attention is in an instant drawn from him to ourselves and our own situation. Is national independence a dream? Shall Great Britain or any other nation come at pleasure into our territory, and lay hold of whomsoever she pleases, under the pretence that this man is her subject, and that man is in her employ; that here there is a felon, and there a deserter? Our national ships are our territory, in whatever quarter of the world they are found; much more so, then, when within our own acknowledged limits and jurisdiction. We care not who the men were that were demanded from the Chesapeake; we care not whence they came, where they were born, nor who claimed allegiance from them. Had they fled from Europe stained with blood, no foreign force had a right to invade our territory; no foreign officer, civil or military, had a right to exercise his functions within our limits, or to transport the supposed offender to the precincts of a distant tribunal.

If there be a mutual convention between two nations reciprocally to deliver up felons, it is well; but no one nation has a right to force another into such a stipulation. And shall the plea, not of a treason, not of a murder, not of a felony having been committed, but the mere plea of desertion from a service, the tyranny and enormities of which are now arming the whole civilized world against it—shall such a plea be ground sufficient for us to stifle our jealousy of national rights, or to surrender our claims to perfect and unqualified independence?

England may count upon our divisions. She is mistaken. The violence of her conduct has united all America. We judge not only from what we hear, but from what we see among ourselves. Our own settlement originally consisted, and still in a great degree consists, of those who adhered to England in the revolutionary war. They were led by principle; their elders taught them that resistance was sinful; and they imbibed from their infancy a deep veneration for their King. But the delusion lasts no longer. We have since seen that King engaged in almost incessant wars on the liberty and happiness of man; whilst the Government which has succeeded him in America has preserved us in peace with all the world, and been pre-eminently occupied in promoting our national prosperity. Old factions are forgotten; we all view with the same sensibility any outrage on the honor of our common country; and old whigs and old tories will cordially unite in devoting their lives and fortunes to avenge the wounded dignity of America against the insults and oppressions of any Government upon earth. What may be the immediate issue of an appeal to arms we know not. That knowledge is confined to the Lord of Hosts; and on him, trusting to the justice of our cause, we rely with humble confidence.

But, though the operations and events of war are always uncertain, we can calculate with some confidence that a five years' state of non-intercourse with Great Britain will establish the manufactures of America on a foundation which no return of peace will ever shake. It will render us forever after in a high degree independent of the British manufacturers of wool, and still more so of those of cotton. Our planters, too, will hereafter find their market at home; and the British navy, if Britain and her navy should continue to exist, will at length find that her tyranny on the ocean has given commercial independence to those confederated States which British tyranny on the land first led to political independence.

Had we not been told that in the United States the people are divided into parties, some of whom are virulent opposers of the system and measures of the present federal administration, we should not have deemed it necessary on this occasion to express our full confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of those to whose executive management our national affairs are intrusted. As to ourselves, we have neither seen nor have we looked for the splendor and pageantry of a monarchy, overstraining the sinews of national strength and industry to support large mercenary armies and unwieldy navies; but we have thought that we have seen the genuine product of republican institutions—a love of peace, a high regard for the ease and happiness of the people, a vigilant attention to public expenditures, and a strong anxiety to promote internal improvements. War will, indeed, open a new theatre for the talents of our rulers; but we have a strong confidence that that intellectual and moral pre-eminence which, amidst the convulsions of the world, has been so conspicuous in peace, will not become extinct on the instant of the appearance of war.

As to ourselves and our own local concerns, it is true we have sometimes feared that we were overlooked in the council of the nation. Our population is small; we are surrounded, except on the Spanish side, by the most powerful tribes of Indians existing within the original limits of the United States. The want of land cuts off from us the prospect of having our strength increased. We had hoped that a treaty entered into with the Choctaws, which, by making a valuable addition to our land, would have invited population, and placed us in a state of greater security and respectability, would have been ratified. But we have been disappointed. Yet, few as we are, we consider ourselves as an advanced guard, destined to defend the immense tract of valuable territory which lies between the settlements on the Mobile and the State of Tennessee. We may perish at our posts, but we shall not slumber there.

We have likewise suffered multiplied injuries, inflicted upon us in a regular system by the agents of the Spanish Government. But if we have ever thought ourselves neglected, such thoughts, at the present momentous crisis in our national affairs, shall no longer find a harbor in our breasts. If, when we have been the objects of incessant oppression from the officers of His Catholic Majesty, for a series of years; if, when the produce of our lands, before it could reach a market in even our own territories, has been subjected to a duty of twelve per centum ad valorem to a foreign monarch; if, when we have been constantly the sport of vexatious searches and arbitrary seizures; if, when we have been compelled to pay twelve per centum to the King of Spain on every thing which we have imported, even from the next town within the American limits; if when, through the joint operation of the revenue systems of Spain and the United States, we have frequently been obliged to pay from forty-two to forty-seven per centum ad valorem on the price, when first imported into the United States, of the most essential articles for family comfort; if, when suffering, not yesterday or to-day only, but every day and every year, for a length of time, this series of oppressions, without hearing one clear and decided expression of national indignation, we have sometimes, in the spirit of despondency, been ready to fear that we never should be thought worthy of enjoying the rights and protection of American citizens, the moment has now arrived when we feel ourselves called upon to discard our personal jealousies; the moment has now arrived when we shall cease any longer to regard our local grievances, till those of the nation are redressed. We will give to the Spaniard his twelve per centum; we will continue to pay a double price for the commodities of Europe; we will again, if need be, pay sixteen dollars per barrel for the flour of Kentucky, whilst our neighbors at the Natchez, unencumbered by the Spanish obstacles, are paying only four; we will view these things light as compared with a deliberate, and authorized, and systematic violation of our territory by a foreign Power. We will devote ourselves to our country at large, and from this moment cease to seek any other object than permanency to national existence, and reality to national independence.

The charter of that independence was drawn up in '76; it was ratified by the peace of '83; but it still cries out for the blood of American citizens to seal it and to give it practical validity. Our blood shall be mingled with that of other Americans in offering the solemn sacrifice.

Resolved, unanimously, That the chairman of this meeting forward to the President of the United States a copy of this declaration, and that he give it such other circulation as he may deem necessary.

Signed at the request and in behalf of the meeting.

JAMES CALLER, Chairman.

CITY OF WASHINGTON—PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 28TH OF OCTOBER, 1807.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, October 27, 1807.

The arrangement approved by the President of the United States, and adopted for the south wing of the Capitol, varies in so many respects from that of the buildings hitherto appropriated to the session of Congress, that I beg leave most respectfully to lay before you some explanation of the principles on which the design was formed, in order that in deliberating upon the regulations which to the wisdom of the House of Representatives may appear best adapted to the holding of their sittings, no information may be wanting to them which it is in my power to furnish.

In the distribution of the House, it is provided that the access of those citizens who attend in the gallery, solely for the purpose of being present at the debates, is on the south front, at a distance from the eastern entrance, which leads to the apartments appropriated to legislative business. Between these parts of the buildings there is no communication whatever, excepting by a small door from the lobby, which door is only intended to admit the door-keeper into the gallery, in order to execute an order of the House for the exclusion of strangers.

Thus all intrusion upon the business of the House, and of its committees, may be effectually prevented by regulating admissions by the eastern entrance.

The ground floor is entirely appropriated to the use of the committees of the House, and of the clerk. The committee rooms ranged on the east and west fronts have an ante-chamber or waiting-room, to each range, for the use of those citizens who have to attend the committees, and who, heretofore, had no accommodation but such as the lobby or the gallery of the house afforded. Such persons must, of necessity, enter at the eastern door.

From this entrance also the staircases lead up to the door of the house. Within the house the lobbies are to the right and left. The position of the doorkeeper gives him an immediate view of every one who enters, while the interior of the house cannot be seen excepting from the galleries of the lobbies. There is, therefore, no temptation to continuance in the lobby, but for the sake of hearing the debates from its galleries, in which the presence of the House will preserve order and silence.

Within the colonnade of the house there is no room for any persons, not members of the House, excepting on the seats under the northern part of the wall. Those seats were erected on the presumption that the House might appropriate the same to the use of the Senators of the United States, when attending the House, and of such other persons, distinguished by their official characters, as the House might judge proper to admit to them.

It will be in the recollection of the members that, in the north wing of the Capitol, in which were all the committee rooms and the clerk's office, even during the sitting of the House in the temporary building, erected on the site of the south wing, every one, without discrimination, had access to all the passages of the building. It was, indeed, impossible to distinguish those who ought from those who ought not to have entered. The consequence was, that every part was crowded by those who had, and by more who had no business in the house. There are annually from four to five hundred persons whom their affairs bring to the seat of Government during the sitting of the National Legislature; for these citizens the interior of the house afforded the only shelter during the severity of the winter. The lobby of the house was, therefore, usually filled with a part of them, to the great inconvenience of the members, and sometimes to the interruption of legislative business. Besides these, idle and dissolute persons ranged the whole building; the walls were defaced by obscenity and by libels; the public furniture and utensils of the House were considered as fair objects of depredation; and, were I to state the amount of some of the depredations, it would appear almost incredible. The committee rooms themselves have not been secure from the most improper intrusion; and, to particularize only one fact, much of the leakage of the roof arose from the smaller pieces of lead, called flashings, being stolen.

I am very confident that, under strict regulations, the distribution of the house which I have described will render it easily practicable to avoid all these evils; and I beg very respectfully to submit such regulations as I presume would be effectual, even before the plan of the whole Capitol, which provides for the residence of the doorkeeper within the house, can be completed.

While it is thought proper to admit, without discrimination, all persons who choose to go into the galleries, no attendant at the gallery door will be necessary. As, however, the lower gallery lobbies will probably become the stations of those who usually sell refreshment in such places, some restriction might probably be laid upon the intrusion of boys of all colors beyond the outer door, by regulating the occupancy of these lobbies.

But, at the east entrance, it seems necessary that a respectable and responsible deputy of the principal doorkeeper should regulate the admission of all persons whatever, and have in charge the keys of all the committee rooms, control the servants who attend the fires of the committee rooms and the furnaces of the House, and prevent the defacing of the walls, as well as the depredations hitherto committed on the furniture. The station of such an officer would be at the foot of the stairs. A short practice would enable him, without difficulty, to superintend the whole of the ground story and the stairs of the House.

Experience has long pointed out the extreme difficulty of preventing the walls of public buildings from being defaced; but if, by a summary process before a magistrate, those idle persons who find amusement in so scandalous a practice could be fined, or otherwise punished, it might cease.

In the design and construction of the House of Representatives, all that I could effect by study and labor has been done to carry the desire of the President, to give to the House every practicable convenience and accommodation, into execution. In the permanence and solidity of the work, I hope nothing will be found deficient. The size and arrangement of the committee rooms were, in a great measure, imposed by the exterior form and structure of the north wing, of which the exterior of the south wing is necessarily an exact copy. Much of what might have been better arranged in the interior owes its imperfection to this cause. Upon the whole, it is my ardent wish, and all my ambition is centered in the desire, that the personal accommodation of the members, and the convenience of the committees of the House, upon which so much depend the despatch and ease of legislative business, as well as the best practicable disposition and arrangement of the legislative hall itself, may have been attained. I am conscious of irremediable defects. I hope, however, that they are not considerable, and grow out of the necessary size and loftiness of an edifice, which must be sufficiently enlarged to contain a numerous assembly, while the powers of the human voice and of the human ear remain limited to a certain standard. Magnificence is easily bought by expense, and is infinitely less important than utility.

The meeting of Congress, at a period so much earlier than was expected in a very advanced part of the season, has prevented the completion of many small arrangements, which will render the house still more commodious. Every exertion is now making to complete them; and should any part of the work be found, on experiment, to require alteration, provision is made for its speedy and effectual correction.

With the highest respect, I am yours, faithfully,

B. HENRY LATROBE,

Surveyor of the public buildings, United States.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF WILLIAM McCREERY, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM MARYLAND.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 9, 1807.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Joshua Barney, of the city of Baltimore, praying to be admitted to a seat in the House, he having, in his opinion, the highest number of votes given to a candidate legally qualified to represent the said city of Baltimore, having carefully examined the facts stated on both sides, and compared the laws of Maryland, under which the said election was held, with the constitution of the United States, made the following report:

That, by an act of the Assembly of Maryland, passed in November, 1790, it is required that the member shall be an inhabitant of his district at the time of his election, and shall have resided therein twelve calendar months immediately before.

By another act of the Assembly of Maryland, passed in November, 1802, it is enacted that Baltimore town and county shall be the fifth district, which district shall be entitled to send two representatives to Congress, one of whom shall be a resident of Baltimore county, and the other a resident of Baltimore city.

That Joshua Barney is a citizen of Maryland, and has been a resident of the city of Baltimore for many years. That William McCreery has been, for many years, a citizen of Maryland, and a resident of the city of Baltimore; but that, in the year 1803 he removed himself and his family to his estate in Baltimore county; that, from that time, though he himself has occasionally resided in Baltimore, yet he, with his wife and family, have not made the city of Baltimore their settled residence.

That William McCreery states that his intention was, and still is, to reside with his family on his country estate in summer, and in the city of Baltimore in winter; but that, ever since he has removed his family to his farm, he has been obliged every winter, in the public service, to reside, and frequently with his family, in the city of Washington, which prevented him from removing his family, agreeably to his intention, to the city of Baltimore; but he resided himself in the city of Baltimore five or six days before the election; that he and his family were residing in the same situation, when he was elected to serve in the ninth Congress; that they were when he was elected into the present Congress; that, however, not wishing to have been taken up as a candidate at the last election, he expressed to some of his friends some apprehensions that exceptions might be made, on account of his constant family residence not being in the city of Baltimore.

At the election in that district for the Congress now in session, Nicholas R. Moore had 6,164 votes; he is a resident in Baltimore county; and William McCreery, against whose right to a seat in this House objection is made on account of residence, had 3,559 votes; and Joshua Barney, who claims a seat in this House, and who, it is admitted, is a resident in Baltimore city, had 2,063 votes; and John Seat, also a resident in Baltimore city, had 353 votes. The above statement of facts being admitted by the parties, further evidence was not required. No question was taken on the legal residence of William McCreery in the city of Baltimore.

The committee proceeded to examine the constitution, with relation to the case submitted to them, and find that the qualifications of members is therein determined, without reserving any authority to the State Legislature to change, add, or diminish those qualifications; and that, by that instrument, Congress is constituted the sole judge of the qualifications prescribed by it, and are obliged to decide agreeably to the constitutional rules; but the State Legislatures being, by the constitution, authorized to prescribe the times, place, and manner of holding elections, in controversies arising under this authority Congress are obliged to decide agreeably to the laws of the respective States.

On the most mature consideration of the case submitted to them, the committee are of opinion that William McCreery is duly qualified to represent the fifth district of the State of Maryland; and that the law of that State, restricting the residence of the members of Congress to any particular part of the district for which they may be chosen is contrary to the constitution of the United States: therefore

Resolved, That William McCreery is entitled to his seat in this House.

SLAVERY IN THE INDIANA TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 13, 1807.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the representation and resolution of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, bearing date the 13th of July, 1807; and, also, the remonstrance of the citizens of Clark county, of the Territory aforesaid, reported:

The Legislative Council and House of Representatives, in their resolutions, express their sense of the propriety of introducing slavery into their Territory, and solicit the Congress of the United States to suspend, for a given number of years, the sixth article of compact, in the ordinance for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, passed the 13th day of July, 1787. That article declares: "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory."

The citizens of Clark county, in their remonstrance, express their sense of the impropriety of the measure, and solicit the Congress of the United States not to act on the subject, so as to permit the introduction of slaves into the Territory; at least until their population shall entitle them to form a constitution and State Government.

Your committee, after duly considering the matter, respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient at this time to suspend the sixth article of compact for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio.

In the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory.

Great solicitude has been evinced by the citizens of this Territory on the subject of the introduction of slaves. In the year 1802 a special convention of delegates from the respective counties petitioned Congress for a suspension of the sixth article of compact, contained in the ordinance of 1787. In 1805 a majority of the members of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives remonstrated with Congress on the subject. In 1806 the Legislative Council and House of Representatives passed sundry resolutions, which were laid before Congress, declaratory of their sense of the propriety of admitting slaves; and, as the citizens of the Territory decidedly approve of the toleration of slavery, the Legislative Council and House of Representatives consider it incumbent on them briefly to state, on behalf of themselves and their constituents, the reasons which have influenced them in favor of the measure.

In the first place, candor induces us to premise that, in regard to the right of holding slaves, a variety in opinion exists; whilst some consider it decent and just to acquire them either by purchase or conquest, others consider their possession, by either tenure, as a crime of the deepest stain; that it is repugnant to every principle of natural justice, of political rights, and to every sentiment of humanity. Without entering into the merits of this controversy, it need only to be remarked, that the proposition to introduce slavery into the Territory is not embraced by them. It is not a question of liberty or slavery. Slavery now exists in the United States, and in this Territory. It was the crime of England, and their misfortune; and it now becomes a question, merely of policy, in what way the slaves are to be disposed of, that they may be least dangerous to the community, most useful to their proprietors, and by which their situation may be most ameliorated.

As the law of Congress, prohibiting the further importation of slaves into the United States, takes effect the 1st of January next, it is evident that the proposed toleration will not increase the number in the United States.

It is believed (and has not experience verified the fact!) that such is the number of slaves in the Southern States, that the safety of individuals, as well as the political institutions of those States, are exposed to no small hazard. However desirable it may be to emancipate them, it can never be done until they are dispersed; it would be equally impolitic for the whites as for the slaves. The great current of emigration is constantly flowing from the Eastern and Southern States to the Western States and Territories. The increase of population in the western country for the last twenty years may afford some idea of its probable amount in the course of the present century; it must be immense; and were all the Territories opened to the introduction of slaves, a large proportion of them would naturally be drawn from the Southern States.

From a reference to the States of Kentucky and Tennessee at the time of the last United States' census, it is not believed that the number of slaves would ever become so great as to endanger either the internal peace or future prosperity of the Territory. It is also rendered improbable from the interior situation of the Territory, its climate, and productions.

Slavery is tolerated in the Territories of Orleans, Mississippi, and Louisiana: why should this Territory be excepted?

It is believed that slaves, possessed in small numbers by farmers, are better fed and better clothed than when they are crowded together in quarters by hundreds: their situation in Kentucky, Tennessee, and the back parts of Maryland and Virginia, verify this belief.

Resolved, by the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, That it is expedient to suspend for a given number of years the sixth article of compact, contained in the ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory, passed the 13th day of July, in the year 1787.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be forwarded to the Vice President of the United States, with a request that he will lay the same before the Senate; and that a copy be forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a request that he will lay the same before the said House of Representatives; and that the Governor of this Territory be requested to forward the same, as aforesaid.

JESSE B. THOMAS, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed the Legislative Council, September 19, 1807.

Attest: H. HURST, Chief Clerk.

At a numerous meeting of the citizens of Clark county, in Springville, (agreeably to notice previously given,) on Saturday, the 10th day of October, 1807, for the purpose of taking into consideration the resolutions passed at the last session of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying the Congress of the United States to suspend for a certain time the sixth article of compact contained in the ordinance, Mr. John Beggs was chosen chairman, and Davis Floyd, secretary. On motion,

Ordered, That a committee of 5 suitable persons be appointed to draught and report to this meeting, a memorial to Congress, in opposition to the resolutions of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, on the subject of slavery in this Territory, by the suspension of the sixth article of compact contained in the ordinance.

And the said committee was appointed of Messrs. Abraham Little, John Owens, Charles Beggs, Robert Robertson, and James Beggs.

Mr. Little, from the aforesaid committee, reported a memorial, pursuant to the aforesaid order, in the words and figures following, viz:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the citizens of Clark county, humbly showeth that great anxiety has been, and still is, evinced by some of the citizens of this Territory, on the subject of the introduction of slavery into the same; but in no case has the voice of the citizens been unanimous. In the year 1802, at a special convention of delegates from the respective counties, a petition was forwarded to Congress, to repeal the sixth article of compact contained in the ordinance; but the representation of all that part of the Territory east of Vincennes were present, and were decidedly opposed to that part of the petition.

In the year 1805 the subject was again taken up and discussed in the General Assembly, and a majority of the House of Representatives voted against said memorial on the aforesaid subject, and, consequently, the memorial was rejected, as the journals of that House doth sufficiently evince; but a number of citizens thought proper to sign the same, and, amongst the rest, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Council, (though the President of the Council denies ever having signed the same;) and, by some legislative legerde-main, it found its way into the Congress of the United States, as the legislative act of the Territory. In the present year of 1807, the subject was again taken up by the Legislature of this Territory, and a majority of both Houses passed certain resolutions (in the proportion of two to one) for the purpose of suspending the sixth article of compact contained in the ordinance, which we presume are before your honorable body. But let it be understood, that in the Legislative Council there were only three members present, who, for certain reasons, positively refused to sign the said resolutions; and they were reduced to the last subterfuge of prevailing on the president to leave his seat, and one of the other members to take it as president pro tem., for the purpose of signing the said resolutions. Whether this be right or wrong, judge ye. And although it is contended by some, that, at this day, there is a great majority in favor of slavery, whilst the opposite opinion is held by others, the fact is certainly doubtful. But when we take into consideration the vast emigration into this Territory, and of citizens, too, decidedly opposed to the measure, we feel satisfied that, at all events, Congress will suspend any legislative act on this subject until we shall, by the constitution, be admitted into the Union, and have a right to adopt such a constitution, in this respect, as may comport with the wishes of a majority of the citizens. As to the propriety of holding those in slavery whom it hath pleased the Divine Creator to create free, seems to us to be repugnant to the inestimable principles of a republican Government. Although some of the States have, and do hold slaves, yet it seems to be the general opinion, even in those States, that they are an evil from which they cannot extricate themselves. As to the interest of the Territory, a variety of opinions exist; but suffer your memorialists to state, that it is a fact that a great number of citizens, in various parts of the United States, are preparing, and many have actually emigrated to this Territory, to get free from a Government which does tolerate slavery. The toleration of slavery is either right or wrong; and if Congress should think, with us, that it is wrong, that it is inconsistent with the principles upon which our future constitution is to be formed, your memorialists will rest satisfied that at least this subject will not be by them taken up until the constitutional number of the citizens of this Territory shall assume that right. It is considered useless for your memorialists to recapitulate the many reasons and objections which might be advanced, relying that this subject is fully and fairly understood by your honorable body, as it relates to the natural right, policy, and prosperity of a free and independent nation. On motion,

Resolved, That the chairman be requested to forward duplicate copies of these proceedings, (signed by the said chairman, and countersigned by the secretary,) one to the Vice President of the United States, or President of the Senate pro tem., and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 23, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Agreeably to the assurance given in my message at the opening of the present session of Congress, I now lay before you a copy of the proceedings and of the evidence exhibited on the arraignment of Aaron Burr and others, before the circuit court of the United States held in Virginia, in the course of the present year, in as authentic form as their several parts have admitted.

TH: JEFFERSON.

HAY, Attorney of the United States for the Virginia district.

A true bill: JOHN RANDOLPH.

THURSDAY, May 28.

This day came the attorney for the United States and Aaron Burr, and, by consent of the said Aaron Burr, it is considered that he enter into a recognizance in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and give one or more securities in the like sum, with condition for his personal appearance before this court on to-morrow, then and there to answer such charges as shall be exhibited against him on behalf of the United States, and not to depart without the leave of the said court. Whereupon the said Aaron Burr, Luther Martin, Thomas Taylor, John G. Gamble, and William Langbourne, here in court acknowledge themselves to be indebted to the United States as follows: the said Aaron Burr in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and the said Luther Martin, Thomas Taylor, John G. Gamble, and William Langbourne, in the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars each, of their respective goods and chattels, lands and tenements, to be rendered for the use of the said United States: yet upon this condition, that if the said Aaron Burr shall make his personal appearance before this court to-morrow, then and there to answer such charges as shall be exhibited against him on behalf of the United States, and shall not depart thence without the leave of the said court, then this recognizance is to be void.

FRIDAY, May 29.

Aaron Burr this day appeared in court, in compliance with his recognizance entered into yesterday.

SATURDAY, June 13.

On the motion of Aaron Burr, and for reasons appearing to the court, it is ordered that a subpœna duces tecum be awarded to summon the President of the United States, or such of the Secretaries of the Departments, as may have the papers hereinafter mentioned, or any of them, with their keeping; to bring forthwith to this court a letter from General Wilkinson to the President of the United States, dated the 21st day of October, 1806, as mentioned in the President's message of the 22d day of January, 1807, to both Houses of Congress; together with the documents accompanying the same letter, and a copy of the answer of said Thomas Jefferson, or of any one by his authority, to the said letter; and the military and naval orders given by the President of the United States, through the Departments of War and of the Navy, to the officers of the army and navy at or near the New Orleans stations, touching or concerning the said Burr or his property.

WEDNESDAY, June 24.

The Grand Jury this day appeared in court, and presented "An indictment against Aaron Burr, for treason—a true bill.
 "An indictment against Aaron Burr, for a misdemeanor—a true bill."
 And the said grand jury again retired.

On the motion of George Hay, attorney for the United States for this district, it is ordered that Aaron Burr, who is present in court, be committed to the custody of the marshal of this district, to be by him safely kept until discharged by due course of law.

FRIDAY, June 26.

We, who are counsel in the defence of Colonel Aaron Burr, at the suit of the United States, beg leave to represent to the court, that, in pursuance of our duty to him, we have visited him in his confinement in the city jail; that we could not avoid remarking the danger which will most probably result to his health from the situation, inconveniences, and circumstances attending the place of his confinement; but we cannot forbear to declare our conviction, that we ourselves cannot freely and fully perform what we have undertaken for his defence, if he remain in the jail aforesaid, deprived as he is of a room to himself; it being scarcely possible for us to consult with him upon the various necessary occasions which must occur. From all which we believe that he will be deprived of that assistance from counsel which is given to him by the constitution of the United States, unless he be removed.

Sworn to in open court by

EDMUND RANDOLPH,
 JOHN WICKHAM,
 BENJAMIN BOTTS.

WILLIAM MARSHALL, Clerk.

Whereupon, it is ordered that the marshal of this district do cause the front room of the house now occupied by Luther Martin, Esq., which room has been and is used as a dining room, to be prepared for the reception and safe-keeping of Colonel Aaron Burr, by securing the shutters to the windows of the said room by bars, the door by a strong bar or padlock; and that he employ a guard of seven men, to be placed on the floor of the adjoining unfinished house, and on the same story with the before described front room, and also at the door opening into the said front room. And, upon the marshal's reporting to the court that the said room has been so fitted up, and the guard employed, that then the said marshal be directed, and he is hereby directed, to remove to the said room the body of the said Aaron Burr from the public jail, there to be by him safely kept.

SIR:

RICHMOND, July 26, 1807.

The question submitted to me, whether in the house now occupied by Mr. L. Martin, counsel for Colonel Burr, a room or rooms may be so prepared as to form a place of security against escape, I have considered; and, on inspection of the premises, I am of opinion that if the shutters of the windows of the second or any other story be secured by bars, the door by a strong bar or padlock, and if a guard be stationed on the floor of the adjoining house, and also at the door of the above rooms, no person can escape therefrom without risk of his life.

B. HENRY LATROBE,

*Surveyor of the public buildings of the United States.*THE MARSHAL OF THE UNITED STATES, District of Virginia.

Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York, and State of New York, attorney-at-law, who stands indicted for treason, was this day brought to the bar in custody of the marshal of this district, and thereof arraigned, and pleaded not guilty to the indictment, and for his trial put himself upon God and the country; whereupon he is remanded to jail. And as the trial of the said Aaron Burr cannot be had in the county of Wood, where the offence is alleged to have been committed, without great inconvenience, it is ordered that a venire facias issue to the marshal of this district to be directed, commanding him to summon forty-eight fit persons, qualified as the law directs, twelve of whom from the said county of Wood, to appear here on the third day of August next, as a venire for the trial of the said Burr.

IN COUNCIL, MONDAY, June 29, 1807.

The board being informed that an affidavit has been filed in the circuit court of the United States for the Virginia district, which states that the jail for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond is inconvenient and unhealthy, and so crowded with State offenders and debtors that there are no private apartments therein for the reception of persons charged with offences against the laws of the United States, it is therefore advised that the Governor be requested to tender to the said court (through the federal attorney of the district of Virginia) apartments in the third story of the public jail and penitentiary house, for the reception of such persons as shall be directed, under the authority of the United States, to be confined therein.

Extract from the minutes.

DANIEL L. HILTON, Clerk of the Council.

Which tender the court doth accept for the purposes above mentioned.

SIR:

COUNCIL CHAMBER, TUESDAY, June 30, 1807.

In pursuance of an advice of the Council of State, I beg leave, through you, to inform the circuit court of the United States now sitting, that any persons who may be confined in the jail and penitentiary house, on the part of the United States, will be considered as in the custody and under the sole control of the marshal of the district; that he will have authority to admit any person or persons to visit the confined that he may think proper; and that he will be authorized to select, for the purposes aforesaid, any apartments in the penitentiary, now unoccupied, that he may deem most conducive to safety, health, and convenience.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

W. H. CABELL.

In consequence of the offer made by the Executive of the apartments in the third story of the penitentiary and state prison for persons who may be confined therein, under the authority of the United States, and of the foregoing letter from the Governor of this commonwealth, it is ordered, on the motion of the attorney of the United States, that, so soon as the apartments in the second story of the public jail and penitentiary shall be fit for the reception and safe-keeping of Aaron Burr, he be removed thereto, and safely kept therein by the marshal until the 2d day of August next, when he shall be brought back to the prison where he is now placed, there to be guarded in like manner as at present, until the further order of the court.

And, at a court of the United States for the fifth circuit and Virginia district, continued by adjournment, and held at the Capitol, in the city of Richmond, on Monday, the third day of August, one thousand eight hundred and seven, Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York, and State of New York, attorney-at-law, who stands indicted for treason, was this day again brought to the bar in custody of the marshal of this district.

MONDAY, August 10.

Aaron Burr, being brought into court, acknowledged that he had received, according to law, a copy of the indictment against him for high treason in this court, a list of the jury, and a list of one hundred and thirty-one witnesses, in his case, mentioning the names and places of abode of such witnesses and jurors, three entire days antecedent to this day; and he consents to waive all advantage and objection, in point of form in the delivery thereof, and all exception to any mistake, omission, or deficiency in the names of the jurors or witnesses, and the description of their places of residence, or defect in not stating the residence of any of the witnesses.

Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York, and State of New York, attorney-at-law, who stands indicted for treason, was this day brought to the bar in custody of the marshal of this district; and thereupon the names of the venire, summoned in pursuance of the venire facias, awarded in this cause, being called, Richard E. Parker, David Lambert, Hugh Mercer, and Edward Carrington, were accepted by the prisoner, and sworn.

TUESDAY, August 11.

Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York and State of New York, attorney-at-law, who stands indicted for treason, was this day brought to the bar in custody of the marshal of this district.

In consequence of challenges to the persons summoned, as a venire for the trial of Aaron Burr, who stands indicted for treason, there is a defect of jurors for the said trial; it is therefore ordered that the marshal of this district return to the court at twelve o'clock on Thursday next, forty-eight jurymen de talibus circumstantibus to complete the pannel of the said jury.

MONDAY, August 17.

Aaron Burr, being brought into court, acknowledges that he has received, according to law, a list of four witnesses in his case, in addition to the list heretofore furnished him, mentioning the names and places of abode of such witnesses, three entire days antecedent to this day; and he consents to waive all advantage and objection in point of form in the delivery thereof; and all exception to any mistake, omission, or deficiency in the names of the witnesses, and the description of their places of residence or defect in not stating the residence of any of the witnesses.

Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York, and State of New York, attorney-at-law, who stands indicted for treason, was this day again brought to the bar in custody of the marshal of this district; and thereupon the names of the persons summoned in pursuance of the process awarded in this cause being called, Christopher Anthony, James Sheppard, Reuben Blakeley, Benjamin Graves, Miles Bott, Henry E. Coleman, John M. Sheppard, and Richard Curd, who, being elected, tried, and sworn, the truth of, and upon the premises to speak, together with Richard E. Parker, David Lambert, Hugh Mercer, and Edward Carrington, sworn on Monday last, completed the jury for the trial of the said indictment.

TUESDAY, September 1.

Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York, and State of New York, attorney-at-law, who stands indicted for treason, was this day again brought to the bar in custody of the marshal of this district; and the jury sworn in this cause having heard the evidence, upon their oath do say, that the said Aaron Burr is not guilty of the treason aforesaid, as in pleading he hath alleged, and thereupon proclamation was made as the manner is.

THURSDAY, September 3.

Ordered, That Aaron Burr, against whom an indictment was lately depending in this court for treason, and upon which the jury on Tuesday last brought in a verdict of not guilty, be acquitted and discharged of the said offence, and go thereof without day. And it is ordered, that the said Aaron Burr enter into a recognizance himself in the sum of five thousand dollars, and give two or more securities in the sum of five thousand dollars for the said Burr's appearance before this court to-morrow, then and there to answer an indictment against him for a misdemeanor. Whereupon the said Aaron Burr acknowledged himself to be indebted to the United States in the sum of five thousand dollars of his lands and tenements, goods and chattels, to be levied, and to the United States rendered: yet upon this condition, that, if the said Aaron Burr shall make his personal appearance before this court to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, then and there to answer the said indictment for a misdemeanor, and shall not depart thence without leave of the said court, or until discharged by due course of law, then this recognizance to be void.

SATURDAY, September 5.

William Langbourne and Jonathan Dayton, here in court, acknowledge themselves to be indebted to the United States in the sum of five thousand dollars of their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, to be levied, and to the United States rendered: yet upon this condition, that, if Aaron Burr shall make his personal appearance here before the judges of this court, at ten o'clock on Monday next, to answer an indictment against him for a misdemeanor, and shall not depart thence without leave of the said court, or until discharged by due course of law, then this recognizance is to be void.

 AARON BURR.

This day came as well George Hay, general attorney for the United States for this district, as the defendant by his attorney; and thereupon the said defendant saith that he is not guilty of the misdemeanor for which he stands indicted, and of this he putteth himself upon the country, and the attorney for this district likewise.

TUESDAY, October 20.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA }

 AARON BURR.

The jury sworn in this case having, on the fifteenth day of the last month, brought in a verdict of not guilty, it is ordered that the said Aaron Burr be acquitted of the offence aforesaid, and go thereof without day.

On the motion of Aaron Burr, who is confined in the jail of Henrico county as a debtor, it is ordered that a writ of habeas corpus be awarded to the sheriff of said county to be directed, to cause him to bring forthwith to this court the body of the said Aaron Burr.

The sheriff of Henrico, by virtue of a writ of habeas corpus to him directed, this day produced in court the body of Aaron Burr detained in his custody on civil process; whereupon, it is ordered that the said Aaron Burr be committed to the custody of the marshal, to be by him safely kept until he shall be transmitted to the State of Ohio, there to be tried for a misdemeanor against the United States, in beginning, or setting on foot, or preparing, or procuring, the means of a military expedition or enterprise against Mexico, a province in North America, of the King of Spain, with whom the United States were and are at peace.

WILLIAM MARSHALL, Clerk.

STATE OF VIRGINIA, Henrico county, to wit:

William Waller Hening and William Munford, both of the city of Richmond, personally appeared before me, Daniel L. Hylton, a justice of the peace for the said county, and made oath that the printed statements of the evidence of witnesses, examined before the circuit court of the United States for the fifth circuit and district of Virginia, contained in the thirty-four pages hereunto annexed, which evidence was delivered in court, on a motion for an attachment against Gen. James Wilkinson, on the several trials of Aaron Burr for treason against the United States, and for a misdemeanor, and on a motion for the commitment of Aaron Burr, Herman Blannerhasset, and Israel Smith, for the purpose of their being sent out of the said district of Virginia for trial, are, in the opinion of the said Hening and Munford, substantially faithful and accurate. A very large proportion thereof has been corrected by means of the joint notes of the said deponents, Hening and Munford, and of Thomas Ritchie, editor of the Enquirer. The said printed statements have been generally examined, and acknowledged to be substantially correct by the witnesses themselves; and these deponents, who, either jointly or severally, took notes of the whole thereof, firmly believe that no error of any importance can be discovered in any part of the same. In testimony whereof, the said Hening and Munford have sworn and subscribed to this affidavit, this twenty-first day of October, 1807.

Sworn and subscribed before me, in due form of law, the day and date above written.

TRIAL OF AARON BURR.

TUESDAY, June 24.

On this occasion the following testimony was produced: JAMES KNOX, on the part of the prisoner; Lieut. GAINES and Mr. GRAHAM, on behalf of the prosecution.

JAMES KNOX says he went to New Orleans in March; soon after his arrival, received a note from Gen. Wilkinson, the object of which appeared to be to get information about Sergeant Dunbaugh; waited on the general; he asked me if I was not afraid to come before him after what had been said about him? Told him I was not. Asked me if I knew, and was at liberty to say any thing of the party coming down the river? I told him I was at liberty to say any thing I knew. He said he was very uneasy, had lost his wife; but that gave him little uneasiness compared with the state of the country; he asked me if I would go to Richmond; said he would do any thing to aid me; I told him I expected money in ten days, and would then go; he offered me what money I might want; would not accept any; was served with a subpoena by Lieut. Gaines; short time after arrested by the sheriff and carried to Judge Hall's; judge not at home; the Governor recommended to the sheriff if the judge was not at home, to let me go at liberty till next day; Judge Hall told me I must either give my affidavit, or go to Richmond; told him could not give my affidavit without advice, but should go to Richmond when I got money; the judge said I must then give security or go to jail; gave two securities in five hundred dollars each; appeared next day; judge had printed interrogatories; I asked him to let me read them; gave them back; he asked me to answer them; told him I had not counsel, and could not answer them without; saw counsellor Carr, he told me they had no right to compel me to answer the interrogatories. The judge persisted, and asked me some of the questions; I told him, to save trouble, I would relate what occurred while coming from Meadville to that place. The judge sent for Mr. Fort; Mr. F. made some observations, and also refused to answer the interrogatories; he and myself sent to jail by the judge, and confined with negroes and others; Mr. F. was shortly after bailed by his friends; some of mine came to relieve me; were told the sum demanded was five or ten thousand dollars; I stayed three days in jail; was then taken out by Sergeant Dunbaugh and others who had side-arms; the men went with us to the water; Sergeant Dunbaugh and myself went on board; asked D. if that was a guard; said it was not; has since told me it was; asked if Lieut. Gaines was on board; was told he soon would be; asked leave to go on shore for my clothes; refused; when D. took me from the jail, he had an order which he handed to the jailer; wrote, while in jail, to Lindsley and Doctor Monhollen; told them if they came to Orleans what they might expect. When Lieut. Gaines came on board the vessel, he said I was in an ill humor; told him I was; he advised me, as I was there, to bear my situation with patience; asked him to let me go on shore for my clothes; he said he could not, had nothing to do with it; General Wilkinson alone could do it; brought to Richmond without clothes; Captain G. said he had forty dollars for me; told him I did not want it, if I could be permitted to go on shore; he said I was not compelled to take it; I told him I must accept it, unless permitted to go on shore; the money was sent on shore, my bill to my landlord paid, and twenty dollars returned me by Governor Claiborne, who came on board and accompanied us six or eight miles.

On our passage, Captain G. said I must understand that I was sent by Judge Hall. General Wilkinson the next day asked me if I had any objection to going to Richmond, and if Capt. G. had not spoken to me on the subject; I told him he had; that I was ill used; brought off without clothes or money; Gen. W. said, if so, I had been badly used; that that was the first he heard of it; asked again if I was averse to going; told him I was not, if properly treated; he said if I would give my honor that I would go, I should be no longer controlled; I refused; told him I had asked two favors of him and Mr. Gaines, and should not ask a third from any man; after some time, he asked me if twenty dollars would be of service to me; told him I had no clothes, and must have some; he then talked with Mr. Lindsley, and returned to me, and asked if fifty dollars would serve me; told him that sum would be requisite to get me clothes; came to Richmond in a pilot boat; Lieut. Moxley said he was to take charge of Gen. Wilkinson's passengers; carry them to Richmond, and there to wait Gen. W.'s orders.

Question. Have you any military commission?

Answer. None.

Question. Where were you born?

Answer. Maryland; left it very young; resided in Pennsylvania, and left it some time in November last; left Pennsylvania, Meadville, for New Orleans, 24th or 25th of November; went down the Allegany and Ohio to Beaver; went from thence with about twenty or thirty to Blannerhasset's island; left that place some time in December, Blannerhasset and another with them; stopped at Shawany town; went with about double the number to Cumberland Island; stayed a day and a half, met with Col. Burr and a few others; the whole number fifty or sixty, about seven or eight boats, five fire-arms; went thence to Fort Massac. Sergeant Dunbaugh joined them there with a musket; after meeting with Col. Burr, considered himself under his direction, went to Natchez; Col. B. did not accompany them; went from Natchez to New Orleans; some of the boats chartered, and others sold; arrived at Orleans 13th or 16th March; first notice, after seeing Gen. Wilkinson, of proceedings against him was, when carried before Judge Hall; was said to be carried under an affidavit of Gen. Wilkinson before Judge H.; Captain G. requested him to write to him on shore, and he would get what he wanted; he was not permitted to send the letter; never mentioned to General Wilkinson till arrived in Hampton Roads; treated as others while on his way; arrived at Richmond on Friday evening; put up at the Bell. Three days elapsed before he saw Col. B.; mentioned the treatment he had received to Col. B., and intended mentioning it to the court on his first appearance, but was told it was unnecessary.

Miscellaneous questions and answers.

Whilst at the mouth of Cumberland river, and when Col. B. made his escape, he was one that took Col. Burr in a wherry and carried him some distance; left him in the woods; did not hear him address any one. The note wrote him by Gen. Wilkinson, and sent by Dunbaugh, was left at his house sealed; the object was to obtain some information about Dunbaugh; no letters; carried Col. B.'s things to a parson Bruin's, as he was told; had but few guns; those traded for as they descended the river; vessel sailed from New Orleans in half an hour after Gen. Wilkinson came on board; the one hundred and fifty dollars offered him by Gen. Wilkinson, he was induced to believe, was to bribe him to give evidence against Col. B.; said he could obtain from Col. Tyler a sufficiency to carry him home under his agreement with that gentleman; this conversation took place before the subpoena was served.

LIEUT. GAINES received a letter from Attorney General of United States enclosing subpoenas for witnesses against Col. B.; went to New Orleans in consequence, and arrived on 7th May; called several times at the house where Ch. Knox stayed with Mr. Lindsley and Dr. Monhallon; was told by the landlord those gentlemen walked out whenever he approached; he told his business, and at length saw them; they said they had belonged to Burr's party, and did not wish to appear against him; he told them the commander-in-chief offered them a passage in the United States' sloop with him; Knox said he could not come till he had made some money arrangements; he applied to Judge Hall; the judge directed him to obtain an affidavit of the refusal, and he would take the proper steps; he said the subpoena must be served by the marshal or sheriff, and proposed appointing him a deputy; he refused, unless he could afterwards be released from any further service in that capacity; Knox appeared always ill-natured, which induced him to ask him if he could do any thing for him; he obtained from the United States' agent at that place forty dollars, and offered it to Knox, which he, after some hesitation, accepted. Offered him paper, &c., and requested him to write to some friend on shore, or myself; heard nothing more from him. In serving the subpoena, he acted under the authority of the Attorney General, in every other respect, while at New Orleans, under the authority of the marshal at that place. At Hampton Roads Knox said he wished to come to Richmond, but wished to leave that vessel; I told him he should, but had not determined how he could be conveyed to Richmond; his getting off gave me no concern, because I supposed he could be again caught in some part of this country; whilst the witness was on shore Gen. W. procured a vessel, and sent the witness to Richmond; he considered the witness under his authority, and not as a military officer, but as deputy marshal.

He gave to Sergeant Dunbaugh an order at New Orleans, to receive from jail, and deliver to the commanding officer on board the United States' sloop Revenge, the body of James Knox. He should not have conceived any citizen of New Orleans bound to execute that order; he did not consider Sergeant Dunbaugh further bound than in compliance with his promise; he was called Sergeant Dunbaugh, but did not consider him under his authority as a military officer; General Wilkinson made his affidavit at his own quarters; he delivered it to the judge; they consulted counsel; he delivered to General Wilkinson subpoenas from the attorney of the United States, one for himself, another for Mr. Graham; he always considered himself bound to obey the orders of General Wilkinson; he considered Gen. Wilkinson as having full control of the officers on board the Revenge, if he chose to exercise it; on their way to Virginia, they stopped at the Havana for fresh supply of water and other necessaries; while preparing to go on shore, a shot was fired from the castle, and orders given to come on shore; they went on shore at the request of the persons on board made to W. and Read; had good provisions, &c. on board; heard Captain Read direct the cook to let those people have their provisions regularly; he, on several occasions, received advice of counsel how to act in executing the business in which he was engaged; the money received from the military agent was obtained after several applications from the witness; he was advised by General Wilkinson and the attorney to procure money and furnish them; on application to the military agent, he said he had been directed to advance for that purpose.

MR. GRAHAM.—A short time after the arrival of Captain Gaines at New Orleans, he was told that there was a subpoena for him; that there was a vessel of the United States that would convey him to Richmond. I then went to Gen. Wilkinson to know whether he could be accommodated, the vessel being small, and his health bad. General W. said he understood there were several witnesses in town, some of them unwilling, others unable to come round; asked if I knew of any legal means to force them; told him I supposed the judge could inform him; waited on the judge himself to know whether there was such process. At this time, or some other, Gen. W. told me to ask the judge if there was any impropriety in advancing money to the witness, or to what amount; the judge said, so far from it, the witness had a right to demand it.

The judge said, if the witnesses refused to answer interrogatories, or refused to enter into recognizance, then he felt that, under the law, he would be authorized to send such witnesses round under the care of the district marshal. He saw, a few days after, in an outer room at the judge's, Mr. Knox talking with Mr. Keen, an attorney; some short time after Mr. K came before the judge. The judge asked him if he was then willing to answer questions, or enter into recognizance; he declined doing either. The judge then showed a Mr. Fort, who was in the same situation with K. and R., the law, and advised them to do one of the two, or he should be obliged to act rigidly towards them, contrary to his wish. The judge asked Mr. F. to answer the interrogatories, which he refused to do. The judge then sent for the marshal, and committed both of them. In the afternoon Captain F. gave security in five hundred dollars for his appearance at Richmond.

He understood Captain F. had taken passage for New York, in order to come to Richmond; but F. told the witness he could not leave New Orleans without injury to his business. Mr. Keen intimated to the judge he did not appear as an attorney, but expressed some doubt of the correctness of the proceedings. The ship's stores were good, and the persons treated civilly and not restrained. The cause of calling at the Havana was owing to bad winds, and being chased close in by a British cruiser. Captain Read, Gaines, Mr. Smith, and self, went on shore to procure fruit, &c.; remained there about three hours. He thinks they would not have gone on shore but for a shot from the fort under which they run; the naval and other officers are under the command of General Wilkinson; were formerly under the control of the Government, but the alarmed situation of the country had induced the giving the command to W.; saw no guard on his way to New Orleans; he went down the river with Captain Fort, who said his object was to go to Mexico, of which declaration, he, the witness, made no secret. He was asked to use his influence with Captain Gaines to prevail on him to accept from the judge the appointment of deputy marshal.

Lieutenant Gaines, upon being called up again, said, he is an officer of the United States' army; never consu General Wilkinson about accepting the appointment of deputy marshal. He understood Fort was included in the same affidavit with Knox. He sailed from New Orleans in the Revenge; saw General Wilkinson exercise no kind of authority on the voyage.

Evidence of General Eaton.

TUESDAY, August 18.

Mr. Hay asked the witness if he had heard the opinion of the court delivered, and understood the restrictions with which he was to give his testimony. He was answered in the affirmative.

Mr. Eaton, holding a small piece of paper in his hand, inquired of the court whether he might occasionally recur to his notes for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

Chief Justice. Were they written by yourself?

Answer. They were.

Mr. Wickham. At what time were they taken?

Answer. The notes which I hold in my hand are mere memoranda drawn up here, and taken partly from my recollection of notes which I made at the different times the conversations passed between Colonel Burr and myself, and partly from notes which I have at my lodgings.

Col. Burr. At what time did you say you took the original notes?

Answer. At the time I had the conversations with you, sir.

The court decided that he should not recur to his notes.

Mr. Eaton, addressing the court: I wish, sir, to be indulged in a few preliminary remarks. I have long been before the public; much stricture and some severity have passed upon me; I wish to be instructed whether I may, in stating my evidence, occasionally make explanations with respect to my own conduct, and the motives which governed me.

Chief Justice. The court will be better able to judge of the propriety of any explanation when the case shall occur; there may be cases in which it may be necessary; and if there should be particular objections to any of your explanations you may apply to the court for their decision.

Mr. Eaton. Concerning any fact which may go to prove treason against Colonel Burr, I know nothing; concerning certain transactions which are said to have happened at Blannerhasset's island, I know nothing; but concerning Colonel Burr's expressions, and his treasonable intentions, I know much; and it is to these that my evidence relates.

Mr. Martin interrupted the witness, and inquired as to the effect of the opinion of the court, whether the witness could go into evidence of any transactions distinct from that stated to have taken place at Blannerhasset's island.

Chief Justice. The opinion of the court is this: that any proof of intention formed before the act itself, if relevant to that act, may be admitted. One witness may prove the intention at one time, and another witness may prove it at another time, so as to prove the continuance of the intention throughout the whole transaction; and therefore proof of very remote intentions may be relevant to this particular act.

Mr. Martin. I hope, when he speaks of a treasonable intention not applicable to this particular act, the court will stop him.

Mr. Eaton. During the winter of 1805-6, I cannot be positive as to the distinct point of time, yet, during the winter, at the city of Washington, Colonel Burr signified to me that he was organizing a secret expedition to be moved against the Spanish provinces on the southwestern frontiers of the United States—I understood, under the authority of the General Government. From our existing controversies with Spain, and from the tenor of the President's address to both Houses of Congress, a conclusion was naturally drawn that war with that country was inevitable. I had then just returned from the coast of Africa; and having been for many years employed on our own frontiers, and on a foreign coast, still more barbarous and obscure, I knew not the extent of the reputation which Colonel Burr sustained in the consideration of his country. The distinguished rank which he had held in society, and the strong marks of confidence which he had received from his fellow-citizens, gave me no right to doubt of his patriotism. As a military character I had been made acquainted with him, but not personally; and I knew none in the United States in whom a soldier might more securely have confided his honor than in Colonel Burr. In case of enmity to this country, from whatever quarter it might come, I thought it my duty to obey so honorable a call as was proposed to me. Under impressions like these, I did engage to embark in the enterprise, and did pledge my faith to Colonel Burr. At several interviews, it appeared to be the intention of Colonel Burr to instruct me, by maps and other documents, of the feasibility of penetrating to Mexico. At length, from certain indistinct expressions and inuendoes, I admitted a suspicion that Colonel Burr had other projects. He used strong expressions of reproach against the administration of the General Government; accused them of want of character, want of energy, want of gratitude. He seemed desirous of irritating my resentment, by reiterating certain injurious strictures cast upon me on the floor of Congress, on account of certain transactions on the coast of Africa, and by dilating on the injuries which I had sustained from the delays in adjusting my account for moneys advanced for the United States; and talked of pointing out to me modes of honorable indemnity. I will not conceal here that Colonel Burr had good grounds to believe me disaffected towards the Government; I had, indeed, suffered much from delays in adjusting my accounts for cash advanced to support the credit of the Government whilst I was consul at Tunis, and for the expense of maintaining the war with Tripoli. I had but a short time before been compelled ingloriously to strike the flag of my country from the ramparts of a defeated enemy, where it had flown for forty-five days. I had been compelled to abandon my comrades in war on the fields where they had fought our battles. I had seen cash offered to the half-vanquished chief of Tripoli, (as he had himself acknowledged,) as the price of pacification—[Mr. Wickham.—By whom? Answer. By our negotiator]—when as yet no exertion had been made by our naval squadron to coerce that enemy. I had seen the conduct of the author of these blemishes on our then proud national character, if not commended, not censured; whilst my own inadequate efforts to support that character were attempted to be thrown into shade. To feelings naturally arising out of circumstances like these, I did give strong expressions. Here I beg leave to observe, in justice to myself, that however strong those expressions, however harsh the language I employed, they would not justify the inference that I was prepared to dip my sabre in the blood of my countrymen, much less of their children, which I believe would have been the case had this conspiracy been carried into effect. [Mr. Martin objected to this language.] I listened to Colonel Burr's mode of indemnity; and as I had by this time begun to suspect that the military expedition he had on foot was unlawful, I permitted him to believe myself resigned to his influence, that I might understand the extent and motive of his arrangements. Colonel Burr now laid open his project of revolutionizing the territory west of the Allegany; establishing an independent empire there, New Orleans to be the capital, and he himself to be the chief; organizing a military force on the waters of the Mississippi, and carrying conquest to Mexico. After much conversation (which I do not particularly recollect) respecting the feasibility of the project, as was natural, I stated impediments to his operations, such as the republican habits of the citizens of that country, their attachment to the present administration of Government, the want of funds, the opposition he would experience from the regular army of the United States stationed on that frontier, and the resistance to be expected from Miranda, in case he should succeed in republicanizing the Mexicans. Colonel Burr seemed to have no difficulty in removing these obstacles. He stated to me that he had in person (I think the preceding season) made a tour through that country; that he had secured to his interests and attached to his person the most distinguished citizens of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Territory of Orleans; that he had inexhaustible resources and funds; that the army of the United States would act with him; that it would be reinforced by ten or twelve thousand men from the above-mentioned States and Territory; that he had powerful agents in the Spanish territory; and "as for Miranda," said Mr. Burr, facetiously, "we must hang Miranda." In the course of repeated conversations on this subject, he proposed to give me a distinguished command in his army—I understood the second command. I asked him who would command in chief. He said General Wilkinson. I observed that it was singular he should count upon General Wilkinson. The distinguished command and high trust he held under Government, as the commander-in-chief of our army, and as Governor of a province, he would not be apt to put at hazard for any precarious projects of aggrandizement. Colonel Burr stated that General Wilkinson balanced in the confidence of his country; that it was doubtful whether he would much longer retain the distinction and confidence he now enjoyed; and that he was prepared to secure to himself a permanency. I asked Colonel Burr if he knew General Wilkinson. He said "yes," and echoed the question. I told him that twelve years ago I was at the same time a captain in his wing of the legion of the United States, his acting brigade major and aid-de-camp, and that I thought I knew him well. He asked me what I knew of General Wilkinson. I said I knew General Wilkinson would act as lieutenant to no man in existence. "But you are in an error," said Mr. Burr: "Wilkinson will act as lieutenant to me." From the tenor of much conversation on this subject, I was prevailed on to believe that the plan of revolution meditated by Colonel Burr, and communicated to me, had been concerted with General Wilkinson, and would have his co-operation; for Colonel Burr repeatedly and very confidently expressed his belief that the influence of General Wilkinson with his army, the promise of double pay and double rations, the ambition of his officers, and the prospect of plunder and military achievements, would bring the army generally into the measure. I pass over, here, a conversation which took place between Colonel Burr and myself respecting a central revolution, as it is decided to be irrelevant by the opinion of the bench. [Mr. Hay—You allude to a revolution for overthrowing the Government at Washington, and of revolutionizing the Eastern States.] I was passing over that to come down to the period when I supposed he had relinquished that design, and returned to his project in the West. I was thoroughly convinced myself that such a project was already so far organized as to be dangerous, and that it would require an effort to suppress it; for, in addition to positive assurances that Colonel Burr had of assistance and co-operation, he said that the vast extent of territory of the United States beyond the mountains which offered to adventurers, together with a view of the mines of Mexico, would bring adherents to him from all quarters of the Union. The situation which these communications and the impressions they made upon me placed me in, was peculiarly delicate. I had no overt act to produce against Colonel Burr. He had given me nothing upon paper; nor did I know of any person in the vicinity who had received similar communications, and whose testimony might support mine. He had mentioned to me none as principally and decidedly engaged with him but General Wilkinson; a Mr. Alston, who I afterwards learned was his son-in-law; and a Mr. Ephraim Kibber, who I learned was late a captain of rangers in Wayne's army. Of General Wilkinson Burr said much, as I have stated; of Mr. Alston very little, but enough to satisfy me that he was engaged in the project; and of Kibby he said that he was brigade major in the vicinity of Cincinnati, (whether in Ohio or in Kentucky I know not,) who had much influence with the militia, and had already engaged the majority of the brigade to which he belonged, who were ready to march at Mr. Burr's signal. Mr. Burr talked of this revolution as a matter of right inherent in the people, and constitutional; a revolution which would rather be advantageous than detrimental to the Atlantic States; a revolution which must eventually take place, and for the operation of which the present crisis was peculiarly favorable; that there was no energy to be dreaded in the General Government; and his conversations denoted a confidence that his arrangements were so well made, that he should meet with no opposition at New Orleans: for the army and the chief citizens of that place were ready to receive him. On the solitary ground upon which I stood, I was at a loss how to conduct myself, though at no loss as respected my duty. I durst not place my lonely testimony in the balance against the weight of Colonel Burr's character, for, by turning the tables upon me, which I thought any man capable of such a project was capable of doing, I should sink under that weight. I resolved, therefore, with myself, to obtain the removal of Mr. Burr from this country in a way which would be satisfactory and honorable to him; and on this I did consult him, without his knowing my motive. Accordingly I waited on the President of the United States, and, after a desultory conversation, in which I aimed to draw his attention to the West, I said to him, (I took the liberty of suggesting to the President,) that I thought Colonel Burr ought to be removed from the country, because I considered him dangerous in it. The President asked where he should send him. I said to England or Madrid, though it has been said in some publications that I added Cadiz. The President, without any positive expression, (in such a matter of delicacy,) seemed to think the trust too important, and expressed something like a doubt about the integrity of Mr. Burr. I frankly told the President that perhaps no person had stronger grounds to suspect that integrity than I had; but that I believed his pride of ambition had so predominated over his other passions, that when placed on an eminence and put on his honor, a respect to himself would secure his fidelity. I perceived that the subject was disagreeable to the President; and to bring him to my point in the shortest mode, and in a manner which would point to the danger, I said to him, if Colonel Burr was not disposed of, we should in eighteen months have an insurrection, if not a revolution, on the waters of the Mississippi. The President said he had too much confidence in the information, the integrity, and attachment of the people of that country to the Union, to admit any apprehensions of that kind. The circumstance of no interrogatories being made to me, I thought imposed silence upon me at that time and place. Here, sir, I beg indulgence to declare my motives for recommending that gentleman to a foreign mission at that time; and in the solemnity with which I stand here, I declare that Colonel Burr was neutral in my feelings; that it was through no attachment to him that I made that suggestion, but to avert a great national calamity which I saw approaching, to arrest a tempest which seemed lowering in the west, and to divert into a channel of usefulness those consummate talents where to mount "the whirlwind and direct the storm." About the time of my having waited on the President, or a little before, I determined at all events to have some evidence of the uprightness of my intentions, and to fortify myself by the advice of more experienced men. I waited upon two members of the House of Representatives, whose friendship I had the honor long to retain, and in whose wisdom and integrity I had full faith. I am at liberty to give their names, if required; and I believe a Senator, but of that I am not certain. I opened to them the projects of Colonel Burr. They did not seem much alarmed.

[Mr. Martin objected to the witness stating any of the observations of other persons to himself. After some desultory conversation, the bench supported the objection.]

Mr. Eaton. I did ask indulgence of the court to make such explanations, because perversions of my conduct were before the public: but I waive this indulgence, contented with meeting these perversions at some other time and place.

[Chief Justice. You have used that indulgence.]

Little more passed between Colonel Burr and myself, relevant to this inquiry, whilst I remained at Washington, though he was solicitous to engage me in his Western plans. I returned to Massachusetts, to my domestic concerns; and thought little more of Colonel Burr or his projects, until in October last a letter was put into my hands from Mr. Belknap to T. E. Danielson, stating that boats were building on the Ohio.

Mr. Burr. Have you that letter?

Mr. Eaton. No.

Mr. Burr. It is improper to state it.

Mr. Hay. It is immaterial; Mr. Belknap is here.

Mr. Eaton. As to letters, I have had no correspondence with Colonel Burr; I was about to state that I made a communication to the President of the United States, through the hands of the Postmaster General, stating the views of Colonel Burr.

Question by the prosecution.

Mr. Wirt. Was there any conversation between you and the prisoner, in which you spoke of the odium attached to the name of usurper?

Answer. That conversation was excluded by the opinion of the court, as relating to the central project.

Mr. Hay. Did you mean to state that the honorable indemnity proposed to you by the prisoner was to be included in this plan?

Answer. I understood it to be included in the permanent rank and emolument to be assigned to me; in his full confidence that he should erect a Government, of which he was to be the chief; which was so often and so strongly repeated, that I could not misunderstand him.

Cross-questioned.

Mr. Martin. Do you recollect when you arrived in Washington?

Answer. I said that I did not recollect particularly; but the principal part of these conversations must have been between the middle of February and the middle of March.

Question. Was there any particular conduct calculated to put an end to Colonel Burr's importunities?

Answer. Yes. At some of our last interviews, I laid on his table a paper containing this toast, which I had given to the public: "The United States.—Palsy to the brain that should plot to dismember, and leprosy to the hand that will not draw to defend our Union."

Question. Where was that toast drunk?

Answer. I cannot say. This question was made to me from authority; it was sent with other toasts I corrected to a paper at Springfield. I laid this paper on Colonel Burr's table, that he might see it; and I have reason to believe that he did.

Question. Was it drunk at any distant place? At Philadelphia?

Answer. I do not recollect; I thought at first it was at Philadelphia; but I had received many hospitalities throughout the Union; many of my toasts were published; and, in the hurry of passing and repassing, I have completely forgotten.

Mr. Burr. Do you recollect when you left Washington? Answer. About the 1st of April.

Mr. Burr. Then this paper was put on my table previous to that day?

Mr. Eaton. I will state the circumstances which induced me to believe you had seen it: we were at Alexandria together, and you made no longer such communications to me as heretofore; I meant you to see it, because I had given it to the world, and with it my sentiments.

Question. Then you are not certain when and where this toast was drunk?

Answer. I am not. But I am certain it was not at Washington, because I gave another there when called upon.

Question. Did you not say that all those conversations happened between the middle of February and the middle of March?

Answer. No: I did not say so. I said the principal part of these conversations.

Question. You say this toast was printed at Springfield? Answer. I did.

Question. Did you transmit it for publication? Answer. Yes, I did.

Question. Do you recollect from what place? Answer. Not distinctly.

Question. Have you in your possession a paper containing that toast? Answer. I have not here.

Question. You have mentioned something about a communication which you made to the President, through the Postmaster General? look at that paper, is that your signature?

Answer. It is; and I must give a short account of that paper. Mr. Eaton then mentioned that the notes on the two first pages were drawn up by Mr. Granger, from conversations which had passed between Mr. Granger and a Mr. Ely, on certain communications made to Mr. Ely by Mr. Eaton, respecting Colonel Burr's plans; that he had seen Mr. Ely at Northampton, at the session of the court of common pleas, at a time when they had first heard of the building of boats on the Ohio. The notes on the last page, in Mr. Granger's writing, and subscribed by himself, were from subsequent conversations between him and Mr. Granger.

Mr. Burr. You spoke of accounts with the Government; did you, or the Government, demand money?

Answer. They had no demand on me; I demanded of them.

Question. Did they state in account a balance against you?

Answer. I expended money for the service of the United States, when employed in my agency at Tunis; an account of which, being presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury, was refused to be allowed by them, there being no law, as they conceived, to justify it. I applied to Congress, a committee of which reported that they supposed the account to be within the discretion of the accounting officers of the Treasury. In this situation the business stood when I was ordered to the coast of Barbary, and, when I returned, found that new difficulties had occurred to an adjustment. Leaving out the sums which I had advanced, the Government had a balance against me. The last session of Congress has provided for the payment, and the commissioners have settled it.

Mr. Martin. What balance did you receive? Answer. That is my concern, sir.

Mr. Burr. What was the balance against you?

Mr. Eaton (to the court.) Is that a proper question, sir?

Mr. Burr. My object is manifest; I wish to show the bias which has existed on the mind of the witness.

Chief Justice saw no objection to the question.

Mr. Eaton. I cannot say to a cent or a dollar; but I have received about $10,000.

Mr. Burr. When was the money received? Answer. About March last.

Question. You mentioned Miranda; where did you understand he was gone to?

Answer. On the benevolent project of revolutionizing the Spanish provinces.

Question. What part of them?

Answer. Caraccas. I had some reason, too, to know something of that project; because I, too, was invited to join in that. He too was to have been an Emperor of Mexico; he might have been troublesome to us; and, of course, when I asked you what was to be done with him, you observed, "hang him."

Question. Did you understand I was to do all at once; to execute the central project, too, as well as that in the West?

Answer. I have no objections to answering that, but it will be nothing in your favor. When you were speaking of a central revolution, not much was said about the revolution in the West; had the other been effected, I doubt much whether you would have been willing to have separated that part.

Question. You spoke of a command?

Answer. You stated what I have already mentioned, that you were assured, from the arrangements which you had made, that an army would be ready to appear when you went to the waters of the Western country. I recollect particularly the name of Ephraim Kibby. You asked about his spirit; you asserted that his brigade was ready to join you; and that the people also in that country were ready to co-operate. You spoke of your riflemen, your infantry, your cavalry. It was with the same view you mentioned to me that that man, (pointing to General Wilkinson, just behind him,) was to have been the first to aid you; and from the same views, perhaps, you have mentioned me.

Mr. Martin objected to the witness interposing his own opinions in this manner.

Mr. Hay. Some allowance is to be made for the feelings of a man of honor.

Mr. Eaton, bowing, apologized to the court for the warmth of his manner.

Mr. Burr. You spoke of my revolutionizing the Western States; what were the boundaries of the new empire?

Answer. Your line was to be the Allegany mountain. You were certain about Kentucky and Tennessee, but expressed some doubts about Ohio; I well recollect that, on account of the reason which you gave, that they were too much of a plodding, industrious people to engage in your plans.

Question. How was this business to be effected?

Answer. I understood that your agents were in the Western country; that the commander-in-chief was ready to co-operate with his army; and that these, with the adventurers that would join you, would compel the States to a separation. Indeed, you considered New Orleans as already yours, and that from this point you would make conquests and consolidate your empire.

Question. Was it, after all this, that you recommended me to an embassy?

Answer. Yes, because I thought it the only way to avert a civil war.

Question. Did you communicate then your recommendation to me?

Answer. Yes, and you gave a modest assent to the proposal.

Question. What then would have become of your command?

Answer. That I had disposed of myself.

Question. Did you understand that you had given me a definitive answer?

Answer. No: after you had developed yourself, I determined to use you until I got every thing out of you; and on the principle that "when innocence is in danger, to break faith with a bad man is not fraud, but virtue."

Question. Did you think that your proposition as to a foreign embassy, which was so incompatible with my own plans, would be received by me with indifference, had I abandoned the project?

Answer. You seemed to me to want some distinguished place; as to the mode, you were indifferent; and you seemed to acquiesce in the plan of a foreign embassy.

Mr. Hay. You said that you received about $10,000 from the Government. Did the act of Congress give you a definitive sum, or refer your accounts to the Department of State?

Answer. The act of Congress gave the accounting officers the power of settling with me, according to equity, under the inspection of the Secretary of State; under whose Department I had served; and the settlement was accordingly made.

TUESDAY, August 18.

Evidence of Commodore Truxton.

Mr. Hay. Were you present when the court delivered their opinion relative to the order in which the evidence is to be introduced?

Answer. I was; and understood the purport of it. I know nothing of any covert act, or treasonable designs, or communications of Col. Burr.

Question. Does your testimony relate to conversations with Col. Burr about the taking of New Orleans?

Answer. I know nothing about the taking of New Orleans. They related to the Western country; to the Spanish territories; to the settlement of lands; to the digging of canals, and the building of boats.

Mr. Hay then observed that he had no questions at present for Commodore Truxton.

Mr. Wickham. Then, sir, I hope I may be permitted to ask Commodore Truxton: 1st. Whether he had not many and minute conversations with Col. Burr? and 2d. Whether those conversations related to treason?

Mr. Hay objected to Mr. Wickham's putting these questions, and said, if the gentleman expected by a contrivance of this sort to exclude the witness, he would ask a few questions.

Mr. Wickham insisted on his right to examine the witness, as the counsel for the United States had relinquished him; and said he could assure the gentleman that it was not a contrivance, but the exercise of a right.

Mr. Wirt. The court knows that there are two indictments against the accused. The witnesses have been summoned promiscuously; and it is not possible for the prosecutor to know the particular point to which every witness is to testify. From what Commodore Truxton has said, it appears that his evidence related to the misdemeanor. But, if he be suffered to come in on the present case, ought not his examination to be free and complete?

Mr. Hay. Upon recollecting the substance of Commodore Truxton's testimony, I cannot but believe that it applies directly to the present occasion. It bears most strongly upon General Eaton's testimony. From Eaton's evidence, the treasonable project and the misdemeanor were intimately connected. Of course, what goes to establish the one of these projects, will so far contribute to prove the other.

Mr. Hay said it always gave him great pleasure to repair any injury which he might inadvertently have done to the feelings of any gentleman. He acknowledged that he ought not to have made use of the term contrivance, in the manner he had done. Addressing Commodore Truxton: Had you not several conversations with the accused upon the subject of the Mexican expedition?

Commodore Truxton. About the beginning of the winter of 1805-'6, Col. Burr returned from the Western country, and came to Philadelphia. He frequently, in conversation, mentioned to me certain speculations in western lands. These conversations were uninteresting to me; and I did not pay much attention to them. Col. Burr requested me to get the navy of the United States out of my head, as he had something in view, both honorable and profitable, which he wished to propose to me. I considered this as nothing more than a desire to get me interested in land speculations. These conversations were frequently repeated; and some time in the month of July, 1806, Col. Burr observed that he wished to see me unwedded from the navy of the United States, and not to think any more of those men at Washington. He observed that he wished to see or to make me (I do not recollect which) admiral; for he contemplated an expedition into Mexico, in the event of a war with Spain, which he thought inevitable. He asked me if the Havana could not be easily taken in the event of a war. I told him that it would require the co-operation of a naval force. Mr. Burr observed, that might be obtained. He pursued the inquiry as to Carthagena and La Vera Cruz; what personal knowledge I had of those places, and what would be the best mode of attacking them by sea and land. I gave my opinion very freely. Mr. Burr then asked me if I would take the command of a naval expedition. I asked him if the Executive of the United States was privy to or concerned in the project. He answered me, emphatically, that they were not. I asked him that question because the Executive had been charged with a knowledge of Miranda's expedition. I told Mr. Burr that I would have nothing to do with it; that Miranda's project had been intimated to me, and that I had declined any agency in those affairs. Mr. Burr observed, that in the event of a war he intended to establish an independent Government in Mexico; that Wilkinson, the army, and many officers of the navy, would join. I replied, that I could not see how any of the officers of the United States could join. He said that General Wilkinson had projected that expedition, and that he himself had matured it; that many greater men than Wilkinson were concerned, or would join; and thousands to the westward.

Mr. Hay. I beg you to refresh your memory. Do you recollect whether he said that General Wilkinson had seriously joined it?

Answer. I asked him if General Wilkinson had seriously engaged in such a scheme. He said that he had, and many greater men than Wilkinson.

Mr. Hay. I will ask you, sir, whether at that time you were in the service of the United States?

Answer. I was declared not to be.

Mr. Hay. I wish you to suppose that I do not mean to hurt your feelings by any question; but it is necessary to account to the jury for the application which was thus made to you by the accused. Did you not express some dissatisfaction at the treatment of the Government?

Answer. I certainly was hurt at it.

Mr. Burr asked me if I would not write to General Wilkinson, as he was about to despatch two couriers to him. I told him that I had no subject to write on, and declined writing. Mr. Burr observed that several officers would be pleased at being under my command. He spoke highly of a Lieutenant Jones, and asked me whether he had not sailed with me. I answered him that he had not; and that I could give no account of him, as I did not know that I ever had seen him. Mr. Burr observed that the expedition could not fail; that the Mexicans were ripe for revolt; and that he was incapable of any thing chimerical, or that could lead his friends into a dilemma. He showed me the draught of a periogue, such as plies between Powle's Hook and New York; asked my opinion as to the construction of boats, and whether those were adapted to the Mississippi river and the waters emptying into it. I gave my opinion that they were. He asked me whether I could get a naval constructor to make several copies of the draught. I spoke to a naval constructor, but he could not make the draughts as soon as Col. Burr wished, and the draught was returned to him. Mr. Burr told me he intended those boats for the conveyance of agricultural products to New Orleans, and, in the event of a war, for transports. I knew they were not calculated for transports by sea, nor were they calculated for carrying guns; but having determined not to have any thing to do with the Mexican project, I said very little about the boats. But I well recollect that, in subsequent conversations, about the latter end of the month of July, I told Col. Burr there would be no war with Spain. He seemed very sanguine that there would. He said, however, if he was disappointed in war, that he was about concluding a bargain for a large tract of land on the Washita; and that he intended to invite his friends to join him in the settlement of it. He said that in one year he would have one thousand families of respectable and fashionable people, and some of them men of property; and that it would be a charming society; that in two years there would be double the number; and that, being on the frontier, they would be ready to march immediately, whenever a war took place. I have endeavored to narrate the substance of these several conversations as nearly verbatim as I can recollect. I may not have done it exactly; but, as nearly as possible, I believe it is correct.

Mr. McRae. Do I understand you correctly when I suppose you said that Colonel Burr requested you to get the navy of the United States out of your head, and to think no more of those men at Washington?

Answer. Yes, correctly.

Mr. Hay. Did these conversations take place after the declarations that you were no longer in the service of the United States?

Answer. The whole of them.

Colonel Carrington, (one of the jury.)—Did they take place some time in July?

Answer. Yes.

Mr. Botts. Did Colonel Burr think there would be war, and you that there would not?

Answer. I observed to him there would be no war, though I saw great cause for it.

Mr. Hay. You say that those conversations took place after you were out of service; had you expressed your dissatisfaction at your being declared out of service?

Answer. Yes; frequently.

Question. I believe there were some publications on the subject?

Answer. There were.

Colonel Carrington. You stated that there were several conversations?

Answer. Yes; the first was on Colonel Burr's return; the second in July, 1806; and the third about the last of July.

Question. In 1805 were you in the service of the United States?

Answer. The misunderstanding between the Secretary of the Navy and myself took place in March, 1802.

Question. Your first conversations were about building bridges, settling lands, &c.?

Answer. Yes; when Colonel B. first returned from the westward.

Mr. McRae. He did not express to you his designs respecting the Washita land till he had discovered your aversion to the Mexican project?

Answer. He did not; early in the conversations between us, I had declined all agency in the Mexican project. The conversation about the Washita lands was the last; but he had previously spoken about speculations in Western lands generally.

Mr. Wirt. Did he say at the latter end of July that he was about concluding a bargain for the Washita land?

Answer. I think so; I cannot recollect distinctly the order of time, or the precise number of conversations; I have mentioned, as nearly as possible, those that did occur.

Mr. Hay. When he proposed to make you an admiral, did not the thought strike you how he was to accomplish this?

(Mr. Burr denied that Commodore Truxton had said that Mr. Burr had promised to make him an admiral.)

Commodore Truxton. Mr. Burr told me he wished to make or to see me one; I do not particularly recollect which was his expression.

Mr. Hay. Colonel Burr spoke of an attack upon the Spanish provinces by sea and land; how was the navy to be procured?

Answer. Colonel Burr said he intended to provide a formidable navy after he had completed the expedition, and had established an independent Government.

Mr. Hay. From what quarter of the world was the expedition by sea to go?

Answer. I do not know; I did not ask him where it was to go from.

Mr. Hay. Did you not understand that you were to command the expedition by sea?

Answer. He asked if I would command; I asked him if the President of the United States was privy to the project. He answered, emphatically, that he was not. I then declined, and asked no more questions about the expedition.

Mr. Baker. I understand you to say that the navy was to have been erected after the Government was established?

Answer. Yes; after speaking of establishing himself in Mexico, and creating an independent Government, he said he intended himself to provide a formidable navy, at the head of which, I understood, he wished me to be.

Mr. McRae. Did he not talk of a naval expedition against the Havana?

Answer. I told Colonel Burr that the Havana could not be taken without a naval force; he said that could be obtained.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. Did I not say I had never seen Lieutenant Jones?

Answer. I do not recollect that; you spoke highly of him.

Question. Do you not recollect I stated, if there was a war, that private enterprise and private expeditions would be proper and lawful?

(Mr. Hay objected to the question, because seemingly intended for the jury.)

Question. Did I say that many of the officers of the army and navy would join, or probably would join?

Answer. I think you said they would join.

Question. Was I not acquainted with your controversy with the Navy Department; had we not talked together for many years on the subject; did I not state to you that there was no intention to reinstate you; that you were duped by Smith and others; that they had no serious intentions of serving you; was not that the reason that I wished to unweave you from the navy?

Answer. You did state those facts.

Question. Do you not find that I was right? Answer. I know that.

Question. Did I not often talk to you about the settlement of lands? Answer. You did.

Question. Were we not intimate? Answer. Yes.

Question. Was there any reserve between us? Answer. None.

Question. Did you ever hear me say any thing about dismembering the Union, or seizing on New Orleans?

Answer. Never.

Question. Did I not state to you the advantages which would result from the establishment of an independent Government in Mexico, and the forming of a commercial connexion with this country?

Answer. Yes.

Question. You mentioned periogues; are they fit for any military purpose?

Answer. No; you stated that you intended them for the conveyance of agricultural products in time of peace, and, in war, for transports.

Question. Had you reason to doubt my intention to settle lands?

Answer. If there was no war, I took it for granted that such was your intention.

Question. If there had been a war, and the invasion of Mexico had obtained the sanction of Government, would you have joined me?

Answer. I would have got out of my bed at twelve o'clock at night to fight against England, France, or Spain, in case my Government had required my services.

Mr. Wirt. When Colonel Burr spoke of a commercial connexion with this country, did you understand it was founded on the idea of his establishing an independent Government in Mexico?

Answer. I so understood it.

Mr. Hay. Did the prisoner, during any of these conversations, speak of any commercial speculations in which he, individually, or any of his friends, had an interest?

Answer. He spoke of the settlement of Western lands, from which produce might be carried down the waters of the Mississippi.

Mr. McRae. Were the remarks which he made on your relation to the navy calculated to fill your bosom with resentment against the Government?

Answer. My bosom was already full enough, but certainly Mr. Burr spoke in concert with my feelings.

Mr. Hay. Could an expedition at sea be made as effectually against La Vera Cruz from any other port in the Western country as New Orleans?

Answer. New Orleans would be a proper place for preparing an armament, but no vessel of burden could sail from that place; the expedition might be carried on more conveniently from some port of the Atlantic States; but in the Western country there is no port better than New Orleans.

Mr. Parker, (one of the jury.)—Did you understand for what purpose the two couriers were sent by Colonel Burr to General Wilkinson?

Answer. I understood that there was an understanding between them about the Mexican project.

Mr. Martin. Are there not preparations now making in Philadelphia, in contemplation of a war with England?

Answer. In New York there are.

Mr. Burr. Is it not a common thing in England to make such preparations?

Answer: Yes, in expectation of a war.

Mr. McRae. And when they make preparations, they do it openly?

Answer. Yes; it is no secret.

Question. Have you heard any person spoken of as intended for the commander of the vessels building in New York?

Answer. No.

Mr. Botts. Can ships be built secretly? can they be built in a corner of a room?

Answer. No.

Evidence of Peter Taylor.

Mr. Hay. This witness will directly prove the connexion of Mr. Burr with Mr. Blannerhasset, and his connexion with the crime itself.

Peter Taylor. The first information I got upon this subject was from Mrs. Blannerhasset, when Mr. Blannerhasset and Mr. Alston were gone down the river. The people got much alarmed about this business, and Mrs. Blannerhasset sent me to Lexington after Mr. Blannerhasset, with a letter to prevent Colonel Burr from coming back with him to the island; I went through Chillicothe, but I did not find Mr. Blannerhasset there, and I then went on to Cincinnati; my orders were to call on Mr. John Smith; I called at Mr. Smith's store, where I saw his son; I asked if his father was at home; he said yes; I then informed him that I wished to speak to him; his son went and told him a man wanted to see him. When he came out, I inquired for Colonel Burr and Blannerhasset, to see whether he could give me any account of them; he allowed he knew nothing of either of them; that I must be mistaken; this was not the place; I said no, this was the right place—"Mr. John Smith, storekeeper, Cincinnati;" says I "do not you recollect a young man who came here some time ago for Colonel Burr's top coat;" (great coat!) I said—"Sir, I have lived with Mr. Blannerhasset for three years."

When Mr. Smith heard me talk so, he took me up stairs to talk with me. He wanted to know the news our way; I told him how the people had got alarmed; he wanted to know what was passing; I told him that, from the information I had got from Mr. Blannerhasset, the people were going to make a new settlement of lands; that was all I knew; he seemed surprised; he asked what was said about General Wilkinson; I said I knew nothing about it; he asked me if I would carry a letter from him to Blannerhasset; I told him I would carry any thing, so it was not too burdensome: so he sat down and wrote a letter. He asked whether I wished to drink, for he had chastised [charged] me not to go to any tavern, lest the people should be sifting me with their questions; I drank, and then he showed me a tavern, and told me to go to get my horse fed by the hostler, but not to go into the house; I asked him where I should find Colonel Burr and Blannerhasset; he said he expected they were at Lexington, at the house of a Mr. Jourdan; he gave me the letter, which I carried. When I got to Lexington, it was Saturday about one o'clock; Mr. Jourdan happened to be in the street and knew me; he said: "Peter, your old master is not in town;" he told me so before I asked him; but, he said, he expected him either that night or to-morrow early. He inquired what was the news in our parts, and I told him; I asked him what I was to do with my horse; he said that he was to be put at the livery stable; he then went up stairs to Colonel Burr, as I supposed; he came down and beckoned me in; he then went up stairs and showed me what room to go in; when I went into the room, there was Colonel Burr. Colonel Burr wanted to know what was the news in our parts; I began to tell him that my business was to prevent Colonel Burr from going back to the island.

Question. Did you not know Colonel Burr at that time?

Answer. I did not; he had been on the island three times, but I was sick and did not see him. When I told Colonel Burr that, says he "I am the very man involved in this piece of business, and you must tell me all you know;" I said, "if you come up our way, the people will shoot you." I told him it was my sincere opinion that it was not safe for him to come up our way; I told him that I had heard several declare that they had rather shoot him than let it alone; he seemed surprised, and wondered what the people had got in their heads; I told Colonel Burr what excuses I had made for him before; I told them he was going on a great land speculation, but the people said all that was a fib, and that he had something else in his head.

Then Colonel Burr asked me what letters I had: I said two—one was from Mrs. Blannerhasset, and the other from John Smith, of Cincinnati; the letter from John Smith he allowed was for him, and asked me if I was willing he should open it; I told him I supposed it made no difference between him and Blannerhasset, and he might, and handed it to him. He broke the seal open, and showed me that there was a letter inside for himself; he said, See, what I told you was right, and, after some talking, I asked him whether I was at liberty to go down stairs; I went down, and left the opened letter with him. I then went to Mr. Jourdan and asked him whether I was to stay at his house, or go to a tavern; he said I was to go a tavern, and he would pay for me. Mr. Jourdan wished me to go the next day to Millersburg after the saddle-bags left there by Mr. Blannerhasset; I went, and left Mrs. Blannerhasset's letter with Mr. Jourdan, expecting Blannerhasset to get there before me; I returned on Monday by one o'clock, and there Mr. Blannerhasset was come, and preparing to go home. We started, and got ten miles that night; we stopped at a tavern; I went to see after the horses, and he went into the house; there were people drinking in the house, who wanted to know his name; he told them his name was Tom Jones; he came out and told me the people in the house had asked, and he had told them his name was Tom Jones, and I must mind and make no mistake, but call him Jones too: so he passed by the name till he got to the Mud Licks. He then told me he was known there, and I must call him by his own name.

Question. When did these things happen?

Answer. All this was in October, 1806, I believe.

He then began, at every tavern that he came to, to inquire for young men—good orderly men—that would be conformable to order and discipline, and would find themselves in rifles and blankets; he allowed that Colonel Burr and he, and a few of his friends, had bought eight hundred thousand acres of land, and that they wanted young men to settle it; he said he would give any young man who would go down the river one hundred acres of land, plenty of grog and provisions while going down the river, and three months' provisions after they had got to the end; every young man was to carry his own rifle and blanket; I agreed to go myself, if I could carry my wife and family, but he said he must have further consultation upon that. As we rode together, I began to think, and asked him what kind of seed we should carry with us? He said we did not want any, we should find every thing where we were going.

Mr. Wirt. Of what occupation were you on the island? Answer. A gardener.

Mr. Wirt. I put this question that the jury might understand his last observation.

I urged that subject to him several times; at length he made a sudden stop and said: "Peter, between you and me, we are going to take Mexico, one of the finest and richest places in the whole world;" he said that Colonel Burr would be the King of Mexico, and that Mrs. Alston was to be the Queen of Mexico, whenever Colonel Burr died; he said that Colonel Burr had made fortunes for a great many in his lifetime, but nothing for himself, but now he was going to make something for himself; he said that he had a great many friends in the Spanish territory; two thousand Roman Catholic priests were enlisted in his corps; that those priests, and the societies which belonged to them, were a strong party; that the Spaniards, like the French, had got tired of their Government, and wanted to swap it; he told me that the British were also friends to this expedition; and that he was the very man who was to go to England on this piece of business for Colonel Burr; that he had been a friend to Colonel Burr in this business, and had assisted him more than any other man in America.

He asked me if I would not like to go; I said I should certainly like to see my friends there. I then asked him what was to become of the men who were going to settle the lands he talked about? Were they to stop at the Red River, or to go on? He said, You'll see how I'll fix them, when I get them far enough down the river. If they did not conform to order and discipline, he swore by God he'd stab them. I was astonished; I told him I was no soldier, and could not fight. He said it made no odds, he did not want me to fight; he wanted me to go and live with Mrs. Blannerhasset and the children, either at Natchez or some other place, while he went on the expedition. I talked to him again, and told him the people had got it into their heads that he wanted to divide the Union. He said Colonel Burr and he could not do it themselves. All they could do was to tell the people the consequence of it. He said the people there paid the Government upwards of $400,000 a year, and never received any benefit from it. He allowed it would be a very fine thing if they could keep that money among themselves, and make locks, and build bridges, and cut roads. About two weeks after I got home, he sent me to Dr. Bennett's of Mason county, with a letter. He wanted to know if Dr. Bennett wouldn't sell him the arms belonging to the militia, if he could sell them and keep himself out of danger; if he could, he'd give him a draught upon his friend in Kentucky for payment; if he could not sell them without putting himself in a hobble, he must send him word where they were kept, and he would come and take them away in the night. I was not to give the letter to Dr. Bennett until the doctor promised to deliver it back for me to burn it, for Mr. Blannerhasset told me to do so, and said it contained high treason. I did as he had told me, and burnt it. The doctor said he was unacquainted with the plot, and could not join in it.

Mr. Hay. When did the boats leave the island?

Answer. It was intended to sail on the 6th of December; but they did not come till 10th, (Sunday,) and they sailed on the Wednesday night following.

Question. How many boats were there? Answer. Four.

Question. How many men from the boats came ashore? Answer. About thirty.

Question. What did the men do who did not belong to the boats?

Answer. Some were packing meat, and some were packing other things.

Mr. McRae. Who went off on Wednesday night?

Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset and Mr. Tyler, and the whole of the party.

Question. At what time of the night? Answer. About one o'clock.

Question. Did all that went down to the island go away?

Answer. All but one, who was sick.

Mr. Hay. Had they any guns?

Answer. Some of them had. Some of the people went a shooting, but I do not know how many there were.

Mr. J. M. Sheppard, (a jurymen.) What kind of guns—rifles or muskets?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. Were there any pistols? Answer. I saw none but Blannerhasset's.

Question. Was there any powder or lead?

Answer. Both: I saw some powder in a long small barrel like a churn, but I was so employed that I could not notice particularly. Some of the men were engaged in running bullets, but I do not know how many.

Mr. McRae. Why did they leave the island at that hour of the night?

Answer. Because they were informed that the Kanawha militia were coming down there.

Question. Did you carry some boxes to the boats?

Answer. I carried a half bushel of candles and some brandy; several boxes were carried, and a great many things of which I knew nothing.

Mr. Hay. Were you on the island when they went off?

Answer. Yes: they held a council at the foot of the pier, to determine which was the best way to go. Mr. Blannerhasset said, if he went in a canoe, he would be an easy prey. I said to them, "best stick together." And so they determined to stick together. They went off in great haste.

Question. Why did they go in a body? Answer. I suppose for security.

Cross-questioned.

Mr. Wickham. You saw General Tupper and Mr. Woodbridge that night?

Answer. Yes; as I went from the boats to the house.

Question. Was Colonel Burr there? Answer. No, I did not see him.

Question. Did you understand whether he was in that part of the country at that time?

Answer. I understood not.

Substance of the evidence of Peter Taylor, on the 9th of September, upon the trial for a misdemeanor.

Mr. Hay then called up Peter Taylor, (H. Blannerhasset's gardener.) He stated that there were about thirty of the party who landed on the island; that Comfort Tyler, as he had understood, had had the direction of them before they arrived there; that Blannerhasset and Love were the only persons whom he recollected that they had taken with them from the island; that he had seen a few arms, and also powder, bullets, and provisions; he recited his interview with Doctor Bennett, (whom Mr. Hay stated had departed from Richmond, in spite of all his admonitions;) he repeated, in the most consistent manner, Blannerhasset's communications to him, how they were going to take Mexico, and make Burr its king, and his daughter to be his successor; as also his conversation with Aaron Burr at Lexington.

He stated that he saw no appearance of any preparations to settle land; that Blannerhasset, it was true, had originally held out the gift of a certain number of acres to every lively and orderly young man who would accompany him without their families or women, but that he afterwards had avowed the capture of Mexico as the object of these preparations.

TUESDAY, September 15.

Peter Taylor was then interrogated about the corn purchased by Blannerhasset on the island. He said that this corn was kiln-dried on the island, then carried to the mills on the Muskingum and on the Kanawha; that the meal was brought back to the island, but he was not certain whether any had been carried away by Blannerhasset's party.

HENRICO COUNTY, to wit:

This day General John Morgan, of Washington county, in the State of Pennsylvania, personally appeared before me, Thomas H. Prosser, a justice of the peace for the county of Henrico aforesaid, and made oath, that the annexed statement of his evidence, as given in the circuit court of the United States for the fifth circuit and Virginia district, upon an indictment in the case of the United States against Aaron Burr for treason, which is contained in the third and fourth columns of the second page of "The Virginia Gazette, and General Advertiser," No. 1491, of Vol. XXI, is correctly printed, except as to the variations hereafter mentioned, viz: In the twelfth line from the bottom of the third column and second page, instead of the word "things," read "subjects." In the eighth line of the same column and page from the bottom, after the word "fellows," insert "under arms, or embodied."

In the twenty-ninth line from the top of the fourth column, and second page, between the words "Bradford" and "lived," insert "formerly."

In the sixty-ninth line from the top of the same column and page, after the word "rent," read "interview."

In the seventy-seventh line from the top of the same column and page, after the word "recollect," add "my impression was, that he thought him a fine fellow."

In the ninetieth line of the same column and page, from the top, for "return," read "returned."

In the one hundred and tenth line from the top of the same column and page, instead of "T. E." insert "Thomas B. Hulings."

The said General John Morgan also made oath, that his evidence, stated in the same paper, No. 1492, Vol. XXI, in the second column and second page, is correctly printed with the following variation, viz:

In the forty-eighth and forty-seventh lines from the bottom, instead of "I'll be damned, sir, if you could take the little town of Cannonsburg," read "By God, sir, you cannot take our little town of Cannonsburg."

And that the evidence contained in the said two papers, thus corrected, contained the truth.

JOHN MORGAN.

Evidence of General John Morgan.

WEDNESDAY, August 19.

Some time in August last, about this time twelve months, my father put a letter into my hands, signed Aaron Burr, in which he said that himself and his friend, Colonel Dupiester, would dine with him the following day. My father requested me and my brother to go and meet Colonel Burr, which we did, about seven miles distant. After a few words of general conversation, Colonel Burr observed to me, that the Union could not possibly last, and that a separation of the States must ensue in four or five years, as a natural consequence. Colonel Burr made many inquiries of me, relative to the county of Washington; particularly to the state of its militia; the discipline, arms, accoutrements, and the character of its officers. These conversations continued some time, besides other subjects which I cannot recollect, because I did not expect to be called upon in this way. After travelling some miles we met one of my workmen, a likely young man. Colonel Burr said he wished he had ten thousand such fellows under arms or embodied. At my father's table, during dinner, Colonel Burr again observed that the separation of the Union must take place inevitably, in less than five years. (Shall I give the answers that were made? Mr. Wirt. Perhaps it may serve to connect your narrative better.) I recollect that it was my father who answered him, God forbid! Colonel Burr, in the course of conversation, observed, that, with two or three hundred men, he could drive the President and Congress into the Potomac; and with four or five hundred men he could take possession of the city of New York. After dinner, he walked with me to my brother's mill, and, in course of the walk, spoke of war and military men; asked me if either of my brothers had a military turn. On our return, after I had introduced him to my brother, Colonel Burr said he wished he could see him at the head of a company of grenadiers; he was a fine, stout looking fellow. These circumstances induced me to speak to my father. I warned him to beware of Colonel Burr; told him that in the course of that night Colonel Burr would seek an interview with him, and that I suspected something was going on, I knew not what. The next morning I rode with Colonel Burr to the town of Washington, about nine or ten miles. We had much conversation, principally on military affairs and on the state of the militia. Colonel Burr urged the necessity of attending to military discipline. He told me, that in New York, the exertions of a single person (Mr. Swartvout) had produced a great effect. He asked me if I thought I could raise a regiment in Washington county, or whether I could raise one with more facility in New Jersey. [Mr. Wirt. You have lived in New Jersey? - Answer. Yes.] At Washington we took a walk, Colonel Burr, Colonel Dupiester, and myself, down the town; and I pointed out to him the house where Mr. Bradford formerly lived, who had been at the head of the western insurrection. He inquired about Mr. Bradford. He was at Baton Rouge, as I believed. I told him his son was in town, and Colonel Burr expressed a wish to see him. Colonel Burr mentioned to me that he had met with several who had been engaged in the western insurrection; and particularly a major in the Northwestern Territory (whose name I do not recollect,) who had told him, that if he was ever engaged in a similar business, he pledged himself it should not end without bloodshed. He said that he was a fine fellow. It was on these circumstances that I advised my father to apprise the President of the United States that something was going forward.

Question by the prosecution.

Mr. Hay. When Colonel Burr left that part of the country, what course did he take?

Answer. I knew he went to the town of Washington, and from there to Wheeling, as I supposed.

Mr. Wirt. Were the subjects of a separation of the Union and military matters predominant in the conversations of Colonel Burr?

Answer. I have stated them as they occurred; our conversations were general and mixed, but these seemed to be the leading topics.

Mr. Wirt. Were the conversations ever long on either of these subjects?

Answer. Never long; they chiefly occurred in a rapid ride.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect any opinion expressed by the accused concerning Bradford's capacity for such an undertaking as the western insurrection?

Answer. I recollect it very well; He said that Bradford was very incompetent to an enterprise of that kind; and that in such a case there ought to be the utmost confidence in the leader.

Mr. Parker, (one of the jury.) Which of the Bradfords did he mean, the elder or the younger?

Answer. The elder; he was speaking of Bradford who headed the western insurrection.

Mr. McRae. Did he name any particular person as qualified for such an enterprise? Answer. No.

Mr. Wirt. At what time in the month of August was this interview?

Answer. I think between the 20th and 25th.

Mr. Parker, (one of the jury.) Did Colonel Burr make any further remark when he spoke of the major who said that if he were engaged in another insurrection it should not end without bloodshed?

Answer. No: he spoke of him as a fine fellow.

Question by same. Did he approve or condemn the sentiment?

Answer. I do not recollect; my impression was, that he thought him a fine fellow.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. You spoke of a letter from me to your father; do you know whether he had written me, some time before, a letter of invitation to his house?

Answer. Yes: he had written about a year before to you at Pittsburg; that letter is yet unopened in my brother Tom's bureau; you had left that place before the letter arrived, and he did not know of your being in the Western country on your last visit till he received your note.

Question. Did your father communicate to you our night's conversation? Answer. Yes.

Question. Before we rode? Answer. No: not till I returned from Washington.

Question. Do you recollect of my having made several inquiries also about the seminaries of learning, and of one that was projected in your neighborhood, and of my suggesting the necessity of encouraging it?

Answer. You spoke much, too, on that subject.

Question. Was there any thing serious in my conversation about the major?

Answer. Nothing particularly serious; you mentioned the incident.

Question. Did I seem to know any thing of Bradford before you told me?

Answer. You seemed to know the circumstances of the Western insurrection very well.

Question. Did you not tell me that Bradford was a noisy sort of a demagogue?

Answer. I did not: I have no objections to give my opinion of Mr. Bradford; I mentioned him to you as a mere lawyer.

Question. Did I seem to know that Bradford lived at Pittsburg before you mentioned it, and pointed out his house?

Answer. You did not seem to know it.

Question. Who were at dinner at your father's?

Answer. My father, mother, wife, sister, Colonel Dupiestre, Mr. T. Hulings, and my brother Tom.

General Morgan was then called in, at the request of the prisoner.

Mr. Burr. What was the situation of your father about the time of my visit?

Answer. He had lately had a fall, which had done him considerable injury.

Question. I mean as to his capacity. Did you not make apology to Judge Thilman for the state of his mind?

Answer. I did tell Judge Thilman that my father was old and infirm, and, like other old men, he told long stories, and was apt to forget his repetitions.

Mr. McRae. Did Colonel Burr draw a comparison between the Eastern and Western people? or what was his reply when you said you would be damned if the little town of Cannonsburg could be taken by so small a force?—What was the prisoner's reply to your exclamation?

Answer. When Colonel Burr said that with two hundred men he could drive the President and Congress into the Potomac, I must confess that I felt myself hurt, and replied, with some warmth, "I'll be damned, sir, if you could take the little town of Cannonsburg with that force." Colonel Burr replied, "Confine yourself to this side of the mountain, and it is another thing; or you are right."

Mr. Burr. Do you recollect that the probability of a Spanish war was mentioned?

Answer. It was a general subject of conversation.

HENRICO COUNTY, State of Virginia, to wit:

This 25th day of September, 1807, Colonel George Morgan, of Morgansey, in the county of Washington and State of Pennsylvania, appeared before me, Thomas H. Prosser, a justice of the peace for the county of Henrico aforesaid, and made oath that the annexed statement of his evidence, as given in the circuit court of the United States for the fifth circuit and Virginia district, upon an indictment in the case of the United States against Aaron Burr for treason, which is contained in the first and second columns of the second page of the Virginia Gazette and General Advertiser, No. 1,492 of Volume XXI., is as correctly printed as the said Morgan can now recollect, except as to the variations hereinafter mentioned: viz: In the 4th line of the said testimony, instead of "nephews," read "cousins" by the name "Pollock" of North Carolina, then at Princeton College, and a third by the name of "Edwards," the son of Pierpont Edwards, then of Connecticut. In the 28th line, dele "branded to me" and insert "brought." In the second line above the cross-examinations, dele the words "these gentlemen wrote a joint," and insert "wrote, or said they would write, as I requested, to the President," or perhaps to the Secretary of State.

And that the evidence contained in the said paper, thus corrected, contains the truth.

GEORGE MORGAN.

Given under my hand this twenty-fifth day of September, 1807.

THOMAS H. PROSSER.

Cut out from a Pittsburg newspaper, called the Commonwealth, dated August 27th, 1806.

The Hon. Aaron Burr was in this town incog. for several days previous to Friday last, when he departed, in company with a French or Spanish gentleman, his companion, for Kentucky. Our fellow-citizens, generally, feel anxious to know the object of Mr. Burr's journey, at this time; and as he was perfectly taciturn during his stay, many conjectures are afloat. We hope the Western editors will give a good account of him.

DEAR SIR:

PITTSBURG, August 21, 1806.

Being on my way to Lexington, I learn, with great satisfaction, that a road not very circuitous will take me near your door. I avail myself of the opportunity of one of my attendants, who is going forward with my baggage, to offer compliments and salutations, and to say that if this shall find you at home, I will have the pleasure of dining with you to-morrow and will take the liberty of introducing my friend and fellow-traveller Colonel Dupiester. We shall leave this after breakfast, and be with you before two.

Accept assurances of the great respect and consideration with which I am, your obedient,

A. BURR.

I beg to be recalled to the recollection of Mrs. M. and your son.

Evidence of Col. George Morgan.

WEDNESDAY, August 19.

Col. MORGAN, (the father of the last witness.) There has been a long acquaintance between Col. Burr and myself. He had introduced to my notice two of his nephews, by the name of ———, and a third by the name of Edwards, Pierpont Edwards. I had received many civilities from Col. Burr in New York, after these things had passed; from which I had formed such an attachment to him, that I never should have forgotten it, had not this late business taken place. About three years ago Col. Burr was under a considerable, and as I thought unjust persecution. I had then a younger son, (who is now here,) studying law at Pittsburg. I wished to make him known to Col. Burr, and wrote to invite Col. Burr to Morgansey; particularly on account of his persecution; but, in all probability, would have done so without. I enclosed the letter to my son at Pittsburg. Col. Burr, however, had left Pittsburg, before my letter reached it, and it now remains unopened in my son's scrutoire at Pittsburg. On the 24th last August I received a letter from Col. Burr, dated at Pittsburg, informing me that he should dine with me the next day. [Here Mr. Hay handed the letter to Col. M., who said the letter was dated on the 21st, and that he had not for some time seen it, as he had transmitted it to the President of the United States.] This letter was handed to me by a man, who called himself Count Willie. Col. Burr mentioned he had sent it by one of his attendants. I believe my son did not call on me that evening; but the next morning I informed him, if I was able I should certainly go and meet Col. Burr; and I requested him and his brother to do it, with a letter of introduction explanatory of their names and their intention. What conversation took place between him and my son I shall not state.

When Col. Burr and myself walked out together, he mentioned that Col. Dupiester was one of the first military characters of the age. I shall pass over the conversation and incidents during dinner. After dinner I spoke of our fine country; I observed, that when I first went there, there was not a single family between the Allegany mountain and the Ohio; and that by and by we should have Congress sitting in this neighborhood, or at Pittsburg. We are allowed to sport these things over a glass of wine; but I have no doubt that it will be the case. "No, never," said Col. Burr; "for in less than five years you will be totally divided from the Atlantic States." The colonel entered into some arguments to prove why it would and should be so. The first reason was, the produce of the sale of the Western lands being carried to the Atlantic States, and that the people to the West should not be tributary to them. He said that our taxes were heavy; and demanded, why we should pay them to the Atlantic parts of the country? By this time, I took an opportunity to observe, God forbid that any such change should take place, at least in my time! This observation terminated the conversations as to that particular point. Next, Col. Burr spoke of the weakness and imbecility of the Federal Government. [Mr. Wirt. Who started that subject? Answer. Col. Burr, as one of the reasons for a division.] I do not recollect saying any thing on the subject; but it struck my mind very forcibly that that all was not right. He said, with two hundred men he could drive Congress, with the President at its head, into the river Potomac; or that it might be done; and he said, with five hundred men he could take possession of New York. What struck me was, that he appealed to Col. Dupiester if it could not be done, and he bowed assent. There was a reply made to this, by one of my sons, that he would be damned if he could take our little town of Cannonsburg with that force. Some short time after this, Col. Burr went out from the dining room to the passage, and, as he went out, he made a motion to my son Thomas, who did not perceive it, and no person could interpret what it meant; however, as he went out, he beckoned to him. They then walked out together, and had some conversation; what that conversation was, I shall leave to my son himself to tell. Soon after, a walk was proposed by some of the company to my son's mill. The observations made by the ladies as to the probable designs of Col. Burr, it is unnecessary to mention; but our women are all democrats. When they returned, my son told me to be cautious, and said, "You may depend on it, Col. Burr will this night open himself to you; he wants Tom to go with him." After the usual conversation, Col. Burr went up stairs, and, as I thought, to go to bed. My daughters went to bed. My wife was reading to me, as is usual when the family have retired. About 11 o'clock, and when I thought he had been asleep an hour, she told me that Col. Burr was coming down, and, as she had heard my son's conversation, she added, "Now you'll have it." Col. Burr came down with a candle in his hand; Mrs. Morgan immediately retired. The colonel took his seat by me; he drew from his pocket a book, which looked like a memorandum book. After looking in it some time, he asked me if I knew a Mr. Vigo, a Spaniard, at Vincennes. I replied, yes; I knew him, I had reasons to know him; one was, that I had reason to believe that he was deeply involved in the British conspiracy in '88, as I supposed; the object of which was to separate the States, and which Gen. Nevill and myself had assisted to suppress. I called it a nefarious scheme to aim at the division of the States; I was careful to put great emphasis on the word nefarious. Col. Burr, finding what kind of man he had to deal with, suddenly stopped, thrust into his pocket the book which I saw had blank leaves in it, and retired to bed. I believe I was pretty well understood. The next morning Col. Burr and Col. Dupiester went off before breakfast, without my expecting it, in company with my son; and from that time to this I have not seen him but in this place. My son, on his return, gave it as his opinion (his mother and I having already made up ours) that I should apprise the President of our impressions, and point out a mode by which Col. Burr might be followed step by step. [Mr. McRae. In your conversation at the table, after your son had said he would be damned if your little town of Cannonsburg could be taken with such a force, do you recollect that the prisoner drew any comparison between the Eastern and Western people? Answer. Yes, perfectly; he said, "keep yourself on this side of the mountain, and you'll never be disturbed;" by which I understood him to mean disunion.] There is one more circumstance which I must state to the court. The Sunday after, the judge of our circuit court dined with me. I requested him to mention the circumstances to Gen. Nevill, and invited him the following Sunday to dinner, with Judges Thilman and Roberts, for I had business of the first importance to communicate. They did not dine with me on that day, but they did on the following Sunday. These gentlemen wrote a joint letter to the President, informing him of my communications to them.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. Are you certain that I came down in the night?

Answer. Yes. Mrs. Morgan said, Col. Burr is coming down—now, you'll have it.

Question. What sort of a book was the one I had in my hand? Was it bound?

Answer. It was not so large as this; I do not recollect whether it was bound, as it would not be very polite in me to take particular notice of such things, when gentlemen are at my own house.

Question. When you spoke of a nefarious plan, to what transaction did you allude?

Answer. To Vigo's plan, which I conceived was intended to dissever the Union.

Question. Did the ladies take any part in the conversation at dinner? Answer. They felt it.

Question. Who were present when Judge Thilman saw you?

Answer. Gen. Nevill and Judge Roberts.

Question. Was there any other from Pittsburg? Answer. None.

Question. Your conversation was then jocular about the moving of Congress to Pittsburg?

Answer. I spoke in a jocular manner; but I was seriously of that opinion, and am so still.

Question. Did not some person at table say a movement of that kind would produce a separation of the Union?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Did you not once live on the Mississippi?

Answer. I did, with the approbation of my country.

Question. Where was it? Answer. At New Madrid.

Question. On which side of the Mississippi? Answer. The west.

Question. In the Spanish territories?

Answer. With the approbation of the Spanish Government.

Question. How long did you live there?

Answer. About forty days. I went from that place to New Orleans, where I detected a British spy.

Question. In what year? Answer. In '88.

Evidence of Jacob Allbright.

WEDNESDAY, August 19.

Mr. Hay. Our object is to prove by his testimony, the actual assemblage of men on Blannerhasset's island. It goes, of course, to prove directly the overt act.

JACOB ALLBRIGHT. The first I knew of this business was, I was hired on the island to help to build a kiln for drying corn; and, after working some time, Mrs. Blannerhasset told me that Mr. Blannerhasset and Colonel Burr were going to lay in provisions for an army for a year. I went to the mill where I carried the corn to be ground after it had been dried. I worked four weeks on that business in the island; last fall, (or in September,) after Blannerhasset had come home—he had been promising me money for some time; I stepped up to him; he had no money at the time, but would pay me soon. Says he “Mr. Allbright, you are a Dutchman.” But he asked me first and foremost, whether I would not join with him, and go down the river. I told him I did not know what they were upon; and he said “Mr. Allbright, we are going to settle a new country;” and I gave him an answer, that I would not like to leave my family; he said he did not want any families to go along with him; then he said to me “You are a Dutchman, and a common man; and as the Dutch are apt to be scared by high men, if you'll go to New Lancaster, where the Dutch live, and get me twenty or thirty men to go with us, I will give you as many dollars.” I went home then, and gave him no answer upon that. In a few days after, a number of boats came and landed at the island; the snow was about three inches deep, and I went out a hunting; I was on the Ohio side; I met two men; I knew they belonged to the boats, but I wanted to find out; and they asked me whether I had not given my consent to go along with Blannerhasset down the river. As we were talking together, they named themselves Colonel Burr's men, belonging to the boats landed at the island. When they asked me whether I had not consented to go down with Blannerhasset, I put a question to them; I told them I did not know what they were about; and one of the gentlemen told me they were going to take a silver mine from the Spanish. I asked the gentlemen whether they would not allow that this would raise a war with America; they replied no, and said that as there were but a few of them, if they went with a good army, they would give it up, and nothing more would be said about it. I had all this conversation with two of the men; these men showed me what fine rifles they had; then I went to the island, and Blannerhasset paid me off in Kentucky notes; people, however, did not like these notes, and I went over to Virginia to get them changed; I got two of the notes changed, and one, a ten dollar note, was returned on my hands. I went to the island again the day the proclamation came out; but before I went to Blannerhasset's house, I heard he was not at home, but at Marietta; I went to the Virginia side, where I met three other men belonging to the boats with three complete rifles; they made a call upon me to take them to the island in my canoe, and I excepted to it, but afterwards I carried over the third man, who stood close by my canoe when I came down to it. After being some time on the island, I went down to the four boats; Blannerhasset was not at home yet, and I saw some of the boat people shooting at a mark; they had a fire between the bank and the boats; I went up to the house, and Blannerhasset came home; he seemed very much scared; one of the men came up to ask him for something, and he told him “Don't trouble me, I have trouble enough already.” He went up to his chamber, and I saw no more of him; I asked an old gentleman to go up to his chamber and change my note for silver; he did go and brought me silver. By and by I heard that they were going to start that night; thinks I “I'll see the end of it.” This was the night of the very day that Blannerhasset got back from Marietta; he got back before night; when night came on, I was among the men, and also in the kitchen, and saw the boatmen running bullets. One of them spoke out to the others, “Boys, let's every one of us mould as many bullets as we can fire twelve rounds.” After that, I saw no more till after twelve o'clock at night; then Blannerhasset came down from the chamber and called up some of his servants; he had four or five trunks; there were not trusty hands enough to carry them to the boats, and some person called after my name, and asked me to help them; and I carried one of the trunks and moved along with them; when we got down, some person, I don't particularly know, but think it was Blannerhasset himself, asked me to stand by the trunks till they were put in the boats. When the last of them went off, I saw men standing in a circle on the shore; I went up to them; perhaps they were five or six rods from the boats. The first thing I heard was, their laying plans how Blannerhasset and Comfort Tyler should get safe by Gallipolis; one Nahum Bent was called forward, and, when he came, Blannerhasset asked him whether he had not two smart horses; N. Bent answered no, he had but one; then Blannerhasset told him to go to Captain Dennie and get his sorrel horse; and N. Bent told him that the sorrel horse had no shoes on; and Blannerhasset said the roads were soft and would not hurt the horse. Blannerhasset told N. Bent to meet him and C. Tyler with the horses somewhere about Gallipolis; Bent inquired how he was to find him out; should he inquire for him? “No.”

"Have you no friends there?" "No." Mrs. Blannerhasset then came forward, and she told Blannerhasset and C. Tyler that they must take a canoe and get into it before they got to Gallipolis, and fall down the stream of the Ohio, for nobody would mind two people going down the stream; she said she would pay for the canoe; N. Bent was told to meet them above Gallipolis about daybreak, and then they might go round Gallipolis. Then a man by the name of Tupper laid hands upon Blannerhasset, and said, "Your body is in my hand, in the name of the commonwealth," or such a word as that. As quick as Tupper made that motion, there were seven or eight muzzles levelled at him. Tupper looked about him, and said, "Gentlemen, I hope you will not do the like." A man next to me, about two yards off, who had a shot gun said, "I'd as leave as not." Tupper then changed his speech, and said he wished him luck, and safe down the river. Tupper before told Blannerhasset he should stay and stand his trial; but Blannerhasset said no; the people in the neighborhood were coming down next day to take him, and he would go. Next day after I saw the Wood county militia going down. The people went off in the boats that night between twelve and one o'clock.

Question. All?

Answer. All but one, who was a doctor. All had some kind of arms.

Question. How many were there, in all?

Answer. About twenty or thirty, in all, to the best of my knowledge, but I did not count them. All the men, however, were not on shore; some were in the boats; every man I saw had arms of some sort.

Question. At what time of the year was this?

Answer. I do not recollect the particular time; I recollect the year, but not the month.

Answer. I do not recollect; I know not the month, only the year; it was last fall.

Question. Does he not belong to the State of Ohio? Answer. Yes.

Question. When did you first know him? Answer. Last fall.

Mr. Burr then asked the clerk for the statement which he had taken of Allbright's testimony, when it was submitted to the court on a former occasion, on the motion for holding Colonel Burr to higher bail. The clerk handed him the copy, and the prisoner proceeded with the examination:

You said before, that the men who raised their muskets against General Tupper were not in earnest?

Answer. That was a piece of my opinion. I did not know whether they were in earnest; as there was no quarrel among them, and no firing afterwards.

Mr. Burr. I beg the court to call on the prosecution for the deposition of this witness, taken before John G. Jackson.

Mr. Hay. Can gentlemen, when they please, thrust their hands into my portfolio?

Chief Justice was not satisfied that the court had a right to call for the affidavit.

Mr. Wickham said it was obvious that there were certain suspicions attached to the credibility of the witness; and that it was their desire to compare his present testimony with his former affidavit.

Mr. Hay objected that Mr. Jackson might not have taken down the testimony of the witness in his language, but couched it in his own; hence there might be an apparent variation between the present evidence and the affidavit. Besides, the witness might not have recollected a great many circumstances at that moment, which have subsequently occurred to his mind since he was set to thinking upon them.

Mr. Burr. We have a right to coerce this paper; if gentlemen will not surrender it, I may at all events avail myself of their refusal. My object is to prove such a diversity between the statements of the witness at different times, as may destroy all faith in his recollections.

Mr. Hay. Then, sir, although I might retain this paper, the gentlemen are welcome to make all the use of it they can; take it. [Mr. Hay thereupon delivered them the paper; but no use was afterwards made of it.]

Mr. Burr then proceeded. Did you say that all in the circle had arms? Answer. All that I saw.

Question. How many were there in the circle? Answer. I did not count.

Question. What kind of guns had they? Answer. Rifles and shot guns.

Question. Did you see any guns with bayonets? Answer. I saw none.

Question. When did you see most arms, in the day or in the night?

Answer. I saw more of them in the day; but it was in the night that I saw most arms in their hands.

Mr. Parker, (a juror.) Why did you think that most of them had arms?

Answer. Because I was with them almost all night; in the day I saw some of them shooting at marks; and I saw other arms at that time lying upon the beach. From the evening, until they started, I think I saw arms enough to arm all the men who were there.

Mr. Wickham. Did you see them all with arms at once? Answer. No.

Question. Did you know the men who had arms? Answer. No.

Question. How, then, are you certain that you did not see the same arms at different times in the hands of different persons?

Answer. I don't know, certainly.

Mr. Burr. If gentlemen have now done with the witnesses as to the overt act, or when they have done, I will thank them to inform us; for then we shall have some considerations to offer to the court.

Mr. Hay. We have other additional testimony to offer on this very point.

Examination of William Love.

Mr. Hay. Were you on Blannerhasset's island?

Answer. Yes: but not there at the time when Colonel Tyler's boats arrived there; I was then at Marietta; and it was on Sunday that I went down in a skiff with two barrels of salt.

Question. How many boats were at the island? Answer. Four.

Question. How many men?

Answer. I cannot tell you; but I suppose about twenty or twenty-five, belonging to Col. Tyler's boats.

Question. Did you see any arms?

Answer. I saw the men had rifles; I know that Mr. Blannerhasset took away with him two blunderbusses, one pair of horse pistols, a pair of pocket pistols, and a dirk; some fuses were put in the boat, but not more than three or four.

Question. And what arms had Tyler's men?

Answer. Pistols, dirks, and rifles they brought there; but not all were armed with rifles; I know not whether they were armed with different things. Being Mr. Blannerhasset's servant, (that is, his groom,) I went down the river with him.

Question. Did you see Taylor and Allbright there?

Answer. I knew Peter Taylor very well, and I saw Allbright; I saw Mr. Woodbridge too.

Question. What time did you set sail?

Answer. We were the last to embark, and we set off between 12 and 1 o'clock; we parted with General Tupper in the greatest friendship.

Question. Did you see the prisoner on the island?

Answer. I never saw Colonel Burr on the island; I first saw him at Natchez, about two and a half years ago.

Question. What took place after you left the island?

Answer. That night was very cold; the next morning we stopped and made fires. Mr. Blannerhasset and Colonel Tyler went ashore and called the company together; and the best I could make out was, that the Governor of Ohio had issued State warrants against Mr. Blannerhasset and Tyler; and that they wanted to make their escape as fast as possible. I went down with the party to Bayou Pierre, where—

Mr. Burr expressed a wish that the attention of the witness should be at present confined to the transactions on the island.

Mr. Martin. Gentlemen had better confine themselves to facts within the district of Virginia. When they travel beyond the district, we shall have some important questions to bring forward; we shall object to the production of such evidence.

Mr. Hay acquiesced, for the present, in this arrangement.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. Were not some of Mr. Blannerhasset's clothes put up in the boats? Answer. Yes.

Question. Were not his books put up in boxes and trunks? Answer. None, that ever I saw.

Question. How long had you lived with Mr. Blannerhasset? Answer. Ten or twelve days.

Question. How many guns had the party?

Answer. I do not know; a great many of the men went out a hunting.

Question. Did you see any thing like military appearance?

Answer. The men were in a state of preparation to defend themselves, because they expected people from the mouth of Kanawha to attack Blannerhasset and the island. And, to the best of my opinion, they did not mean to be killed without some return of the shot. It was said at Marietta that the people of Kanawha were to attack him; and I suppose they would have done the best to resist. I should be sorry if a man slapped me on my face without returning the blow.

Question. Was there no disturbance among the party on the island?

Answer. None: I did not part with my friends in England more comfortably than in parting with the people on the island.

Mr. Parker, (a juror.) Did you ever see all the men with arms?

Answer. I cannot say. When I got to the mouth of Cumberland river, I saw a chest of arms opened.

Mr. Burr. Were any chests of arms put into the boats at the island?

Answer. Not that I saw. They might have been put on board without my seeing them. Many things were put into the boats before I got in.

Mr. McRae. Was the chest which you saw opened at the mouth of Cumberland the same as those that you saw go from the island? Answer. No.

Question. What did you think of this business?

Answer. I understood the object of the expedition was to settle the Washita lands.

Mr. Hay. Were the persons who went from the island young active men? Answer. Yes.

Mr. Burr. What kind of looking men were they?

Answer. They looked like gentlemen, such as live upon their own property.

Question. Did they look like men used to work? Answer. They did not.

The witness added that Mrs. Blannerhasset was at the boats when they started, and that the night was rainy and freezing.

FRIDAY, September 18.

Mr. Hay. Did you not go down with the boats?

Answer. I went down from Mr. Blannerhasset's island; I considered myself as his servant.

Question. Did you see any boxes of arms? Answer. I saw one chest in Mr. Floyd's boat.

Question. How many men went from Blannerhasset's island? Answer. About twenty-five.

Question. Did any more men join you on the way? Answer. None.

Question. Were there any other boats at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. Some, but not belonging to our party.

Question. Did any men join you before you got there? Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset did.

Question. How many boats went from the mouth of Cumberland river?

Answer. I do not recollect how many.

Question. Were there ten—were there six? Answer. There were more than six altogether.

Question. Did no one join you at the mouth of Cumberland but Col. Burr? Answer. Yes, some more.

Question. Who were in the other boats?

Answer. Mr. Floyd had joined us with three boats at the falls of the Ohio: one was loaded with provisions, and the rest had provisions likewise.

Question. How many men were in these boats? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Were there twenty? Answer. There were about eight.

Question. How many boats were there in all?

Answer. There were four of Colonel Tyler's; two of Colonel Burr's, from Nashville; one of Mr. Ellis's, and two of Mr. Floyd's, who joined at the falls of Ohio; and Captain Dean's boat, called the commissary boat; and one small boat of Mr. Blannerhasset's.

Mr. Hay. Tell me what you know about the arms; and recollect what you said before on this subject. [Counsel for the accused objected to this mode of interrogation.] How many chests of arms did you see at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. I saw one chest and a box with rifles; there were several other chests like that one; but whether they contained Mr. Blannerhasset's books, or the arms, I am not able to say.

Question. What was the size of the chest? Answer. Of course, as long as a musket.

Question. But of what depth?

Answer. I never measured the dimensions, but it was about as deep as my knee.

Question. Could you straddle over it with your legs? Answer. I could not.

Question. Where did you first see this chest? Answer. At the mouth of Cumberland.

Mr. McRae. What sort of arms? Answer. French.

Question. I mean of what form and nature—were there any bayonets? Answer. There were.

Question. Was this box opened?

Answer. It was opened by the carelessness of the people who took it in the boat.

Question. What kind of chest was it? Answer. It was rough.

Question. Were there any others of the same appearance?

Answer. Yes, but I know not their contents.

Question. Do you recollect one thing, were these chests heavy? Answer. They were.

Question. Did you see any other military apparatus; any bullets?

Answer. I did. There were some bullets in a barrel, standing at the bow of one of Col. Tyler's boats. Some said there were about six hundred in it.

Mr. Wirt. Did you see any powder?

Answer. I am not certain whether I saw one or two; but I am certain that I saw one tin canister of powder, that was put on board at Blannerhasset's island.

Mr. Blannerhasset. You said that you saw the boxes that were said to contain my books in the commissary boat; did you notice them? Answer. I did not see them.

Question. Did any one tell you that I had put arms on board? Answer. No one.

Mr. Hay. Did you go ashore at the mouth of Cumberland? Answer. I did.

Question. What passed there?

Answer. All the young men went up. Col. Burr wanted them to come up for him to pay his addresses to them?

Question. Well, and where did he receive them? Answer. A little piece above the bank.

Question. You did not see them form a circle? Answer. No; I was not with them.

William Love called in again.

MONDAY, September 21.

Mr. Hay. Where did you separate from the party? Answer. At Bayou Pierre.

Mr. Hay. State the circumstances which induced you to leave them?

Answer. The boat was going down to Natchez, and I went down in it.

Question. What boat? Answer. The boat with two horses in it.

Mr. Wirt. Did you go in Boyce's boat to Natchez? Answer. Yes.

Mr. Hay. Did you go in consequence of any direction from Mr. Blannerhasset? Answer. I did not.

Question. Why did you leave them?

Answer. I was not in the party, and I thought I might as well leave them.

Question. Was there no particular circumstance as to Mr. Blannerhasset, which induced you to do it?

Answer. Yes; when I was in the boat Mr. Blannerhasset ordered me out, for he wanted to speak to the men in my absence. I was not pleased at this, as I thought my life as sweet as the rest of them. Captain Elliott, however, came and told me I might join as a volunteer, and gave me a musket. I went over to the party; but finding that I could not keep as high as the rest of them, I got discontented, and was determined to go to Natchez.

Question. In what boat did you see the chest of arms? Answer. In Major Floyd's boat.

Mr. Wirt. Do you know any thing of the guard? Answer. I was not there at that time.

Mr. Hay. In what boat were the other chests?

Answer. I do not say they were arms, but I saw some boxes on board of Captain Dean's boat.

Mr. Wirt. Did you say you had no other reason for quitting but because you could not keep up appearances?

Answer. None.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. Who brought you round here from New Orleans?

Answer. General Wilkinson. I was introduced to him by Sergeant Dunbaugh, before I was subpoenaed. Every one of the party whom he could find was carried to the general.

Question. Did General Wilkinson ask you any questions? Answer. He asked some.

Question. Was this before or after you were subpoenaed? Answer. Before.

Question. Did you receive any money?

Answer. I received about twenty dollars from the military agent after I was subpoenaed. Since I came here I have refunded it to the marshal.

Testimony of Thomas Hartley.

FRIDAY, September 18.

Mr. Hay. Were you at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. No, I was at Fort Massac when the boats were there; I had left it two weeks before.

Question. You were with Colonel Burr at Fort Massac?

Answer. I was. [Colonel Burr objected to this question; Fort Massac was in the Indiana Territory.]

Question. Did you descend the Mississippi, and with whom?

Answer. With Mr. Fort and Mr. Hopkins.

Question. Where were you joined by Mr. Burr's party?

Answer. Just below Fort Massac. They passed the fort in the night, and we joined them next morning.

Question. How many boats had they? Answer. About eight or ten.

Question. Do you know whether they had any arms in the boat?

Answer. I saw none but fowling-pieces.

Question. Did you descend the river with them?

Answer. Yes; I went to New Madrid by the directions of Colonel Tyler.

Question. Were you not left behind to enlist men?

[The counsel for the accused objected to the principle as well as form of this question. After some discussion, the Chief Justice decided that the principle of the question might be relevant.]

Mr. Hay. Will you state, then, for what purpose you were left behind?

Answer. All the boats landed at New Madrid on New year's day, and stayed four days. Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Wood, and myself, went before to get more men. We got two, and some more joined at Nantes-de-Grace.

Question. On what terms did they join?

Answer. At twelve and a half dollars a month, and one hundred acres of land besides.

Mr. McKae. And what services were to be performed?

Answer. They were to go to the Washita country, and also to descend to New Orleans to work on Colonel Burr's boats.

Mr. Wirt. Was Colonel Burr looked on as the head of this party? Answer. He was.

Question. Did you and these recruits understand that they were to be placed under Colonel Burr's command?

Answer. They were to be delivered to him, and to go on board his boats.

Cross-examined by the accused.

Mr. Burr. Who wrote the articles under which they were engaged? Answer. Mr. Hopkins.

Question. Repeat them? Answer. I do not particularly recollect them.

Question. But there was something about the Washita lands?

Answer. They were to go there after they had gone to New Orleans.

Mr. Wirt. These men who were engaged in New Madrid, did they join the detachment?

Answer. They did, at the mouth of Cole's creek.

Question. Do I understand that the sole object was the settlement of the Washita lands?

Mr. Botts objected to these questions. How could these transactions affect Colonel Burr, when they took place in his absence? The objection was overruled; and Mr. Hartley replied, that the contract declared that they were to serve for six months; that they were to settle on the Washita lands, but that they were to go on to New Orleans.

Mr. Wirt. Did you see the men assembled before they arrived at the Chickasaw Bluffs?

Answer. I did not overtake them before they got to Cole's creek.

Mr. Burr. You said they were to go to Washita and to New Orleans; were they to go in any event?

Answer. They were to go to the Washita, but the articles did not specify what business they were to follow; the only service which was mentioned was, that they were to work the boats down.

Mr. Baker objected to this kind of evidence. He contended that the best sort of evidence ought in every case to be produced; and that no paper ought to be mentioned which was not exhibited in court. The objection was overruled; when Mr. Hay asked the witness whether he was certain they were to go to New Orleans first?

Answer. I am; I recollect the articles were read, after we got into the boat.

Mr. McKae. And they were to serve six months?

Answer. They were.

Examination of Simeon Poole.

THURSDAY, August 20.

I never was on the island at that time, but was opposite to it; I saw boats and men there, if I mistake not, about the 10th of December. I arrived opposite the island about dusk, at the distance of about 150 or 120 yards from it. I do not know how many boats were there. I saw people walking about in the evening; and in the course of the night they built a fire; and I saw some persons by the light that appeared to be armed, and as if they were sentinels.

Mr. Hay. Why did you think they were?

Answer. I do not know they were, but they appeared so to my view. I did not go over that night, nor did I offer to go. Boats were passing and re-passing during the night from the island to the main land, which I supposed belonged to the island; not large boats, but small craft. I did not speak to them. I stood as much undiscovered as possible, as I was authorized by the Governor of Ohio to apprehend Blannerhasset, and I went for that purpose.

Question. Were there any indications of arrangements about a watchword?

Answer. Yes; in the evening I saw some boats cross, when a particular word was given. When the people on the Ohio side wanted to go across, they would hail for a boat; the people on the island would ask "what boat?" If the answer was "I's boat," the boat immediately put off.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. How long did you stay out that night?

Answer. Perhaps till 10 o'clock.

Question. Was it not cold enough to render a fire pleasant?

Answer. It was.

Question. Is it not usual for boats to build fires on the banks when it is so cold?

Answer. It is.

The witness also stated, in the course of his examination, that there seemed to be a good many men on the island; that lanterns were passing during the night between the house and boats, as if there was business between them; that he could not say whether the persons whom he had called sentinels were not merely loitering around the fire; that he thought it likely that, if he too had used the watchword, the boats would have put off for him; that he heard several hails from the Ohio side that did not give the word, and no boat came from the island; but a boat always came when that answer was given. He himself was on the Ohio side.

Examination of Maurice P. Belknap.

Mr. Hay. Will you tell us, sir, what you saw on the island?

Mr. Belknap. On the evening of the 10th of December I was at the island of Mr. Blannerhasset. I arrived there between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening. I hailed a boat, and they asked my name. Having given it, a skiff was immediately sent over, with two of Blannerhasset's servants. Having crossed, I met with Mr. Woodbridge, who returned to the house with me. When I went into the house, I observed a number of men, who, from the promiscuous view I had of them, might have been about twenty. The two or three I noticed near the door had rifles, and appeared to be cleaning them. These were all the arms I saw, for I merely passed through the room where they were. Near the place where I landed, I noticed two or three boats, and people about them. It was a dark evening, and the lights in the boats was the only circumstance which made me notice them.

When cross-examined, Mr. B. said that he had given no watchword when he hailed, but only his name. He was not certain whether any other person had crossed during the night. He saw Mr. Dana there, but does not know when he crossed.

WEDNESDAY, September 9.

I was requested by Mr. Blannerhasset to carry a letter to John Jordan, at Lexington, Kentucky. In that letter was enclosed one to Colonel Burr. Some time previous to Blannerhasset's asking me to go to Lexington, I stated to him that I believed the expedition was an unlawful one. I showed him a letter which I had received from one of my friends, and told him I would have nothing to do with the expedition. He declared that it was not unlawful. For that reason, he read to me his letter to Colonel Burr. In that letter, he, in substance, congratulated Colonel Burr on his acquittal at Lexington, and that the grand jury did not find a bill against him; he mentioned the state of the boats building on the Muskingum, though I do not particularly recollect what he said concerning them.

[Here Mr. Belknap was asked at what time was this? He answered, about the middle of November, 1806.]

The letter mentioned likewise the quantity of provisions that he should have to take down the river with him; (I particularly recollect corn meal as one of the articles;) and also that he should probably take his family down with him. The letter was of considerable length; I cannot recollect half of it. I delivered it to Mr. Jordan. He broke the seal of the cover addressed to him, and requested me to take the enclosed one to Colonel Burr, at Frankfort. I carried it to Frankfort, and delivered it to Colonel Burr; and took a letter back from him to Blannerhasset. Colonel Burr, before he closed his letter, handed it to me; I read a part of it, and asked him an explanation of a part which I did not understand. He then took it and read to me the whole, as I supposed. The substance was, that he thanked Mr. Blannerhasset for his exertions in preparing the boats; he stated he should probably leave that place in eight days for Nashville; that he should probably go down the river before Blannerhasset; that he was glad to hear that his family was going down; and that he would procure for them a comfortable settlement at Natchez or at New Orleans, until they could be better situated on the Washita; he requested Blannerhasset to make all possible speed, as the probability was that the river would close soon.

Examined by the counsel for the United States.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect that he stated any other reasons? Answer. No.

Question. Did you carry any verbal instructions?

Answer. Yes; Burr requested Blannerhasset to have the boats in the day time to carry a white flag, and in the night a lamp.

Question. Believing, when you were first informed of this expedition, that its object was lawful, had you not acceded to it? Answer. Yes.

Question. Supposing its object was proper and lawful?

Answer. Yes; Mr. Blannerhasset said the officers of Government knew and approved of it.

Mr. McRae. Did he mention the object of the enterprise?

Answer. He stated that he expected there would be a war with Spain; and, on that event, those who went down the river would join the regular army, and go against the Spaniards. If there was no war, they would then make a settlement on the Washita. He mentioned several persons to me who had joined it; among the rest he named General Eaton and Mr. Gallatin; he named General Wilkinson too.

Mr. Wirt. Did you go down with him? Answer. I did not.

Question. What prevented you?

Answer. On my return, I found in the post office a letter for me from young Mr. Danielson, General Eaton's son-in-law, stating the substance of General Eaton's deposition. I repeated this important contradiction of one of Blannerhasset's statements to a number of my friends; and this occasioned many to abandon the expedition, finding they had been deceived.

Mr. Hay. Had you any conversation with Colonel Burr?

Answer. No; he only asked me the prospect as to the boats and the number of men; I had very little conversation with him.

Mr. McRae. You say that you and many others withdrew from the enterprise on finding yourselves deceived?

Answer. Yes; I recollect that Mr. Cushing, Mr. Dana's brother, and several others from Marietta, forsook it.

Mr. Hay. Did you carry no message from Burr to Blannerhasset, warning them to depart in consequence of danger?

Answer. No; nothing but what I have related; except that he said it appeared, from the newspapers, that the public mind was much agitated; that, therefore, there might be some difficulty in getting down the river; but he hoped they would not oppose the constituted authorities.

Question. Were the men preparing to depart when you got to the island?

Answer. Yes; I was surprised to find so many men in the hall; they appeared to be in confusion; and one of them was wiping a gun. I supposed their number to be about twenty.

Mr. Wirt. When Burr spoke of those boats and men, did he speak of them as one having authority over them?

Answer. He spoke of them as one concerned; I do not recollect that he said any thing about authority.

Mr. McRae. When he spoke of the people going to descend the river, did he call them his people?

Answer. I do not recollect that; but he was speaking of the people who Blannerhasset had informed him were coming down.

Question. Did he speak as being in connexion with them? Answer. He did.

Mr. Hay. Did you hear nothing of the proceeding of the Legislature of Ohio before you carried the letter?

Answer. Not till my return.

[The Chief Justice here observed that that Legislature did not meet till afterwards. Colonel Burr said "the Legislature did not meet till the 4th of December; and Frankfort, where Mr. Belknap saw me, is about two hundred miles from the island." Mr. Hay. I did not know the date of Mr. Burr's letter. Mr. Belknap. It was dated about the last of November, or 1st of December; and I returned to the island about the 10th of December.]

Mr. McRae. Upon your return to the island, had you any private conversation with Mr. Blannerhasset?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Did he make any inquiries concerning Colonel Burr?

Answer. He asked about his health, and the probability of his going down the river.

Question. Did nothing of any moment occur relating to Blannerhasset's departure?

Answer. Nothing that I recollect.

Question. Did he not state the reasons of his departing so precipitately?

Answer. He said he expected some difficulty, and had detained Tyler some days; he had kept his proceedings secret, and apprehended some danger from the people of Kenawha, if he did not depart immediately.

Question. Did you carry no despatches for Jordan? Answer. None.

Mr. Wirt. Did you understand both from Blannerhasset and Burr that they were connected in the enterprise?

Answer. Yes.

Mr. McRae. Was there much rumor and noise among the people on this subject before you went to Lexington?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Was it not the opinion of the people that they intended to invade Mexico?

Answer. There were various opinions concerning them.

[Mr. Martin and Colonel Burr both objected to this question as improper.]

Question. Did Colonel Burr ask you about the state of the public mind?

Answer. Yes; he asked me what was going on abroad; such was his expression; and I told him.

Question. Did he make no other inquiry?

Answer. He asked if I had seen any thing in the papers from the Government on this subject. I answered that I had not.

Mr. Hay. What did he say when you mentioned that alarms had been excited?

Answer. He said they proceeded from wrong impressions.

Mr. McRae. What invitations were held out to induce you to join in the enterprise?

Answer. None particularly; except that if, when I descended the river, I should not find Generals Eaton and Wilkinson either there or coming there, and if there was no Spanish war, then Blannerhasset was to bear my expenses back.

Question. Then you considered yourself as engaged for a Spanish war? Answer. I did.

Question. And Mr. Gallatin was to have joined?

Answer. Yes, most particularly; so Mr. Blannerhasset said.

Cross-examined by the accused and his counsel.

Colonel Burr. Do you recollect any specific offer of land which I made to Mr. Blannerhasset in my letter?

Answer. No. I recollect you authorized him to offer a certain quantity to young men.

Question. Do you not recollect I offered him forty thousand acres? Answer. I do not.

Question. Did I not show you a map of the land? Answer. You did.

Question. Did I not show you some deeds for the land? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Do you recollect that I stated in my letter the advantages and disadvantages of his coming down; that, if he could not live in peace with his neighbors, he had better come down?

Answer. I recollect something in that way. But the impressions on my mind were that you expected him to come down.

Question. You state that you had offers from Blannerhasset; had you any from me? Answer. Not from you.

Question. Did I mention any thing about a party with Tyler? Answer. No.

Question. How many guns did you see on the island? Answer. I saw no more than three.

Question. Did I ever speak of the party on the island as my people?

Answer. No. Your expressions were generally they.

Mr. Hay. When you arrived at the island, and made your communication to Mr. Blannerhasset, did you immediately retire to bed and not examine particularly? Answer. Yes.

Chief Justice. What did Mr. Blannerhasset say to you about your finding Generals Eaton and Wilkinson?

Answer. He said, if I did not find them at the place to which we were to go, and there was no Spanish war, he would bear my expenses home again. He said, in case there was no Spanish war, they were to settle Washita lands.

Mr. McRae. Do you recollect any others whom he mentioned to you as concerned in the enterprise?

Answer. He mentioned Mr. Dayton, Mr. Devereux of Baltimore, and Colonel Smith of New York.

Mr. Wirt. Did he say that Colonel Burr was concerned?

Answer. In our first conversation on the subject, he said he did not know what Colonel Burr meant to do; and, as to his influence, he observed "you know he is not high in the confidence of his country." In all the other conversations he did speak of him as the head of the party.

Mr. McRae. Did you say that you stated to Mr. Blannerhasset the reasons for your declining?

Answer. I did to his lady, after his departure.

Mr. Wirt. Did I understand you correctly as saying that Colonel Burr said he had no improper design, and that the people were under wrong impressions? Answer. Yes.

Question. Were you at the boats?

Answer. No; I landed some rods above them.

Mr. Carter Berkeley, (one of the jury.) Did you hear Blannerhasset say that the men came down the river to the island by Burr's direction? Answer. I did not hear him say one way or another.

Examination of Edmund P. Dana.

THURSDAY, August 20.

On the evening of the 10th December I understood that the boats were to start with Comfort Tyler and his men down the river. Two other young men and myself were determined to cross over from Bellepré where I live. We went down to the landing opposite the island, about dusk; took a skiff, and landed at the upper part of the landing. We then went to the house. Tyler's boats lay below our own about seven or eight rods. I heard some persons talking, but it was dark and I could not distinguish any one. We went into the hall, a large room, where there were a number of men; I remained but a short time and did not count them, but I suppose there were about fifteen or sixteen. One of them was running bullets; and there was nothing but hubbub and confusion about the large fire. I was then introduced into a chamber, where there were Tyler, Blannerhasset, Colonel Smith of New York, and several other gentlemen. I was introduced to Mr. Smith and Dr. McCastle, who had his lady there. Colonel Tyler I had seen the day before.

Mr. Coleman, (a juror.) Is it proper to ask any questions about the conversations which took place with those gentlemen?

Chief Justice. It is left to the consent of the accused.

Mr. Burr. If any of the jury think proper, I can have no objections. The inquiry was not pressed.

When cross-examined, Mr. D. said he was a perfect stranger to the people in the hall, but that on his going in they did not appear to be alarmed.

FRIDAY, September 25.

I never saw Colonel Burr but once previous to my seeing him in this place.

In November last Mr. and Mrs. Blannerhasset came to my house in Bellepré; his object was to purchase cider. In the course of our conversation, he said that he was going down the river, that he had been purchasing land in the West in company with Mr. Burr and others, and that he was going down to settle it. This was about the middle of the day, and my father gave them an invitation to stay to dinner. They stayed, and there was a good deal of conversation at dinner on these subjects. Mr. Blannerhasset stated the particular advantages of the Washita land above the rest of the country; that it was near the market, and calculated for the raising of cotton. He said there was a large association for this purpose, and that he wanted young men to go. Those who embarked early, if they succeeded in the undertaking, would no doubt make their fortunes. I observed to my brother, who was sitting with us, that if fortunes were so easily made, he had better go. Mr. Blannerhasset replied, that he wanted such men as we were. He said he did not want to carry us without my father's consent. My father observed that we were our own men, and might act as we thought proper. I think Mr. Blannerhasset bargained for five or six barrels of cider, which he said he was going to carry down the river with him. He invited us to the island, where he would give us more particular information of his designs.

A short time after I was in the orchard gathering apples. Mr. Blannerhasset came to me, to talk more about the enterprise down the river: he asked me if I had any serious intention of going. I said I was unsettled; I would embrace any favorable opportunity to better my situation; and if I knew the object of this enterprise, I could better tell whether I would go or not. I observed that there were some rumors that the plan was unfavorable to the Government, and, if it was, that I would have nothing to do with it. He pledged his most sacred honor to me, and swore on the honor of a gentleman, that the plan was not hostile to the Government; and he went on to name several characters who he said were concerned; that the association was very extensive, spreading from Maine to Georgia. I asked him to name them. He said that Colonel Burr was one, whose talents he then highly commended. I said, if the plan was a lawful one, it was a good one, from the high opinion I had formed of his talents. He said that General Wilkinson was to join with his army. He mentioned General Jackson, of Tennessee, who was then preparing a body of militia, (two or three thousand, I think,) and who was ready to join them. He mentioned General Dayton. I think I asked him if the Swartwouts of New York were not concerned. (There was a gentleman then at our house by that name.) He said they were. He named a number of other characters, whom I do not recollect.

Mr. Hay. Were you on the island on the night of their departure?

Answer. I was. Mr. Blannerhasset told me if I would come over to see him, he would show me a plan of the Washita country. Some few days after this I went over to the island. Mr. Blannerhasset was at home, but engaged with some gentlemen who were there. He made no further communications to me, seeming to doubt whether I was seriously disposed towards his plans. I stayed only a few minutes. I now recollect that I have omitted a part of the conversation with him. When he said that Generals Wilkinson and Jackson were going to join with their troops, I asked him what this was for—if for the settlement of lands, they surely were not necessary. He said that there were a great many Indians and Spaniards in that country, whom they must go prepared to resist.

I had no further conversation with him till the 9th or 10th of December, when he sent a servant to know whether he could get three or four horses to ride to Marietta; I said that he might have all that I had. About twelve o'clock in the day several gentlemen came, among them were Mr. Blannerhasset, Mr. Tyler, and I think Mr. Smith: there were six gentlemen. I understood they were going up the Muskingum after the boats. Some time in the afternoon they returned. They rode to the landing opposite the island, and sent the horses down. I understood, from flying reports, that they expected opposition, and had returned. Hearing that they were to start that evening, I felt anxious to see their departure, and to find out their object. With two young men I went down to the river, found a skiff at the landing, and passed over. We landed just above where Tyler's boats lay, went to the house into a large room where a number of men were collected around the fire, and Colonel Tyler among them. I told him that I understood they were about to start down the river. We walked out into the north wing of Mr. Blannerhasset's house together, and there a young man by the name of Bent observed to me that he understood from Mr. Blannerhasset I had some intentions to join.

Mr. Botts objected to this species of testimony. Did Mr. Blannerhasset hear of this conversation afterwards and approve it? Witness. No.

Mr. Wirt. Who was in company with you? Witness. Mr. Tyler was.

Mr. Hay contended that a declaration made in the presence of one accomplice would bear upon all the rest.

Mr. Botts contended that if this kind of testimony were admitted, it would be impossible to exclude any source of information or conjecture, newspaper statements, or flying reports.

The Chief Justice observed, that as he was sitting there in the character of an examining magistrate, where the rules of evidence were not so inflexibly rigid as in a court of justice, and as Tyler was probably a party concerned, he was disposed to hear the testimony.

Witness. I replied, that when I knew the object of the expedition, and liked it, I would then determine; that Mr. Blannerhasset had been telling me a story about settling land, in which I did not place much confidence. Colonel Tyler observed that it was a fact they had made the purchase, but that they had other objects in view. I told him that I had my own opinion on the subject; that I supposed their operations lay towards Mexico: if they were, I felt strongly disposed to be friendly towards them. There was at that time a strong talk about a Spanish war. He observed that I was not much mistaken in my opinion. I told him that since the subject was first mentioned to me by Mr. Blannerhasset, I had been at some pains to examine the geography of that country; that I found the people there very numerous, and that this handful of men would not be able to make any impression on them. Colonel Tyler observed, that with five hundred well armed and well disciplined men he thought they would be able to effect it. I asked him if they had attended to the different routes through that country. He observed, perfectly; they were acquainted with every cow-path in that country. He said they were not going for plunder or rapine, but to relieve the distressed inhabitants of Mexico, and that they had been invited for five years past. I think I observed then, (although I am not very positive in the expression,) that if that was their object, and they would avow it, they would get three men to join them for one that they got now. I think his answer was, that it was not politic that their military movements should be divulged, or that their object should be known to any but their leaders; that the Spaniards would get information of it, and fortify themselves.

The conversation closed here; I wished them success in their enterprise, and told them that if I thought proper to join them, it would be at some point down the river; I was not then ready. Colonel Tyler withdrew into the chamber. Mr. Blannerhasset observed that they were going to start that night; that the Legislature had passed a law which he thought unconstitutional; that he did not apprehend an arrest but on account of the delay. He said something about his going, that he was sorry after living so long among us to be forced to go down in the night, but he was afraid of delay, he was afraid of being stopped; and the season was so far advanced the river might freeze up, and he could not go down. About nine o'clock I bid them adieu, and left the island.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Botts. Did Blannerhasset and Tyler speak of a Spanish war as an event that would certainly take place?

Answer. They did. I think Colonel Tyler said there was a strong prospect of war, and, if there was one, he would be there ready to join in it.

Examination of Israel Miller.

FRIDAY, August 21.

Mr. Miller stated that he had arrived on the island between the 7th and 10th December last, in company with Colonel Tyler and Israel Smith, with four boats and about thirty-two men, with five rifles and about three or four pairs of pistols, in all, that he knew of; that he had joined them at Beaver, and gone down with them to Blannerhasset island; and there he saw one blunderbuss and two pairs of pistols. He saw but one man running bullets.

Israel Miller.

MONDAY, September 21.

Mr. Hay. Were you at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. I was. I went down with Mr. Tyler from Pennsylvania.

Question. Had you any communication with Mr. Burr?

Answer. I was introduced to Mr. Burr by Mr. Tyler at the island opposite to the mouth of Cumberland. I never held any conversation with Mr. Burr.

Question. How many men were there at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. On the whole, between 60 and 70. I am certain there were not one hundred.

Question. What did Mr. Burr say to the party on the island?

Answer. He said he had something to communicate, which he would take another time for.

Mr. McRae. How many boats were at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. I believe, ten.

Question. How many men in each boat?

Answer. There were seven in the boat I belonged to; I know not how many were in the others.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. How many men went from Blannerhasset's island?

Answer. About thirty-one men.

Question. Were these men used to labor—to farming, or mechanics? Answer. Most of them were fit for it. There were only a few of them not used to labor.

Question. Did they not do hard work? Answer. They did.

Question. What arms did they bring from Blannerhasset's island?

Answer. I saw only one blunderbuss, one fusee, and a pair of pistols.

Question. How much powder? Answer. I saw only a small keg.

Question. How many pounds do you suppose it contained? Answer. About ten or fifteen.

Question. Were they not short of powder to kill game? Did they not very often come into your boat and borrow some? Answer. They did.

Question. What kind of game? Answer. Ducks and turkeys.

Mr. McRea. Do they kill this kind of game with bullets? Answer. Yes.

Mr. Burr. If the gentleman had ever been in Kentucky, he would have known that it was considered inglorious there to kill a squirrel, or even ducks, with any thing but bullets.

James McDowell.

FRIDAY, September 18.

Mr. Hay. Did you go as low as the Chickasaw Bluffs? Answer. I did.

Question. What number of men were assembled at the mouth of Cumberland river?

Answer. About one hundred.

Question. How many additional men joined them there? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Did you see any boxes of arms? Answer. No.

Question. Did you see any guns with bayonets? Answer. I saw a few.

Question. Any pistols? Answer. Six or eight pairs, and some rifles.

Question. Do you know of any men who joined them at Fort Massac?

Mr. Burr objected to this question. Fort Massac was in the Indiana Territory.

Mr. Hay. Did you see any powder? Answer. Yes.

Question. What quantity? Answer. A couple of small casks.

Question. Did you see any bullets, and what quantity?

Answer. I helped to run some myself, and I saw one barrel about two-thirds full. I saw those bullets below Bayou Pierre.

Question. Did you see Blannerhasset and Smith? Answer. Yes.

Question. Did this party seem to be under Burr's command?

Answer. They said they were Colonel Burr's boats and party. They regarded themselves as under his direction.

Question. Were there any other officers apparently under his command?

Answer. Yes. Colonel Tyler was an officer, and Mr. Blannerhasset seemed to be one; but not to have so much command as Colonel Tyler.

Mr. Wirt. Did you see any agricultural tools, such as ploughs and hoes, adapted to the settlement of lands?

Answer. Not any.

Question. Were there any families; that is, any men with their wives? Answer. There were two families.

Question. Of what description of character was this part composed? Answer. Principally of young men.

Question. Did they appear to be men accustomed to plantation labor?

Answer. Some of them appeared fit; but most of them seemed like gentlemen.

Mr. Hay presumed that it would not be departing from the opinion of the court if he asked a question concerning some transactions out of the United States which might serve to elucidate the state of the party at the mouth of Cumberland. Might he not, for instance, inquire whether the witness had seen any boxes of arms at Bayou Pierre; because it was perfectly fair to infer that, if they had not been subsequently received, they must have been with the party at the mouth of Cumberland river.

Mr. Burr. No precise inference can be drawn from that circumstance, because these arms may have been received into the boats below the line of Tennessee.

The Chief Justice thought it a proper question: if the acts attempted to be proved were done in the United States, evidence might be drawn from any place to prove them. But no evidence could be produced to prove an act that was not done in the United States.

Mr. Baker. This is really a strange mode of inferring circumstances by contrast. The witness says expressly that they were not at the mouth of Cumberland, and yet he is to be interrogated whether he did not see them at Bayou Pierre.

Mr. McDowell. I did not say that they were not at the mouth of Cumberland; I said only that I did not see them there.

Mr. Hay. Was there any fact to induce you to believe that there were chests of arms on board?

Answer. I did not see them; but they took in some boxes at Blannerhasset's island.

Question. Did they take in any boxes between the mouth of Cumberland and Bayou Pierre? Answer. None.

Mr. Wirt. You say there were about one hundred men at the mouth of Cumberland river. Was there any accession to this party afterwards?

Answer. It was increased before we got to Cole's creek.

Question. What was the total amount of the party?

Answer. There were about one hundred and thirty at Cole's creek.

Question. Was there any application to you to join them? Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset applied to me.

Question. In what manner?

Answer. He asked me to go along with him; but I said I did not wish to go without knowing where they were going. He was at me two or three times. He said that many men were going without knowing any more than I did. I told him I had very little in the world, but that I did not wish to leave it in that way.

Mr. Burr here interrupted the examination. He observed that the counsel for the prosecution were bound to prove the overt act first; that there was no impropriety in producing circumstances explanatory of the overt act; but how could these conversations between other persons, and held in his absence, contribute to establish this act; or how could they affect him?

Mr. Hay contended that these circumstances might contribute to show the intentions of the party and the character of the enterprise.

The Chief Justice considered this as admissible testimony. If the counsel for the prosecution charge a military assemblage at the mouth of Cumberland, they were at liberty to produce every circumstance explanatory of the nature of the assemblage. He considered conversations among the men themselves at the mouth of Cumberland as admissible, because they contributed to show the nature of the expedition; and why should not conversations that were afterwards held be as explanatory as those which were there maintained? The charge, too, was not confined to the mouth of that river, but was extended to any place below that which was in the limits of the United States. It is, then, immaterial where these conversations passed, because they make a part of the transactions at the places actually charged.

Mr. Botts objected that these conversations were not held within the United States, because the jurisdiction of the Mississippi had never extended beyond the margin of the Mississippi. Some conversation here ensued, when Mr. McDowell was dismissed, and William Love (the quondam groom of Blannerhasset) was called into court.

James McDowell, again called in.

MONDAY, September 21.

Mr. Hay. How far did your evidence go on your former examination?

Mr. Wirt. The court stopped him within the limits of the United States.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect any thing that passed after you left the mouth of Cumberland?

The witness replied, to successive interrogatories, that he saw eight or ten arms in the boat which he sat out in, the boat of Captain Tyler and Major Smith; that he saw guns, but not so many, in the other boats; that Colonel Tyler was the captain of that boat; that he thought there were about one hundred and thirty men at Cole's Creek; that at a little bayou below Bayou Pierre, the boats stopped and Colonel Burr got out; he knew nothing of clearing ground for exercising the men; he did not see the boxes opened; that some of the boxes were four feet long and some six; that they were heavy, and he could not lift them; he saw six or seven boxes; that a few miles below Cole's creek, they went up on a hill, and formed a circle; Colonel Burr told them he was a thorn in their side, so long as he remained with them; that he had been taken from them two or three times; he had been carried on his trial to Washington; and that he was now about to leave them; he told them what his was theirs, (alluding, as the witness supposes, to his property;) and that they might go on and settle the Washita country which he had purchased.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. Did you see General Wilkinson at New Orleans?

Answer. I do not know whether I saw him.

Question. Who invited you to come here?

Answer. I was summoned in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Blannerhasset. Do you recollect being in Dean's boat?

Answer. I do.

Question. Do you not recollect that its roof was leaky?

Answer. I do.

Question. Do you not recollect that I expressed some fears lest the leaks should injure my boxes?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Examination of Jacob Dunbaugh.

SATURDAY, September 19.

Mr. Hay. Will you describe the situation of the party at the mouth of the Cumberland river?

Witness. Am I to be confined to the Cumberland river?

Mr. Hay. You may go down to the Chickasaw Bluffs.

Mr. Botts. Go down to the Mississippi river, and whether you are to go further the court will instruct you.

Some desultory conversation here ensued on this point, after which the witness proceeded.

On the 26th December, 1806, very early in the morning, a small skiff, with four men and a Mr. Hopkins, arrived at Fort Massac. Some time after the arrival of this skiff, Captain Bissel, (commanding at the fort,) detailed me for command to go to the mouth of Cumberland river to purchase a beef for him.

Question. What were you?

Answer. I was, and am still, sergeant in the army of the United States. He told me I was to call on Colonel Burr with his compliments; and if Colonel Burr wanted my assistance, that I was to furnish it. Captain Bissel told me this Mr. Hopkins, who came in the skiff with four men, was going up with me. When we got half way up the Cumberland river, we stopped, and I asked Mr. Hopkins his business at Fort Massac, and he said it was to ask Captain Bissel whether he would oppose Colonel Burr's passing by the fort. I got to the mouth of Cumberland, about half an hour before sunset on the 26th December, and landed; Colonel Burr was then encamped on Cumberland island. After I had crossed over to the island, I saw Col. Burr, and delivered Captain Bissel's message. Colonel Burr said he was much obliged to him, and that Captain Bissel was very good; Col. Burr asked me "is not this my old friend?" I had seen him before. He said he believed I drank no brandy, and asked me if I would not have a glass of wine. When I drank I said "here's success to Col. Burr and his undertaking;" and Mr. Blannerhasset (this was the first time I ever saw him) stamped his foot and said "Amen." Colonel Burr told me I must take breakfast with him next morning; I replied that I would. On the 27th I saw Colonel Burr, and told him I was going to the garrison. He told me to bear his compliments to Captain Bissel, and asked me if I could take a barrel of apples to him; I told him I would. Whilst they were getting the apples on board, the wind sprung up very fresh, and I was not able to start. In the course of that day I crossed him several times over to the Kentucky shore, and several of his men. During that day, Colonel Burr asked me how I would like to go down the river with him; I replied very well, if I could obtain the consent of my general; he said that would make no odds; he would fix it without. This was on the 27th, and on the 28th I called on Colonel Burr, and told him I was going to Fort Massac; he sent his compliments to Captain Bissel, but said he expected he would get there before me; I told him that he might man his barge as well as he could, I would arrive there before him. I arrived in the garrison some time in the afternoon.

Mr. Botts. There you may stop. It is impossible to progress without running into some impropriety, unless we ascertain the limits within which the witnesses are to be confined.

Mr. Hay observed that he did not mean to prove any acts at Fort Massac.

After some conversation, the examination proceeded.

Mr. Hay. Did you see any military parade?

Answer. I saw the men drawn up at the mouth of the Cumberland.

Question. How many men?

Answer. I did not count them; but I suppose there were about one hundred.

Question. What kind of men? Answer. Generally, young men.

Mr. Wirt. Did they look like hard laborers? Answer. The principal part did not.

Question. How drawn up? Were they drawn up in a line? Answer. No; they were drawn up in three wings.

Question. What do you mean by three wings?—divisions?

Answer. [The witness here described their position, by drawing a figure on the floor with his foot.] They described three sides of a square; Colonel Burr was introduced by Colonel Tyler, beginning at the left; the party gradually fell in, and formed a circle.

Mr. Hay. How introduced? Answer. He went round and shook hands with every man.

Mr. Hay. Did you not see some chests of arms?

Mr. Burr objected to this manner of putting the question.

Mr. Hay admitted he had put the question inadvertently; he merely wished Mr. Dunbaugh to state what he knows of the chests of arms.

Mr. Botts. State what you know of any chests of arms within the United States.

Witness. I did not see more than a few rifles at the mouth of Cumberland.

Mr. Hay. I think the court yesterday decided that we were at liberty to state any circumstances out of the United States which were explanatory of the acts done within the United States.

On this topic a long and desultory discussion ensued. The Chief Justice at length decided, that if an overt act be laid at the mouth of the Cumberland river, if a military assemblage was said to be there assembled, that evidence beyond the limits of the States might be produced to show the military attitude of the party; that, with respect to this particular question, if the witnesses could show that no other arms were put on board, and if certain arms were put on board at a certain place, it was some presumption that these arms had been at the mouth of Cumberland river; and that he understood it was the intention of the prosecution to show that this party were in such a state at such a place, that they might be able to infer that the party were in a similar state at the mouth of Cumberland. In this point of view he conceived that such evidence was admissible.

Mr. Hay. State, then, Mr. Dunbaugh, what you know on this subject. Did you leave Fort Massac with Colonel Burr?

Answer. I overtook him at New Madrid on the 1st of January.

Question. Did you then go down the river with him?

Answer. Yes; in his own boat.

Mr. Wickham repeated his objections to this kind of evidence. How was the witness to know whether arms might not have been subsequently put on board the boats? He was not always in Colonel Burr's boat, nor was Colonel Burr's boat with the rest. Can this be good testimony?

Chief Justice. The attorney is to show that hereafter; he is to show that there was no connexion between the boats and the shore.

Mr. Wickham. But suppose he has no testimony to that effect?

Chief Justice. Whether arms were subsequently introduced is a mere matter of inference, dependent on the whole of the evidence on both sides. It depends on a variety of circumstances, such as the situation of the shore and the country, &c.

Mr. Hay. State, then, Mr. Dunbaugh, what you know about the arms on board the boats?

Witness. Some time in January we left Bayou Pierre, and descended to Petit Gulph, three miles below, on the opposite side; Colonel Burr went ashore, and returned to the Petit Gulph; the boats all shoved off at once; Colonel Burr's was rather behind. The night we left Petit Gulph, Colonel Burr and Wyllie went into the bow of the boat for an axe, auger, and saw; they went into Colonel Burr's private room and began to chop; he ordered no person to go out, but I did go out; I saw a skiff lying aside of Colonel Burr's boat. After they had done chopping, a Mr. Pryor and a Mr. Tooley got out of the window; I got on the top of the boat, and saw two bundles of arms tied up with cords, and sunk by cords going through holes at the gunwales of Colonel Burr's boat; I observed to Mr. Pryor that he must be careful to bring up the boat, or else it could not get close to shore.

Mr. Hay. How many arms were there?

Answer. There were about forty or forty-three stands I saw, besides pistols, swords, blunderbusses, fuseses, and tomahawks.

Mr. Wirt. Is not the coast opposite to New Madrid a part of Tennessee?

Answer. No; it is the Indiana Territory.

Question. Were you on board any of the other boats? Answer. Several.

Question. Did they keep together? Answer. They did when they could.

Question. Did you see arms in the other boats?

Answer. I saw several stands of arms, that is, muskets with bayonets, in Floyd's boat, and about twelve rifles.

Question. Were you near enough to Colonel Burr, at the mouth of Cumberland, to hear his observations to his party?

Answer. I was; he said there were then too many bystanders to divulge his plans.

Question. Were any men obtained, after you joined them?

Answer. One, who got aboard at New Madrid.

Question. Were you commissioned by Colonel Burr to obtain men?

Answer. No; not citizens.

Question. What do you mean by the word "citizens?"

Here Dunbaugh was stopped by the opposite counsel, and his examination proceeded no further on this day.

Conclusion of Jacob Dunbaugh's evidence.

MONDAY, September 21.

Mr. Hay. State what passed between Colonel Burr and yourself, about your getting people to join him?

Witness. I stopped before with saying that Colonel Burr had not spoken to me to engage citizens, but he had spoken to me about soldiers. On the 30th of December, after Colonel Burr had obtained Captain Bissel's consent for me to go with him, I went to Colonel Burr, where he was encamped, about a mile or two below the garrison at Fort Massac, on the Indiana side; Colonel Burr asked me into his cabin, (a private room he had,) and asked me if I could not get ten or twelve of the best men in the garrison to go along with him; I asked him how it was to be done; he said, "get them to desert;" I told him no; he asked me if I could not steal out of the garrison arms, such as muskets, fuseses, and rifles; I told him that I would not, if I could, for him or any other man on earth; that I had always been well treated by the officers of the army; I told him that I had a rifle of my own, and he told me to bring it with me, and he would pay me for it. I started then to the garrison, and prepared myself to go; that was, after Colonel Burr had obtained liberty of my captain.

The counsel for the accused contended that this kind of testimony was not at all relevant to the subject. After some discussion, the examination proceeded.

Witness. At the mouth of Cumberland, Walter Davidson engaged a man by the name of Casey.

Question. On what terms? Witness. I do not particularly recollect.

Question. How do you know that Davidson was the agent of Col. Burr?

Witness. He belonged to the party, and told me he was an agent for Col. Burr.

The substance of the engagement was, he was to receive $12 50 per month for six months, clothes and victuals for six months, and 100 acres of land, to fight against all opponents. This Mr. Davidson, Plumb, and Andrew Wood, were sent to New Madrid to enlist more men.

[The witness here returned to that point in his narration at which he had been interrupted on his former examination.]

When I returned to Fort Massac, on the 28th December, I gave Col. Burr's compliments to Capt. Bissel, and told him that Col. Burr had sent him a barrel of apples. The next day (29th) this Mr. Davidson, Plumb, and Andrew Wood, came to the garrison very early in the morning, in a skiff; this was the time when they told me they were going to enlist more men for Col. Burr. They bought a skiff of me, that was left with me to sell by a Mr. Cutler, a surveyor; their own skiff was afterwards carried off by Col. Burr's party. That evening, after sundown, a barge came down to Fort Massac with twelve men in it; Col. Tyler and Major Hill were in it, and I think also Major Smith. They went up to Capt. Bissel's quarters, where they stayed about twenty minutes, and I then heard Col. Tyler tell the boat's crew to return to where Col. Burr was encamped, with some other instructions that I did not hear. Between 12 and 1 o'clock that night Col. Burr's boats passed by the fort, and landed about one or two miles below the garrison. [Mr. Hay. How many men were then in the garrison? Answer. Forty-four men. Question. Was that the usual complement of men? Answer. No; some of the troops had gone to Newport, and some to other places. Question. Was there any artillery? Answer. None. Question. How wide is the river at that place? Answer. About a mile wide.] Next morning Capt. Bissel told me to get six men, with the Clinker boat, to take him down the river a small piece. While the men were getting ready, a Mr. Fort, (perhaps his christian name was John,) who had been lying there several days, asked me how I would like to go along. I told him I should like it very well, if I could get leave to go. He told me he had been speaking to Capt. Bissel the evening before, and that Capt. Bissel had consented to let me go. While the boat was getting ready, Capt. Bissel, Col. Tyler, Major Hill, and I believe Major Smith, came down. Capt. Bissel got into his own boat, the rest pushed off in the boat that had been lying there several days, and fell down in company with him to where Col. Burr was encamped. Capt. Bissel went into Col. Burr's boat, and, while there, Col. Burr asked him to let me go with him. I heard it, because though I was not in the same room, there was a thin partition between us, and I heard him ask Capt. Bissel: I did not hear Capt. Bissel's answer. Capt. Bissel came out, got into his own boat, and, after going one or two hundred yards, we landed and walked up to the garrison. On 30th December, while I was in the military store, a man came in, who brought two letters from Col. Burr; he gave Capt. Bissel one and the other to me. Capt. Bissel went out, and after I had done in the store he called me, took me through the sally port to the back of the garrison, and asked me whether Col. Burr had been speaking to me about a furlough. I told him no. He asked me whether I wanted a furlough to go. I told him, with his approbation and advice, I would take one. Capt. Bissel said he would not advise me, but if I wanted one for 20 days, he would give me one. He told me before the 20 days were out I should see the general. He asked me if Col. Burr had told me any secrets, and, if he had, that I must keep them to myself. I accepted of Capt. Bissel's offer, and he told me to get ready to go with Col. Burr. I then went and saw Col. Burr, and the conversation passed about the men and arms, which I have already related. That evening (on the 30th December) Capt. Bissel sent for me to his quarters, and told me he was going to advise me what I was to do; he advised me never to forsake Col. Burr; that he would do something for me; he told me that if ever Col. Burr got on a field of battle, never to leave him on the ground: at the same time he made me a present of a silver breastplate. That evening I went to Capt. Bissel's for my furlough; he gave me a furlough, with a letter to Gen. Wilkinson, to be delivered by Col. Burr. Col. Burr had then started, and I was to give him the letter as soon as I overtook him. On the 31st December, being the day for muster and inspection, I asked Capt. Bissel if I was to show my clothing; I said they were all packed up and on board. He told me I must borrow some for inspection; which I accordingly did, agreeably to his orders. Whilst the men were on parade, I went to his lady's quarters to take my leave, and, on my return, Capt. Bissel having brought the men to a ground, he told me, "Dunbaugh, I wish you success, let you go where you will." I wanted to see Dr. Tuttle before I went, and Capt. Bissel told me if I had no particular business I had better go on, and if any one asked me where I was going, I was to say I was only going a few miles down the river, and that I was coming back again. There was one of Col. Burr's boats with eight hands to take me to him.

We overtook Col. Burr on the 1st January, at New Madrid; I handed him the letter for Gen. Wilkinson, and he broke it open. I told him the letter was for Gen. Wilkinson. He asked pardon, took me into his cabin, and sealed it up. I asked him what boat I was to go in, and he said in his own, as its accommodations were better than in any other. We left New Madrid about 11 or 12 o'clock that day, (1st January.) Andrew Wood remained at New Madrid, and Plumb and Walter Davidson, who had been sent on to enlist men, got on board the boats, and Mr. Hopkins was left in their places to enlist. After we got into the stream, a keel boat came alongside, and took Col. Burr into another boat some hundred yards off. I saw him on the bow of that boat, giving some instructions, but I could not hear him. Maj. Floyd had charge of this keel boat and crew, and I understood they were instructed to be at Natchez in four days. When we got within 45 miles of the Chickasaw Bluffs, Col. Burr asked me if I would go ahead with him to Chickasaw Bluffs, in a small boat, as I was acquainted with the river. I told him I would. We got into a small boat with twelve more men, and he gave general orders to the other boats to follow on, so as to reach the Bluffs early next morning. We got there between 12 and 1 o'clock that night, (3d January.) After we landed, Col. Burr told me I must go up to the garrison, and ask the commanding officer if he could not get quarters that night for himself and men. When I arrived at the garrison, I was conducted to Lieut. Jackson's quarters; he returned his compliments, and said he would furnish them with lodgings. Col. Burr went up with some of his men and supped. The next morning Col. Burr asked me if I was acquainted with the men in the garrison. I told him I was. He asked me if I could not get ten or twelve of the best men to desert. I told him I would not. He then said he would speak to them himself, and get two of the best men, and asked me to name them, which I did. [Upon being interrogated, the witness said there were nineteen men in the fort, few pieces of cannon, and the river about as wide as at Fort Massac.] Some time in the afternoon, I asked Col. Burr if he had got the men to go with him. He said he had. Some time that evening, he told me that Lieutenant Jackson and the other men would follow in a few days. That day Col. Burr employed a man, one Skinner, to run him some musket balls. He run him 600, for which Col. Burr paid him one dollar. He bought three dozen tomahawks out of the factory, which Col. Burr distributed among his men; some he had helved. That day all the boats landed at the Bluff, and on the 5th they all started, except a small boat left for Col. Burr. He soon overtook us, and got into his own boat. No one came from the garrison with him. We proceeded to a place called Palmyra, 35 miles above Bayou Pierre, on the 10th January. Col. Burr again asked me if I would go down to Bayou Pierre with him.

Mr. Wickham asked the court whether the witness should proceed? How was this kind of testimony calculated to prove the overt act? How was it relevant to the charge? Was it not better for gentlemen to extract whatever they deemed material out of the witness by putting interrogatories?

Mr. Wirt. The witness was just coming to certain declarations of the accused, which directly related to the objects of this expedition; when he has arrived at Bayou Pierre, and is about to tell something that is important, he is stopped.

Chief Justice wished the attorney to put interrogatories.

Mr. Hay. Did you ever get out of Colonel Burr's boat to go into another?

Answer. Never, except at Chickasaw Bluffs and Bayou Pierre, when I went with Colonel Burr, at his particular request?

Question. Did you go ashore at Judge Bruin's? and state what happened there.

The counsel for the accused objected to this general interrogatory.

Chief Justice. Ask him whether any thing happened there respecting this expedition?

Mr. Hay. Perhaps the witness may omit facts, because he deems them unimportant, which I may consider extremely relevant. Did any thing happen at Judge Bruin's respecting a publication? and state what it was.

Witness. On Sunday, the 11th January, while we were three or four hundred yards from the shore, Colonel Burr told me to arm myself with a rifle, and conceal a bayonet under my clothes; he told me he was going to tell me something I must never relate again; he then told me that General Wilkinson had betrayed him; that he had played the devil with him, and had proved the greatest traitor on the earth. I told him I could not believe it, and asked him how he knew it; he said he had seen published in a paper a letter, which he had some time before written to General Wilkinson in ciphers; he mentioned that General Wilkinson had made oath to this letter before the court, or in open court, I do not recollect which; he then told me he was fearful of being injured or taken; that I must keep a good look out about Judge Bruin's. Colonel Burr went into Judge Bruin's to breakfast, and I went into the cotton gin that was near the house; a boat came, and he told me to take a spy-glass and see whether it was his boat; I could not determine; he then directed me to go down, and, if it was his boat, to fire a musket.

Question. Where is Judge Bruin's?

Answer. About a mile and a quarter below Bayou Pierre.

Mr. Wirt. Where did he say he had seen the paper?

Answer. The paper had been handed by Judge Bruin to Colonel Burr the evening before.

Question. What was the conversation at Judge Bruin's?

Answer. Colonel Burr asked him if he had any papers; he handed him this paper, and, after reading it fifteen or twenty minutes, he rose up, and said he must go to the boats.

Mr. Hay. Did the troops from the boats land there? Answer. Yes.

Question. With what view did the men go ashore below the mouth of Bayou Pierre?

Answer. They landed about two or three miles below, in the Louisiana Territory.

The opposite counsel objected to these questions, but were overruled by the court.

Mr. Hay. State what happened at the landing of the men.

Witness. Some days after the men landed, (they all landed,) Colonel Burr ordered ground to be cleared for a parade ground, for the purpose of exercising the men; I never saw the ground myself, nor the men exercising. Some of the men, however, are here; Dr. Menholland is one of those men who assisted in clearing off the ground. There was a guard of twelve men paraded at this place; Wyllie, for one, had a rifle and sword.

Mr. Wirt. Were there any Indians at that place? Answer. None.

Question. What produced this guard?

Answer. They understood that the militia were coming to take Colonel Burr, and these twelve men were placed to alarm the boats.

Question. Was this before or after sinking the muskets? Answer. It was before.

The witness, upon being further interrogated, deposed: That a Mr. Lemaster had taken out of a hogshead, then in Mr. Blannerhasset's boat, a barrel of potatoes, with which he said he was going to fill the box of arms, so as to make it appear like a box of potatoes; that he was asked, in the presence of Colonel Burr, to go and help to clear the ground; that Colonel Fitzpatrick came to take an inventory of all the goods and arms that he could see; but that he did not see Colonel F. search for the arms.

Mr. Burr. Where was I all this time?

Answer. I know not, but I saw you handing two or three muskets out of the cabin window of your own boat into Mr. Blannerhasset's boat. The witness further stated that the arms which were sunk were sunk between Petit Gulph and Cole's Creek; that Colonel Burr was looked upon as the commander-in-chief of the expedition; that, in the night, his boat was distinguished by two lanterns, placed one above another, whereas the rest had but one; and that, in the day time, handkerchiefs were hoisted in some of the boats, by way of flag.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. You say your furlough was for twenty days? Answer. It was.

Question. After the expiration of this furlough, were you not advertised as a deserter? Answer. I was.

Question. Were you taken up. Answer. I was not.

Question. When you got to Baton Rouge, did you write to General Wilkinson? Answer. I did.

Question. What did you write?

Answer. That my furlough had been taken from me; and that, if he would send me a furlough or a pardon, I would come on in three days.

Question. Did you promise to give any information against me? Answer. I did not.

Mr. Wirt observed that he was authorized by General Wilkinson to say that he had the original furlough given by Captain Bissel.

Mr. Martin. Did he send you a pardon? Answer. General Wilkinson wrote to me to come down.

Question. Have you that letter?

Answer. No; it was taken from me at Baton Rouge; Governor Folk has it at this moment.

Question. Did you write to Captain Bissel?

Answer. I did; I mentioned to Captain Bissel that, as both of us might be injured by this transaction, if he would say that he had sent me as a spy, it would clear both him and myself.

Question. When were you discharged from the army?

Answer. I was not discharged in 1805, when I travelled with you.

Question. Why were you discharged? show your hand to the court.

Answer. There is my hand, (one of the fingers appeared to have been injured;) I can show my discharge; I procured a substitute, and many have liberty to procure them.

Mr. Hay. Hand me the discharge. [The witness accordingly presented it.*]

Mr. Burr. Did you come round with General Wilkinson? Answer. I did.

Question. Were you subpoenaed? Answer. I did not know I was.

Question. Who requested you to come round from New Orleans?

Answer. I came by request of General Wilkinson.

Question. Did he say for what? Answer. He said as a witness.

Question. You gave a deposition in New Orleans? Answer. Yes.

Question. At whose request? Answer. At General Wilkinson's.

Question. When I came down the Mississippi in 1805, by whose orders did I have the men?

Answer. I thought by General Wilkinson's.

Question. Had they arms? Answer. I think not.

Question. Had they colors? Answer. They had, and they were flying every day.

Question. Did you not tell me you expected your discharge? Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you not know that the soldiers at Chickasaw Bluffs wanted to go with me, and I refused them?

Answer. I recollect that you wanted me to get them to go, but I refused.

Question. Did you not tell me that some of them wanted to go? Answer. I mentioned one or two.

Question. Did any go? Answer. No.

Question. Why? Answer. You told me that the lieutenant and all would follow in a few days.

Mr. Wirt. This previous voyage you took the year before. Were they not troops of the United States?

Answer. They were.

Question. These soldiers; were they going where their company was?

Answer. The whole company were going to New Orleans; and this barge, with ten men, was sent on ahead.

Question. And this flag belonged to them? Answer. It did.

Mr. Wickham. Were they regimental colors? Answer. They were colors made for the barge.

Chief Justice. Did you tell Captain Bissel that Colonel Burr had applied to you to get the men to desert?

Answer. I did not.

Mr. Wirt. Did you not reject the proposition? Answer. I did.

At the request of the Chief Justice, the witness here described the particular manner in which the arms were unk. He said that they were so deep in the water as to prevent the boat from going within fifty yards of the shore. He also related his visit to Judge Bruin's, where Colonel Burr got the newspaper. He also stated, at the request of the court, the contents of his letter to General Wilkinson; that if he would send him the furlough, which Lieutenant Rodney had taken from him, or a pardon, he would be there in three days. General Wilkinson informed him that he had behaved very wrong in leaving the man he was going down with; but if he would come down, he should not be molested.

Mr. Wirt. Where did the party break up? Answer. A few miles below Cole's creek.

Question. How far is Cole's creek from Bayou Pierre? Answer. About twenty-five miles.

Question. When was it that this parting speech was made at Cole's creek?

Answer. About the 6th or 7th of February.

TUESDAY, September 22.

Jacob Dunbaugh was re-examined. He stated there were two keels and four batteaux; that Mr. Burr had told him, between Chickasaw Bluffs and Bayou Pierre, that his first object was to seize Baton Rouge, and make that his home until he could collect his forces, which he expected would amount to 10 or 12,000; he stated that Mr. Blannerhasset told him that Governor Ffolk, of Baton Rouge, would order the men to take the flints out of their guns; he said that some of the men went up the Red River.

Upon being cross-examined, he stated that he had made a deposition at New Orleans at the request, but not compulsion, of General Wilkinson; that he was well acquainted with the construction of batteaux; that they could go up stream, and that they were built for that purpose.

Evidence of Stephen S. Welch.

MONDAY, September 21.

Question. Were you at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. I was. I only joined there. I was there with a load, and Captain Berry wished me to join and go down the river to make a settlement, for that it was advantageous to young men. I said that I had no incumbrance; and, being a single man, I was willing to go.

Question. Who is Berry? Answer. John Berry, a man I met there.

Mr. Burr. He was called captain of the boat. Witness. He was appointed captain of the boat I went in. I agreed to go down. The proposition made to me by Captain Berry was to settle the Washita country; to have a certain portion of land, besides other compensation.

Question. What was it? Answer. Captain Berry offered me ten dollars a month; but I said I was not for hire, and, as I was a young man, would go as a volunteer.

Question. Did you descend the river with them? Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you recollect hearing any conversation from Mr. Burr to Mr. Floyd, on the subject of arms?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Did you go to Bayou Pierre? Answer. I did, and also to Natchez.

Question. What became of Mr. Blannerhasset?

Answer. I think he went down to Natchez with us. I think that the boat with his family aboard was struck on the point of an island above Natchez, and that I assisted to get her off. I did not see Mr. Blannerhasset there, but I was told that he went to Natchez.

On being further interrogated, the witness deposed that he was on the piece of ground cleared for exercising; that he was stationed there with sixteen or seventeen others as a guard to watch the boats, about 200 yards from it; that the boats were then on the west side of the Mississippi; that he understood, as the reason of this arrangement, that militia were expected to come and carry the boats to Cole's creek; that the orders of the guard were to let no one pass to the boats without giving the countersign "look sharp;" and to fire if any one attempted to pass, not with an intention of hitting them, but as an alarm to the boats; that a Mr. Noland from Berry's boat gave the orders, but he knew not who gave them to him; Noland was sometimes styled lieutenant, and sometimes ensign; that sentinels were placed out; who were relieved every two hours through the night, till daylight; the guard were not.

* The discharge states that, "having served three years and six months, and being permitted to procure a substitute in his place, J. D. is hereby discharged."

Question. Were you ever better informed about the object of this expedition? The witness said he had not been from those who had any authority, or who he supposed were better informed than himself; but there was a talk among the men that they were going to take Baton Rouge.

Question. Why did your impressions change?

Answer. The witness said that he did not know who was the first person that started such a conversation, but that he had first heard it from two or three or more who were talking in the bow of the boat; that he came forward and heard it; that it was further said that they were going to drag the men to Florida. Some of them were very much scared at the time. He further said that there were somewhere about one hundred men at the mouth of Cumberland; that they had no agricultural tools, no ploughs, hoes, or harrows, except edged tools to fell timber; that the search made by Captain Fitzpatrick was at the bayou below Bayou Pierre; that, being only in one boat when it was searched, he does not know whether the search was a fair one; that he never saw, but did hear, that arms had been sunk and concealed; that he saw, not heard, of the stopping a leak produced by two auger holes and ropes in the back part of the gunwale, in the cabin occupied by Mr. Burr; for that Mr. Pryor being unable to stop the leak, he had called him, and he had stopped it.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. Did you know Dean's boat?

Answer. It sailed with us in company from the mouth of Cumberland; but I do not certainly know whether it was connected with us.

Question. What became of Boyce's boat? Answer. It went down to Natchez.

Mr. Wirt. Who dismissed you from this party?

Answer. When the boats were stopped, and the eruption took place, I went down to Natchez.

Mr. Wirt. When Colonel Burr left the party, was there any ceremony of parting? any speech?

Answer. He did speak to them. He said he would have to leave them till he could see them again. I think he said his property was to be distributed among them.

Question. Was any thing said about wages; about the means of paying them? Answer. I don't recollect.

Mr. Burr. How did you come round from New Orleans? Answer. I came with General Wilkinson.

Question. Were you subpoenaed? Answer. I was.

Question. Had you any communication with General Wilkinson?

Answer. Not till after I had received the subpoena.

Question. Did you receive any money there? any from General Wilkinson?

Answer. Yes. I received ten dollars from General Wilkinson, to help me to bear my expenses as a witness.

Question. Did you give any deposition there?

Answer. None but some statement of my evidence taken down by General Wilkinson; but I did not give my qualification to it.

Samuel Mozley.

MONDAY, September 21.

Mr. Wirt. Were you with this party? Answer. I was.

Question. Where did you join them? Answer. At the falls of Ohio.

Question. Were you at the mouth of Cumberland? Answer. I was.

Question. In whose boat did you descend the river?

Answer. In Captain Berry's boat, which was built at the falls of the Ohio, and there joined the party. Major Floyd's boat also joined them there, besides a small batteau, which was not loaded with provisions, as the other two were.

Question. Did you not proceed down the river with the boats which came from Blannerhasset's island?

Answer. Yes; who were sometimes in company with them.

Question. How many men were at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. I suppose not more than one hundred.

Question. Did you see these men introduced to Colonel Burr? Answer. I did not.

Question. Nor heard his speech? Answer. I heard nothing about it till I got to New Orleans.

Question. Did you conceive that you belonged to this party? Answer. I did.

Question. With whom did you make an engagement?

Answer. With Mr. Berry of Indiana, twelve miles from Jeffersonville.

Question. What was the nature of that engagement?

Answer. To descend the Ohio and Mississippi, and to ascend the Red river, to settle the Washita lands. I was not certain whether these lands belonged to Colonel Burr or Mr. Lynch; but I supposed the latter. It was also stated, that, should our frontiers be invaded by the Spaniards, we were to render every assistance in our power to resist them.

Question. How many arms were in your boat? Answer. About eight or nine.

Question. How many men? Answer. About sixteen.

Question. Were you at the bayou below Bayou Pierre? Answer. I was.

Question. Did any thing of consequence occur there?

Answer. I do not know what you may deem important.

Question. Were there any guards stationed there?

Answer. There were; and for this purpose the militia were said to be crossing the river above us in rafts, and the guards were to give the alarm.

Question. Was any ground cleared to exercise men?

Answer. There was ground cleared, but I do not know for what purpose.

Question. How large a slip? Answer. About half an acre.

Question. To what purpose was it applied? Answer. I know not; but the guard were stationed there.

Question. Was it that the guard might stay there?

Answer. I know not; but when it was cleared I did not see the necessity of clearing it.

Question. What instructions were given to the guard?

Answer. I heard only from others, that if any one approached, they were to fire two guns; and then the guard were to go off in a small boat.

Question. Do you think the object of this enterprise was to settle lands?

Mr. Burr objected to such inquiries. How could the mere opinions of a witness have any influence in a court of justice? Might not those opinions be formed from idle rumors? Gentlemen have substantially asserted that four-fifths of the people of this State have been duped by such false rumors. The same means of deception were used in Kentucky; but they were not so easily duped as the gentleman represents the Virginians to have been.

Chief Justice. Let the question be proposed in this form: Did you see any thing in the party itself which induced you to think there was a different object?

Answer. I did not before the arrival of the militia, when I began to entertain doubts of the object.

Mr. Wirt. Was there any part of your engagement about a service of six months?

Answer. We were engaged for six months.

Mr. McRae. What service?

Answer. I am not certain. We were to stay there to settle land; and it was supposed the settlement would be made in that time.

Question. What consideration were you to receive?

Answer. Ten dollars a month and one hundred acres of land.

Mr. Wirt. Had you any manual exercise as you went down?

Answer. We had, on the roof of the boat, two or three times.

Question. The boats were roofed? Answer. Yes; they were flat on top; the exercise was of our own accord.

Mr. Hay. Did you see the same operation in other boats? Answer. I did not.

Mr. Wirt. Did you see any thing of the search by Colonel Fitzpatrick?

Answer. I was there. It happened at Thompson's bayou.

Question. Did Fitzpatrick see all the arms?

Answer. The muskets were taken from our boat before Colonel Fitzpatrick made the search.

Question. To what boat were they carried? Answer. I know not; but they were taken out of ours.

Question. Do you know any thing about the burying or concealing of arms? Answer. I do not.

Question. Do you know any thing of holes bored in the gunwales of Colonel Burr's boat? Answer. I do not.

Question. You were in your own boat, I suppose?

Answer. I was. We were at too great a distance from them to have seen any such occurrence.

Question. Do you know any thing of it from public conversation among the men?

Answer. I understood that the arms had been concealed. I heard it talked of in the company of the men, by different persons, that they were tied to a sawyer,* also that they were taken up the bayou and buried; and that they were concealed underneath Colonel Burr's boat.

No cross-examination.

Chandler Lindsley.

MONDAY, September 21.

Question. Where did you begin with your voyage?

Answer. I descended the river with Mr. Ellis from Pittsburg.

Question. What was the object of the voyage? Answer. Mr. Ellis called it a trading voyage.

Question. Did you join the party at the mouth of Cumberland? Answer. I did.

Question. What do you suppose was the force at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. I should suppose that there were about seventy or eighty men. The circle, to which Colonel Burr was introduced, consisted of thirty or forty; and I should suppose they composed about one half of the whole.

Question. Did you stop at Cincinnati? Answer. I did.

Question. Did you receive any information of the party there?

Answer. I heard that Colonel Burr had been there a day or two before, and had excited some consternation among the people there.

Question. Did you stop at the falls of the Ohio?

Answer. The water was low, and occasioned us to remain there two or three days.

Question. Was any of the party there?

Answer. Mr. Kibby was there, engaging men to settle the Washita land.

Question. Do you recollect his Christian name? Answer. I do not.

Question. On what terms did he wish to engage?

Answer. Mr. Kibby stated to us the articles of agreement. They were nearly the same as those which Mr. Moxley has described.

Question. Were there any signatures to the articles? Answer. There were about ten or twelve.

Question. What were the terms?

Answer. It obligated them to go down the Ohio and Mississippi, and ascend the Red River to the mouth of Black River, and those waters, up to the Washita river; and it was annexed, that if the frontier was invaded, they were to resist.

Question. Did you descend the Mississippi?

Answer. I went to Natchez with Major Floyd and Ralston, and about fifteen others, in a keel boat, purchased by Colonel Burr of Mr. Ellis.

Question. What was in that boat? Answer. Bar-iron, hoes, mattocks, and a few barrels of apples.

Question. Do you know where the bar-iron and other articles were obtained?

Answer. Yes; they were purchased by Colonel Burr of Mr. Ellis, at the mouth of Cumberland.

Mr. Wirt. Was Mr. Ellis's being there accidental?

Answer. At the time Mr. Ellis was at the falls, Major Floyd talked of making a contract with Mr. Ellis for these articles: he did not, however, buy them, but told Mr. Ellis that he would see Colonel Burr on the river, and he was confident that the colonel would purchase the whole.

Question. Where were these articles from? Answer. From Pittsburg.

Mr. Wirt. My object is to ascertain, sir, whether Burr's meeting with Ellis was in consequence of any previous arrangement between them, or the mere effect of accident. Can you inform me as to the point? Was Mr. Ellis's voyage preconcerted with Col. Burr?

Answer. Mr. Ellis, sir, was on a general trading voyage.

Mr. Hay. How many of those articles were there?

Answer. I know not. Mr. Ellis has, I believe, an inventory of them; and he is here.

Mr. Wirt. Was Mr. Blannerhasset at the mouth of Cumberland when the tools were purchased?

Answer. He was.

* A sawyer is the log of a tree, or a whole tree, fixed to one end in the bottom of the Mississippi, and plays up and down with the current like a man who is sawing timber.

Question. Was any proposition made to you to join the party? Answer. There was.

Question. Who made it?

Answer. Colonel Tyler asked me. I told him that if there was nothing hostile in their views, and there was a prospect of gain, I would join. He said if there was any thing hostile, he would be as far from it as any man.

Question. Did you not join?

Answer. I did. I had a right to withdraw whenever I pleased. The greater part of Colonel Tyler's men were, I think, on the same terms.

Mr. Hay. Why did you make that reservation? Answer. From the reports which were then in circulation.

Mr. Wirt. What were the terms?

Answer. I joined on the same terms as the other young men who were with him. Colonel Tyler told me he was going to settle Washita land, and those who went on first were at liberty to purchase land.

Mr. Hay. For what time did you engage? Answer. I was at liberty to leave them whenever I pleased.

Mr. Wirt. Did you hear any observations from Colonel Burr at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. Only a few words. He said that he had intended to have communicated his designs at that place, but that certain reasons prevented him. I understood him to say that Colonel Tyler, Major Smith, and Floyd would make those reasons known to us.

Mr. Wirt. Do you know any thing of the transactions at Thompson's bayou? Answer. I was not there.

No cross-examination.

Chandler Lindsley again called.

SATURDAY, October 3, 1806.

Colonel Burr. Do you know whether Dunbaugh, after his examination, had an opportunity of seeing his deposition?

Answer. I recollect sometime in June, he said he could recollect his affidavit given in New Orleans, verbatim. He said he had a copy of it. Some time afterwards he was in his chamber, and I was passing by or was in the same room with him, and I saw him on the bed with a paper in his hand. I asked him if it was a copy of his affidavit, and he said yes.

Question. Did you afterwards see it in his hand. Answer. No.

Mr. Martin. At what time did you see him with that paper?

Answer. In the month of June, previous to his examination before the grand jury.

Mr. Hay. Where do you reside?

Answer. My former residence was in Connecticut.

Question. Where is it now?

Answer. I have no fixed place, but expect to return to Bristol in Connecticut.

Mr. Wirt. Is that the place of your nativity? Answer. Yes.

Examination of John Mulhollan.

MONDAY, September 21, 1806.

Witness. Do you wish me to state where I joined the party? Mr. Hay. Yes.

Witness. I joined Mr. Tyler and Mr. Smith at Beaver, in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Hay. Was there any agreement between you, or what was your reason for joining them?

Answer. My first reason was, my meeting with a William Davis, from the back part of the State of New York. He said that he was going down with a party to see the country. I wished, too, to see the country, but Mr. Davis told me he could not engage me, but he would go to Beaver and mention me to Mr. Tyler. When Davis got to Meadville, he met with Major Smith, to whom he communicated my wishes, and informed him that I was at Waterford. Major Smith called on me at Waterford, presented me with Mr. Davis's compliments, and informed me that Mr. Davis and himself would be pleased to see me at Beaver. There I met with Mr. Tyler; he told me that he had an idea of going up the Red River to settle land.

Question. Did he mention Colonel Burr's name?

Answer. He did not mention his name while we were at Beaver.

Question. And why did you go? Answer. I felt much disposed to see the country.

Question. Was there no particular contract made with you? Answer. Not at that time.

Mr. Wirt. Was there any agency given you to engage men or provisions?

Answer. I was sent back to Waterford to hurry on salt for salting provisions that were expected at Beaver. I was also to engage what men I could; they were to find themselves in clothes and blankets.

Question. Did you engage any men? Answer. Yes, several; about fifteen from Meadville.

Question. What terms did you hold out to those men?

Answer. That they were to ascend the Red River.

Question. Were no lands promised them? no compensation? Answer. None.

Question. What instructions did you give them; or were they to go to Tyler?

Answer. They were to go to Colonel Tyler, at the mouth of Beaver, for such instructions as he thought proper.

Question. Did you receive any instructions as to the kind of men you were to engage? Answer. None.

Question. As to the young or old? Answer. I would not, of course, engage old men.

Question. Any with families?

Answer. Some with families did go; I was allowed to take any I thought proper.

Question. Did you go to Blannerhasset's island? Answer. I did.

Question. Was it known at Beaver that the Marietta boats were to be of the party?

Answer. It was not. I knew that Blannerhasset was to join, but I believe the boat I was in would not have stopped at the island, had it not been grounded.

Question. Did Blannerhasset go with you from the island? Answer. He did.

Question. Was there any difficulty about his going with you? was any vote taken?

Answer. Major Tyler and Smith asked us if we were willing that he should go with us; and we said we had no objection. It was mentioned among us, that he was under some apprehension of a mob arresting him.

Question. Was there any rumor or alarm among you about the militia of Kanawha or Wood county?

Answer. We had heard that there was a mob coming, and we were determined to resist them; but we should not have resisted the militia with legal authority.

Question. What do you mean by "legal authority?" do you mean that if they had a warrant from the civil authority, you would not have resisted?

Answer. Such was our meaning; but we would have resisted a mob.

Question. What do you mean by a mob?

Answer. If the mob had come, we should have asked for the authority under which they acted; and if they had none, they should have gone away without gaining their intentions.

Question. Was there any preparation made for resistance?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question. Any bullets run?

Answer. There were; but they were to kill game and shoot at marks, which we frequently did on the river.

Question. Where were you joined by other boats?

Answer. By two of Mr. Floyd's, at the falls of the Ohio.

Question. Did you see any arms?

Answer. There were about thirty-five or thirty-six muskets or stands of arms, which I saw when we got to the Mississippi.

Question. Any arms of any other description, such as rifles?

Answer. There were three or four rifles.

Question. What particularly happened on going down the river?

Answer. At Shawneetown there was an address drawn up to the Washita or Western Land Speculation Company, tendering our services in any legal and honorable enterprise. This was signed by all of Tyler's party.

Question. Who formed that company?

Answer. There were no names mentioned in the address; but I considered Colonel Burr as one, though his name was not mentioned.

Question. Who drew up the address?

Answer. Major Tyler and Smith.

Question. Are the phrases "legal and honorable enterprise," repeated from memory? Answer. They are.

Question. Was it presented by Tyler and Smith? Answer. It was.

Question. How many signers were to it? Answer. About thirty or thirty-two.

Question. Had you any assurance that the plan would be disclosed to you at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. None from those who had a right to be informed. Such, however, was the talk among the men as we went down.

Question. When you were at the mouth of Cumberland, were you introduced to Colonel Burr?

Answer. I was, on the 27th December. We arrived there on the 26th.

Question. What took place on this introduction?

Answer. Nothing particular.

Question. At this introduction did the party form any thing like the three sides of a square?

Answer. They did.

Question. Was he introduced along the line?

Answer. He was, to the men, one by one.

Question. After this ceremony, was there any speech from Colonel Burr?

Answer. I was not near enough to hear what he said, but I understand he said he would impart something at another time.

Question. Did you receive any instructions to run bullets and make cartridges?

Answer. One day, while we were in the Mississippi, Colonel Burr came into our boat, and asked whether there was any one there that could make cartridges? I told him that I never had made any, but I believed I could make them, and I made three or four dozen.

Question. Did Colonel Burr act as the head of the party?

Answer. I considered him as such.

Question. Did you understand that the real object was to settle Washita lands?

Answer. It was so stated.

Question. Was there no occurrence or particular conversation which induced you to believe there was a different object?

Mr. Botts. Was there any conversation in the presence of Colonel Burr?

Answer. It was not a general conversation.

Mr. Hay. Is it a fact, or is it not a fact, that many of the men did suppose there was a different object?

Answer. I do not recollect, nor did I attend to them; because I did not suppose they knew more about it than myself.

Question. Do you know any thing about the seizing of Baton Rouge?

Answer. I never heard it before we got below Bayou Pierre, and then there were some conversations among the men about it; but I did not hear it suggested by any person that there was any design of invading any part of the United States, nor did I ever hear any thing from Colonel Burr, or any of the leaders, about invading Mexico.

The counsel for the accused said that it was unnecessary to make any statement on that subject.

Mr. Hay. The present inquiry relates as well to the misdemeanor as to the treason.

Mr. Martin. We have never heard of such a charge before.

Mr. Hay observed that he had also reduced this charge to writing, and had notified its existence to one of the opposite counsel, though it had never been publicly read in court. The clerk then read the paper in the following terms:

"The attorney of the United States for the Virginia district charges Aaron Burr, Herman Blannerhasset, and Israel Smith, with a misdemeanor against the United States, in beginning, or setting on foot, or preparing, or providing the means of a military expedition or enterprise, against Mexico, a province in North America of the King of Spain, with whom the United States are at peace."

Mr. Hay. It is immaterial, besides, whether this charge has been preferred; because, though the charge actually alleged is treason, yet, if the other crime should occur during the investigation of the evidence, it is the province of the court to inquire into it.

Chief Justice. It would certainly be unnecessary to re-examine the same witnesses a second time.

Mr. Wirt. Did you then hear nothing of the Mexican invasion?

Answer. I did not, from any leading characters.

Mr. Hay. Who did you consider as the leading characters?

Answer. Colonel Burr, Tyler, Smith, Blannerhasset, and Floyd.

Question. Had you not been informed of the plan by the President's proclamation?

Answer. That did not reach us before we got to Bayou Pierre.

Question. Were you at Thompson's bayou? Answer. I was.

Question. Do you know any thing of the ground that was cleared for exercising the men?

Answer. I assisted in clearing it.

Mr. Burr. The witness does not, perhaps, attend to the question: Was this ground cleared for exercising the men?

Answer. There was a talk that it was for that purpose; but I do not know whether it was for that.

Mr. Wirt. Do you say that the men never exercised there?

Answer. Never to my knowledge.

Question. Do you know any thing of the guard?

Answer. Yes. Sometimes, in the afternoon, a young man came up the river in a canoe, and said there were four hundred militia, without any authority, coming to destroy the boats that night. This was told to Colonel Burr, and we determined to get out of their way, if possible. Major Floyd concluded to put out sentinels to give us information of their approach. The signal was to be the firing of a gun.

Mr. Wirt. I understand this bayou is below Bayou Pierre? Answer. It is.

Question. I understood you also that you did not receive the President's proclamation before you arrived at Bayou Pierre?

Answer. I said that you had not reached us before we got to Bayou Pierre; but I am not certain whether it was there that we received it.

Chief Justice. Had you received the proclamation before the guard was put out?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Mr. Burr. Was it not afterwards?

Answer. I do not recollect; I heard that it was contained in some newspaper, perhaps in your boat.

Mr. Wirt. Do you know any thing of the search?

Answer. I do; I was in our boat at that time. When Colonel Fitzpatrick came, Colonel Tyler lifted the curtain, and he was introduced. We did not once change our posture.

Question. How many arms did he find there?

Answer. There were a couple of rifles belonging to a Mr. Lamb, and some pistols.

Question. Did you hear of the searching of the other boats?

Answer. I did not trouble myself about them.

Question. Did you hear of the sinking of arms? Answer. I did not.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Wirt. How many guns had you at Beaver? Answer. Five rifles.

Question. Did you see any more guns at any other time? Answer. I did not.

Question. Among the four boats that went from the island, how many?

Answer. Not more than five that I saw.

Question. Did you stop accidentally at the island?

Answer. I supposed so at first; but I afterwards understood that Colonel Tyler and Mr. Blannerhasset were connected.

Question. How much powder had you with you? Answer. About twenty-five pounds.

Question. Did you not borrow from one another? Answer. We did.

Question. Was the powder scarce among you at last? Answer. It was.

Question. Was there any game killed?

Answer. I believe two deer were killed at the time we were at the island.

Question. Was there any disturbance on the island? Answer. None.

Question. Had you any reason to believe that any of that party would have assisted in any unlawful design?

Answer. None.

Question. Did you see a printed report by Mr. Fitzpatrick? Answer. No.

Question. Did you understand that the country was much alarmed there? Answer. They were.

Question. And that the party was to be mobbed? Answer. Yes.

Question. That they were coming on board at night with tomahawks and knives? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Would not the militia have suffered extremely if I had not fed them?

Answer. I know that you sent over provisions to them.

Question. How many of them were there? Answer. About seventy.

Question. Did you not understand that I had made a treaty with Cowles Mead, for the preservation of my people?

Answer. I did not know it.

Question. Who sent us word that we must move down to the mouth of Cole's creek?

Answer. Major Fleehearty. The answer from Major Floyd was, that he must get more militia.

Mr. Burr. This was a piece of impertinence in Fleehearty; for it was after the stipulations entered into between Mr. Mead and myself. I was at that time fifty miles off, at Washington, Mississippi Territory, where I went to stand a trial.

Mr. Blannerhasset. Did you hear of any report about arresting me on the night I left my island?

Answer. I did hear something about it, but I believe it was not before the next morning.

Question. By whom? the militia? Answer. No.

Mr. Hay. Did you not hear of an arrest by General Tupper?

Answer. I did not; but the morning after I left the island, Mr. Blannerhasset himself mentioned that he understood there was a writ or warrant to do it, and asked us if we were willing to take him along after that was out.

Mr. Wirt. Was Major Fleehearty a militia officer? Answer. He seemed so, from his dress.

Mr. Burr. Was there not a good deal of talk about a Spanish war?

Answer. Yes. I saw a good deal about it myself in the newspapers.

Evidence of Hugh Allen.

TUESDAY, September 22.

Mr. Hay. Where did you embark? Answer. I embarked at Beaver, with Major Tyler and Smith.

Question. On what terms?

Answer. Mr. Tyler and Mr. Smith told me they were going to settle lands; and that whatever profits they shared I should share, I bearing an equal proportion of the expenses.

Question. How many men did you see at the mouth of Cumberland? Answer. About seventy.

Question. Was that the whole party?

Answer. Perhaps there might be more. Mr. Tyler's party was about forty; and Mr. Floyd's about thirty or forty; so there were, in all, about seventy or eighty.

Question. How many men came with Mr. Burr to the mouth of Cumberland? Answer. I do not know.

Mr. Wirt. Did Tyler's and Floyd's parties arrive there together? Answer. We got there first, by a few hours.

Question. When did you arrive there? Answer. On the evening of the 26th of December.

Question. Had Colonel Burr a party like Tyler and Floyd?

Answer. There were a number of boats there which I understood were Colonel Burr's.

Question. Did any thing occur to change your opinion of the object of this enterprise?

Answer. The only ground of my ever changing my opinion was, when I understood that the Government designed to arrest Colonel Burr.

Mr. Hay. And do you think that men would have left the better part of the world to go and settle a wilderness? Why did you go?

Answer. I made my calculations on this subject; Mr. Tyler and Mr. Smith had said that the object was the settlement of lands which would be profitable.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. How many guns were in your boats? Answer. Five rifles, and one fusee gun.

Question. Did you get any more except at Blannerhasset's island? Answer. None.

Question. Did you ever see muskets and bayonets in those boats? Answer. Never.

Question. What was the construction of the boats? Were they able to go up the stream?

Answer. They were.

Question. Did you ever see any boats that could go up the stream with them?

Answer. I never saw the experiment tried.

Question. Do you know whether I had a single man at the mouth of Cumberland with me, except Dunnahue, the pilot?

Answer. I do not know him, nor how many were with you.

[Mr. Burr here stated that he had hired hands at Nashville to bring him down to the mouth of Cumberland.]

Mr. Burr. Were you present when I was introduced to the party?

Answer. I was; when you were introduced, you said you had intended saying something to us then, but for certain reasons of your own you had deferred it.

Question. Did I say that I had any thing like secrets to disclose? Answer. You did not.

Question. Had you any reason to suspect that any of the party meditated hostility against the United States?

Answer. Never.

Question. What do you call the captain of a boat? is it not every man who stands at the helm?

Answer. The way was to make him captain who is supposed to be the best waterman.

Question. How are new countries settled? Is it not the way to send a party on before, to explore it, and prepare for the reception of others?

Answer. I never settled a new country; but I suppose that is the way.

Mr. Wirt. Ay! that is an historical fact, for which we had better apply to the general records of nations.

Question. Did you see any powder on Blannerhasset's island?

Answer. I saw a quarter cask with about 25 lbs. of powder.

Mr. Burr. Did you use that continually on the river?

Answer. Those who chose did.

Question. Did you know of any more powder on board the other boats?

Answer. None, till latterly.

Question. Were there not some kegs of biscuit? Answer. Yes.

Question. Were there any bullets in barrels?

Answer. All the bullets I saw were in canisters on Blannerhasset's island.

Mr. Wirt. Had you any reason to believe that you were going to New Orleans?

Answer. Not before I got to Natchez, when I determined myself to go down.

WEDNESDAY, September 23.

On account of Mr. Fisk's indisposition, the following deposition was taken and read:

The affidavit of David Fisk, of lawful age, who being first sworn before me, Daniel L. Hylton, a justice of the peace for the county of Henrico, saith: that some time in the month of September, 1806, a certain Davis Floyd, of the Indiana Territory, came to this affiant, and asked him if he did not wish to take a voyage down the river with him during the course of the fall or winter; that he was going to settle a new country, the Washita, on the Red River. This happened either the next day, or a few days after Colonel Burr had left Jeffersonville, the residence of the said Floyd. At that time this affiant did not tell him whether he would go or not; but about two or three weeks afterwards he did agree to go, the said Floyd having several times mentioned what a fine chance there would be for him; that they would not agree to give to any one man more than twelve dollars a month, and one hundred and fifty acres of land at the end of six months, besides clothes and provisions; but as he and this affiant were well acquainted, if he would have a confidence in him, he would do something very clever for him; and if they succeeded in their object, there would be fortunes made for all that went. This affiant asked what other object they had besides settling the Washita land. The said Floyd answered, that there was a new road to be cut a great distance, and several houses to be built, which would be a very profitable undertaking. No positive bargain was made between the said Floyd and this affiant. On the 16th of December, 1806, this affiant moved down the river from the falls of the Ohio, in the Indiana Territory, with the said Davis Floyd, with two boats and one batteau, which the said Floyd had built there. On the same day, just as they were about to start, they were joined by Herman Blannerhasset, Comfort Tyler, and Israel Smith, with four batteaux and a number of men; the exact number he cannot state, nor does he know the number that started with the said Floyd; but when the boats joined Colonel Aaron Burr at the mouth of Cumberland, (which was of a Saturday night, either on Christmas night or the first Saturday after Christmas,) he understood that the whole number of men, including those of the said Aaron Burr, were one hundred and three. After the boats had left the falls of the Ohio three or four days, he discovered for the first time, on board one of said Floyd's boats, a chest and a box, the former of which, it afterwards appeared, contained muskets and bayonets, a few fuses, and blunderbusses and pistols; the latter rifles. A day or two afterwards, the said Floyd inquired of the men if they did not want, each of them, a gun to take care of; that he had some there which he was afraid would get rusty. The chest and box were then opened, and all the arms taken out and cleaned, and some of them occasionally used by the men in hunting as they went down the river. There were, as near as he can judge, between twenty-five and thirty muskets with bayonets, two or three fuses, three or four blunderbusses, ten pairs of pistols, and about eight or ten rifles. Some short time after the boats had joined Col. Burr, and before they had got into the Mississippi river, while this affiant was lying sick on his trunk, he heard the said Floyd tell several of the men that they were going to take Baton Rouge and Mexico; this affiant asked how they were going to do it with so few men; the said Floyd answered, that a large party of men were to join us at Natchez, and General Wilkinson and his army were to join us at the mouth of Red River. Nothing of importance occurred till the boats got down to Bayou Pierre. A day or two before their arrival there, Colonel Burr took a boat and four or five men, and went on ahead, as this affiant understood, to do some business, which he expected to do before the boats got down. Floyd's boat, in which he went himself, and in which this affiant was, arrived there on a Sunday morning, and the other boats not till the evening. On our arrival, Colonel Burr was standing on the bank of the river, about a mile above the town; some short time after the men from our boat went ashore, this affiant saw Colonel Burr and a certain Robert A. New (who had the charge of Floyd's boat in his absence, he having then gone to Natchez,) talking together for some time. The said New then came on board our boat, and called all the men into it, and said he understood they were all going to be stopped, and inquired of them whether they would stand by Colonel Burr and go on, or quit. Most of the men were for going on, but two or three were for quitting. In the course of that day, this affiant mentioned to the said New that he mistrusted they were going upon some unlawful scheme. He assured him that they were not, that nothing was going to take place but what was lawful and countenanced by the Government. After dark the boats were removed over to the other side of the river. This affiant inquired the reason of their being removed, and was answered by the said New, that there was a party of men coming to take them, and it was best for them to make their escape. The boats lay seven or eight days at that place, and then moved about six miles lower down. While the boats were lying there, they were searched by several military officers, by the permission of Colonel Burr; but the night before they were searched, all the muskets and pistols, except a few pairs belonging to individuals, were taken out; the rifles were left. This affiant never knew what became of the muskets and pistols; some of the men said they were sunk in the river; others that they were hid in the woods. One night, while the boats were lying at the place, a young man came and said there were three or four hundred men crossing above us, and many below us, and that we should all be taken. A guard was posted at some distance from the encampment on that night, but what their orders were this affiant does not know, as he was not one of the number. After our removal from this place, Colonel Burr went to the town of Washington to stand his trial; but it not coming on, he returned. He remained with the party one night, then went again to take his trial, and did not return till it was over. He remained with the boats one day, told the men that he had stood his trial and was acquitted; but that they were going to take him again, and he was going to flee from oppression. He said that what property there was the men might sell, and make the most they could of; and if there was not enough to satisfy them, they might go to the Washita land, and take up what land they wanted, and go to work upon it. The boats and provisions were taken to Natchez, and part of them sold, and part of the provisions stored which would not readily sell, and the money divided among the men. The boats were different in their construction from any this affiant had ever seen, rather larger than were usual on those waters; and such of them as were sold, brought seventy-five dollars apiece; the usual price of boats being from twenty to thirty dollars. But there was a great demand for boats at that time to freight cotton down the river.

Question. After the boats and men had joined Colonel Burr at the mouth of Cumberland, who appeared to have the command of the expedition?

Answer. It was generally understood that the expedition was under the command of Colonel Burr; but I do not recollect to have heard him give any orders, except as to the sale of the boats and provisions, after we were stopped; though I often saw him in conversation with Blannerhasset, Tyler, Smith, Floyd, and New, and supposed that he communicated his orders to them.

DAVID FISK.

HENRICO COUNTY, &c.

Sworn to before me, in due form, agreeably to law, this 22d September, 1807.

DANIEL L. HYLTON.

Question by defendant. How did you understand the number of men to be one hundred and three?

Answer. From some of the men; I never counted them. This included the men in all the boats at the island.

Question. How many men came with Colonel Burr?

Answer. I do not know, but not more than three or four, I believe.

Question. Do you include Dean's, Ellis's, and Boyce's boats? Answer. Yes.

Question. Where did the conversation with Floyd, about Mexico and Baton Rouge, take place? and was Colonel Burr, Blannerhasset, or Smith, present?

Answer. I do not recollect at what place it happened; but neither of the three gentlemen named above was present.

Question. Was Colonel Burr present when the boats were searched, or was he then at Washington?

Answer. He was with the boats.

Question. Did Blannerhasset have any command over any of the boats?

Answer. None, except his own boat, which was in company.

Question. Did you not, at this time, expect a war with Spain?

Answer. I did; it was the general expectation of the party.

Question. How did you understand Mr. Floyd, as to Mexico and Baton Rouge?

Answer. I expected we were going on in the event of war, and that we should be joined by the army of the United States.

Question. Were you not told that, in the event of no war, you were to settle the Washita lands?

Answer. Yes; and, after we were stopped, Colonel Burr advised us to proceed and make the settlement.

SEPTEMBER 23.

The foregoing questions were put to Mr. David Fisk by the counsel for Colonel Burr, and his answers thereto sworn to in my presence, a justice of the peace for the city of Richmond.

ANDERSON BARRET.

Evidence of Alexander Henderson of Wood county.

About the last of August, or first of September, 1806, Mr. Blannerhasset wrote to me that he and Mrs. Blannerhasset intended to visit my family in the course of a few days. On the day appointed he and Mrs. Blannerhasset came in company with my brother John. After taking some refreshment, Mr. Blannerhasset entered into some conversation about the severance of the Union; he mentioned the advantages that would arise to the people in the Western country from a separation; that we were paying three or four millions of dollars towards the support of the present Government, when with one hundred thousand we might support a Government of our own. He mentioned Colonel Burr's name, as a man of brilliant or splendid talents, as well as of great goodness of heart; (or some expression of that sort;) that he had made the fortunes of hundreds without at all advancing his own; he mentioned, as an instance, the Manhattan Bank and Company. This conversation took place before dinner. After dinner a walk was proposed to my mill. I objected to it, as I was weak, and not able to walk. Mr. Blannerhasset mentioned that I was as well able to walk as himself, and insisted that I should go along with my brother and himself. Shortly after we got into the meadow Mr. Blannerhasset mentioned that he had a great deal of confidence in my brother and myself. We assured him that we should not betray it, and that it was not misplaced. He then mentioned that, under the auspices (I think that was the expression) of Colonel Burr, a separation of the Union was contemplated; that no particular line of division had as yet been fixed on, whether it was to be the Allegany, or whether or not the South Branch of the Potomac; (I well recollect that he mentioned the rich settlement on the South Branch was to be included;) that New Orleans was to be seized; the bank or banks of New Orleans to be seized; that all the military stores in that country were to be seized; that a park of artillery, at or near New Orleans, which was said to belong to the French, (I think fifty pieces,) and which Mr. Jefferson was too economical to purchase, was also to be seized, and that country revolutionized in the course of nine months. He mentioned that the principal characters throughout the Union were acquainted with or concerned (I do not recollect which) in the enterprise; that the officers of the army and navy were secured. He mentioned General Eaton as being engaged; Mr. John Graham; Mr. Alston, Colonel Burr's son-in-law, as enamored of the scheme. He mentioned other names, I think, but I cannot recollect any, except Robert G. Harper, who was either concerned or engaged. My brother asked Mr. Blannerhasset what kind of Government was intended to be established? Mr. Blannerhasset mentioned that it was not yet determined on, but a more energetic one than the present was contemplated. My brother asked him if any foreign Power was to be engaged in it? He said that there was not. My brother asked him, if John Randolph, member of Congress, was acquainted with and engaged in it? Did I mention that Mr. Blannerhasset said that he himself had embarked in the scheme? Mr. Blannerhasset replied that Mr. Randolph was not. He mentioned the great advantages that would arise to those who took an early and active part in this enterprise. Mr. Blannerhasset then mentioned his own property.

Mr. Wirt. What it was worth?

Answer. Yes. He mentioned that he was a partner in the firm of Dudley Woodbridge & Co.; that he had property in the funds of Great Britain. He mentioned that he had five thousand dollars (I think such was his statement) in the hands of a gentleman in Philadelphia or New York; that he had a suit against Mr. Woodbridge's father, in Marietta, for some five or ten thousand dollars, I do not remember which. He valued his property on the island at fifty thousand dollars. I do not recollect of any other particular communication from Mr. Blannerhasset.

Mr. Hay. With what view did you understand this detail of his property was made?

Answer. Shall I tell you my impressions? I have omitted one particular expression of his as relating to his English funds; "that they could not get at them."

Mr. Wirt. Did he say who they were?

Answer. He did not; but I supposed the Government of the United States, in case of hostilities.

Mr. McRae. Did you understand with what view it was he spoke of his other property?

Mr. Martin objected to any such interrogatories about the impressions or inferences of a witness. If the publication of this trial goes to Europe, what a contemptible opinion will it afford of our judiciary proceedings!

Chief Justice. Was there any thing else, besides what you have stated, from which you made this inference?

Answer. Nothing else.

Mr. McRae. Was there any thing calculated to make a particular impression on your mind?

Answer. My impression, from his statement, was, that he intended to show, if he risked so much property, that we might surely risk the little that we had.

Mr. Wirt. Will you state the answer you made to this application?

Answer. We did not positively tell Mr. Blannerhasset that we would join in the enterprise, but that we must take time to consider it; that we had relations on this side of the mountains, whom we must consult.

Mr. Wirt. Did Mr. Blannerhasset mention the effect this revolution would have on Wood county?

Answer. He said that it could not long remain neutral, and that we must take an active part for or against.

Mr. Blannerhasset. Do you mean Wood county?

Answer. I mean that part of the country.

WEDNESDAY, September 23, 1806.

Mr. Wirt. Could you understand why your brother inquired whether John Randolph was not concerned?

Answer. Because Mr. Blannerhasset had mentioned that the leading characters in the Union were concerned, and we considered John Randolph as a man of great character, and a leading man.

Mr. Wirt. Did you understand whether he said any thing of Mr. Jefferson?

Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset said, if Mr. Jefferson was any way impertinent, that Colonel Burr would tie him neck and heels, and throw him into the Potomac.

Question. What did he say of his means of opposition to the Government?

Answer. He mentioned that, with three pieces of artillery and three hundred sharp shooters, he could defend any pass in the Allegany mountains that he had seen, against any force the Government could send against him.

Mr. Wirt. Did he show you any composition he was about to publish?

Answer. He showed me the first and second numbers of the Querist, which he intended to publish; at all events he showed me one, which he read to me, and then gave it to me to read the over night; I kept it all night and returned it to him next morning.

Mr. Hay. Did he say that he had written those pieces? Answer. So I understood.

Mr. Wirt. Did he say that he was going to publish them?

Answer. He said that he was going to Marietta next day to attend to the publication; for that the printer was a timid man, and required to be backed.

Question. What did you inform him about your own intentions?

Answer. We informed him that we knew not whether we could or could not join in the scheme; we, however, told Mr. Blannerhasset that he must not consider us as in any way committed.

Mr. Wirt. Do you recollect he if told you what particular circumstances would prevent your long remaining neutral? was it any commercial arrangement?

Answer. I think he said that, being in possession of the New Orleans county and the mouth of the river, we could not long remain neutral.

Question. Do you carry your produce to market through that channel? Answer. We do not.

Mr. Hay. He said that Mr. Graham was engaged; had you seen Mr. Graham on the subject?

Answer. I had not seen Mr. Graham for eight or ten years before; but I saw him a short time after this interview. On the 20th of November I received a letter from Mr. Graham, earnestly requesting an interview with me at the mouth of Little Kanawha. I met him there on the 22d. I must confess that I felt every inclination to disclose this secret to him when I first met him, but I did not conceive myself justifiable, because I had promised to keep this communication secret. Considering, however, that Mr. Blannerhasset had positively assured me that Mr. Graham was positively concerned in it, I asked him first if he was concerned in any scheme with Colonel Burr down the river. He said he was not; and, moreover, that he was authorized to prevent and arrest any such illegal proceedings. I did, then, conceive myself justified in communicating to him the substance of the scheme. Before this time, about the 1st of October, we had determined to oppose the scheme; and went down to the mouth of Kanawha to inform Mr. Blannerhasset of our intentions, but he was gone down to Kentucky, perhaps with Mr. and Mrs. Alston; and we then sent a message to that effect to Mrs. Blannerhasset, that they might not be deceived as to our intentions. At the same time, my brother and myself proposed a meeting of the citizens of Wood county, in order to obtain the sense of the people on what course they ought to pursue.

Mr. Hay. And was there a meeting? Answer. There was.

Question. Did you come to any resolutions? Answer. We did.

Mr. McRae. What was the substance of them?

Answer. That we were determined to support the constituted authorities of our country.

Mr. Martin. And were the resolutions published?

Answer. They were, I think, in a paper published in Morgantown.

Mr. Hay. Do you know Blannerhasset's writing? Answer. I am not certain.

Question. Did you ever see him write? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Did you receive those two letters from him? Answer. I did.

Mr. Hay. This letter, dated on the 31st August, mentions his intentions to visit you.

Witness. It may not be improper to state what gave occasion to that second letter. Mrs. Blannerhasset insisted on taking my little boy home for two or three weeks with her family; I agreed to it reluctantly. Three or four days after they had left us, I sent my overseer for my boy, who brought the child, with that second letter from Mr. Blannerhasset. This second letter covered an extract from a Marietta paper, signed "Querist," relative to the "Western World," and referred to in that letter.

Mr. Wirt. Do you know Peter Taylor? what is his character?

Answer. I have heard no one speak of him but Mr. Blannerhasset, who spoke of him in very high terms.

Question. What is your brother's name? John G. Henderson? Answer. Yes.

Question. Did he not represent Wood county? Answer. He did some years ago.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Blannerhasset. Have you not been a representative of Wood county? Answer. Yes.

Question. You lived in Wood county some time before I knew you? Answer. I did.

Question. Had you any reasons for not cultivating my acquaintance sooner?

Answer. I had: the reasons were partly private, and partly political: I have no objection to state those reasons: the political reason, that you were a democrat, and I was opposed to the present administration.

Question: Do you not recollect that I opposed the election of your brother, J. G. Henderson; and that my vote was refused?

Answer. I do: for I then personated my brother.

Question. Do you not recollect that it was refused because I had at that time no deed for my land?

Answer. I do.

Question. Do you not recollect that I had the honor of voting for you on a subsequent occasion?

Answer. I do.

Question. Was it not after that election that our acquaintance was formed?

Answer. It was; before that election I do not recollect to have known you.

Alexander Henderson's cross-examination continued.

THURSDAY, September 24, 1806.

Mr. Blannerhasset. Do you recollect, at the time of our conversation, you expressed any personal dislike of Colonel Burr? Did you not express a sense of hostility towards him?

Answer. I am sorry that the gentleman has put the question; I am sorry to wound any man's feelings wantonly. But I always thought him a dangerous man, and the late occurrences have not at all changed my opinion.

Mr. Martin. How long has your opinion of him been formed?

Answer. Ten or fifteen years ago, when he was making the tour of Virginia.

Mr. Martin. Not when he was said to be fixing means to overturn the Federal administration?

Answer. I do not recollect; but I heard much at that time of Colonel Burr.

[Mr. Hay here wished to identify the two letters, which Mr. Henderson had presented to the court from Mr. Blannerhasset.

Mr. Botts, however, admitted them.

They were then read by Mr. Hay, but they contained nothing important. The examination then proceeded.]

Mr. Hay. Did you, sir, read the "Querist?"

Answer. I read the first number in manuscript; it was signed Querist.

Question. I think you said, yesterday, that Mr. Blannerhasset confessed he was the author, and was going to Marietta to publish it?

Mr. Blannerhasset rose, and objected to reading these publications on such evidence. He observed that somebody may have written under the same signature on the very same subject; and that there was a lacuna or chasm which was required to be filled up.

Mr. Hay. We will fill up that chasm; Mr. Neal copied it.

Mr. Neal was then called into court and sworn.

Mr. Hay. Will you state to the judge what you know of the publication in the Marietta Gazette, under the signature of Querist?

Answer. About 1st September Mr. Blannerhasset sent for me, and told me that he had something to copy about the division of the States, and that the printer had met with some difficulty in understanding the writing of the first number. I copied the second and third numbers, and carried them to Fairlamb, the printer at Marietta, and gave them to him.

Question. Did you read the papers as they came out?

Answer. Yes; Mr. Blannerhasset supplied me with the whole.

Question. Did they correspond with the manuscript? Answer. Yes; the very same, I think.

The court accepted them, but, on the suggestion of Mr. Hay, the reading was waived, and they were to be put into the possession of the Chief Justice.

At Mr. Hay's suggestion, all the witnesses who had been examined were agreed to be discharged, except General Eaton; he declared that he did not "wish to go."

Alexander Henderson again called in by the counsel for the accused.

Here, at Mr. Wickham's request, the counsel for the prosecution read the numbers of the Querist, from the Ohio Gazette. They consist of a short interlocutory essay, containing some strictures on "The Western World," and of three other numbers, whose decided object appears to have been to demonstrate to the Western people the advantages that would result to them from a dissolution of the Union, and their constitutional right to adopt this expedient. Every line of them breathes the air of a discontented, disaffected, and revolutionary spirit.

Mr. Wirt (to the court.) It is remarkable that Colonel Burr was at the island on the 1st of September, and the first number of the Querist is dated on the 4th.

Evidence of John Graham.

THURSDAY, Sept. 24.

In the latter end of October last I received a letter from Mr. Madison, requesting that I would pass through the Western country, on my return to New Orleans. I know not whether it be proper to assign to the court the reasons of this wish. It may serve, however, to explain my conduct in the Western country. Mr. Madison stated to me, as a reason for this request, that Government had received information from various quarters that a project was on foot to sever the Union, or to invade the territory of Spain.

Mr. Wickham objected to this explanation.

Witness. It was to show that I had acted in obedience to my duty as an officer of the Government.

Mr. Wickham. What office did you hold? Answer. I was Secretary of the Orleans Territory.

When I arrived at Marietta, about the middle of November, I made inquiries, and heard what it may not, perhaps, be proper to state. Mr. Duval called on me, and informed me that Mr. Blannerhasset had just arrived with him, and would wait upon me. After passing the usual compliments, and expressing his pleasure at seeing me, he begged leave to read to me certain letters, which he had received by Captain Elliot, of the Western country, who had just returned from Pittsburg. Mr. Blannerhasset made many inquiries relative to Comfort Tyler, Dean, and Butler, and the preparations which they were making for their expedition down the river; what number of men and settlers they had obtained. Mr. Elliot gave him to understand that there would be more settlers than there would be boats for them. When Blannerhasset received this information, he observed that they could descend in his boats, as he had more boats than men. Before Captain Elliot quitted the room, Mr. Blannerhasset handed me a letter, which he said he had received, a few days before, from Colonel Burr, in Kentucky. Shall I state my recollection of the contents of that letter?

Mr. McRae. Do you believe the letter to have been Colonel Burr's?

Answer. I believe it was Colonel Burr's writing; for, though I had never seen Colonel Burr write, yet I had seen many letters said to be written by Colonel Burr. I merely mention this letter to show that it gave rise to a conversation between Mr. Blannerhasset and myself, relative to the contents of this letter. The conversation was somewhat desultory, nor do I particularly recollect the order in which the several topics were introduced. In general, I recollect that Mr. Blannerhasset animadverted upon the conduct pursued towards Colonel Burr at Frankfort; stating, however, his belief that this conduct was not authorized by the Government. He mentioned that Colonel Burr had purchased, from Colonel Lynch, I think, a certain part of the Baron Bastrop's grant in the Territory of Orleans. He stated, also, that he was to have an interest in this purchase, and seemed desirous of impressing on my mind a belief that the object of his preparations was the settlement of this land; but I cannot now recollect that, in the course of conversation, he did positively avow it. His object seemed to be to avoid an explicit avowal; but he said that they avowed that this was their object; that it was a legal one, and Government would have no right to interfere, until it was ascertained that they (meaning Colonel Burr and himself, as I understood) had an ulterior object. He contended that they had a right to go towards this object with just such preparations as they thought proper. This was an opinion in which I did not acquiesce. I made few inquiries; but he admitted, in the course of conversation, that he was building boats for the expedition in which he was engaged with Colonel Burr; that he was engaging young men, single and without families, to go down armed; he said they would have no cannon, but they would have rifles. He stated, in the course of conversation, the use to which these rifles might be applied—to resist the Indians and Spaniards, or to kill game. It is justice to Mr. Blannerhasset to add, that he said he did not solicit men to go; that he took such only as pleased to go; and that he did not expect more than three hundred men would go with him. He stated, also, that he was engaging provisions for this same expedition. From what I had heard after my arrival at Marietta, and from the manner in which Mr. Blannerhasset entered my room and made these communications, I was rather induced to believe that he conceived me to be one of the party.

Question. Why from his manner?

Answer. My acquaintance with him before was slight, and yet he was extremely polite to me, and expressed how happy he would be at seeing me in his own house. For reasons which it is unnecessary to take up the time of the court with, I was anxious to undeceive Mr. Blannerhasset. I asked him if he had stated that I was one of the party. He said that he had, and that he had understood so from Colonel Burr. When I assured him I was not, he expressed considerable surprise, not by verbal declarations, but by the marked air of his countenance. He observed to me that I did not know Colonel Burr, and passed some eulogiums upon him; and asked me, in a very impressive manner, whether I had not heard of an association in New Orleans for the invasion of Mexico. I told him that I had not, and ventured to assure him that there was no such association there. He told me that there certainly was, and that about three hundred men had signed to such an association, (I think that was his expression,) for the purpose of invading Mexico. After I had repeated my thorough conviction that there was none such, and assigned the fact of his being deceived about me as a presumptive reason why he should be deceived about others, he told me that he had obtained this information from Mr. Bradford.

Considering Mr. Blannerhasset at that time as a deluded man, I endeavored to draw him off from the undertaking in which he was engaged; and, considering it was more the policy of the Government to prevent than to punish such enterprises on the Ohio, I informed him that, so far from being concerned in the plan, I was an agent of the Government authorized to inquire into the facts relative to this enterprise in the Western country, and to take such steps as might be necessary for repressing it. I then stated to him, from reasons drawn from Colonel Burr's visit to New Orleans in the preceding summer, from the information which Government had received, and from the nature of the preparations which Mr. Blannerhasset himself was then making, why I believed that the object of Colonel Burr was either to attack the territories of the United States, or those of Spain. I assured him, at the same time, that any collection or combination of armed men on the Ohio would, under these circumstances, be considered as a violation of the laws, and repressed accordingly. He again contended that they had a right to go down the river as they thought proper, inasmuch as they avowed the settlement of the Washita, which was a legal object. Though we could not agree on this point, he asked me whether there would be any objection or opposition made to those men, if they went down in small parties. I gave him to understand that this would depend upon circumstances; but that, when they were collected, they would be arrested, and the enterprise would end in the ruin and disgrace of all those who were concerned in it.

During this conversation, I stated to Mr. Blannerhasset, pointedly, that I knew not the opinions of Mr. Jefferson or Mr. Madison; that these were my own opinions; and that I had power to act under the Government of the United States as circumstances required; that I was authorized to call on the constituted authorities of the country, if the constitution was about to be violated. I wish the court to understand that I was to consider the moving down the Ohio as a violation of the law, and I was then to call on the constituted authorities. When I spoke of the reasons which influenced my belief as to Colonel Burr's plans, Mr. Blannerhasset observed to me, that, however acute the opinions of gentlemen might be, he and Colonel Burr were as well acquainted with the constitution and the laws as the administration itself; and that they knew very well what they were about.

Question. What produced this remark?

Answer. I do not recollect, but perhaps it may have been the arguments which I had used to show that the expedition was a violation of the laws. Mr. Blannerhasset said that he had joined his friends in this undertaking, and could not abandon them, unless they consented to give the thing up; and asked me if he was at liberty to communicate to Colonel Burr the information I had given him. I told him he was. I do not recollect whether I have mentioned the opinion I expressed to Mr. Blannerhasset of the validity of Bastrop's grant. I told him all that I knew of the title, and that Colonel Burr would have no title to it; and that, if he had, the Orleans land could be no object with Mr. Blannerhasset.

Mr. Wirt. How came you, sir, informed about this title?

Answer. I had been at New Orleans, where the subject was much talked of.

Question. Have there been any judicial proceedings about it?

Answer. I told Mr. Blannerhasset that Mr. Lynch claimed under Mr. E. Livingston; that this was a considerable purchase; and that Mr. Livingston had invalidated this contract in court.

[Mr. Burr. I deny that this is a fact.]

The next day, perhaps that afternoon, I met Mr. Blannerhasset at another house, in company with gentlemen, most of them strangers to me. Mr. Blannerhasset was speaking, and avowing that Mr. Burr had a great many friends in Kentucky. I observed that this would much depend upon his object; if to settle the Washita lands, the people would wish him well; but if it was to attack the territories of Spain, or those of the United States, he would have very few friends. In reply, Mr. Blannerhasset observed that, whatever was his object, he either had, or would have, a great number of friends. This was in a public room in a tavern; several gentlemen were present; I recollect particularly a Major Sproat. Either on that evening, or the evening of the next day, Mr. Blannerhasset said he was writing to Colonel Burr. He invited me to his room, and wished to know how much of our conversation he might communicate to Colonel Burr. I told him the whole, if he chose; that the information was intended for him, but that he might communicate it to Colonel Burr. During this time, and for a few days afterwards, the intercourse between us was friendly; but, after I had had a conversation with Mr. Henderson, I had no further communications with him, save dining with him one day at the same table, and he arose immediately after dinner; and I did not see him again until we met in the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. Hay. Had you any communication with Mr. Burr?

Answer. I had, and in the Mississippi Territory too. In consequence of the information I had received from Mr. Henderson and others, I lodged information with the Governor of Ohio, and a law was passed; and I was also instrumental at Frankfort, in Kentucky, in the passage of a similar law. Their object was to put an end to these expeditions. When I arrived at the little town of Washington, in the Mississippi Territory, about the latter end of January or beginning of February, I heard that Col. Burr was in the house.

Mr. Hay. Where is Washington? on the Mississippi river?

Answer. No, it is ten miles from it, and seven miles back of Natchez. It is the seat of Government of the Mississippi Territory. I waited on Col. Burr, principally with a view to ascertain whether the information I had given to Mr. Blannerhasset had been communicated to him. I asked him whether Mr. Blannerhasset had communicated our conversation to him. He said he had. I told him, on entering his room, that I had just arrived from the upper country, and perhaps he might be anxious to hear the news. He told me that Mr. Blannerhasset had accused me of a breach of hospitality. I replied that I never was in his house in my life. He spoke of his protested bills drawn in Lexington, and seemed to attribute their protest to the measures adopted by the Government. I told him that just before I left Lexington, the merchants there had received information that they would be paid. He said that they ought to be paid, as the man on whom they were drawn had the funds to pay them with. He then spoke of the measures pursued by Government as ruinous and rigorous, (I am not certain which was his expression;) that they had detained his people. [Question. Was this before or after his trial? Answer. It was before; he had then entered into recognizance.] He said that he had invited investigation into his conduct; he spoke of the measures of the military, and his determination to resist them; I understood him to mean the military of the United States; he either said he had, or that he would, order his people to resist them. He said that he had claimed the protection of the civil authority, and thought that protection would be adequate to his safety. He spoke, too, of the Washita settlement; I believe he told me that he should send his people there, but did not know whether he should venture into the Territory himself; intimating, as I thought, an apprehension of General Wilkinson. He asked me, if I knew what had given rise to the President's proclamation. I told him that I did not, unless it was General Eaton's communication. The court will see, from the date of the proclamation, that any information I could have imparted had not then reached the seat of Government. Col. B. observed, that the machinations of his enemies had led to these proceedings; and that facts did not support and justify them. I assured him that those who were alarmed and agitated were not his enemies; at least, this was the idea I intended to convey; and after stating to him the alarm extending through the Western country, I proposed to him that he should make some public declaration as to his real object. His reply to this was, that he was a party concerned, and that no declaration of his could have any effect. He seemed disposed to ridicule the idea of his bringing about a separation of the Union by physical force; that it was to be produced by moral, not physical causes. I mentioned to Col. Burr that I had heard in the Western country of a considerable number of men, perhaps 2,000, being collected for the purpose of invading Mexico. His reply was, that he supposed that event was in case of a war with Spain. I told him no, that I had not understood it as depending on that condition. He then said something about the Washita lands, and replied, that perhaps when they had a separate Government, something of that sort might be attempted (meaning, as I understood, the invasion of Mexico.) Soon after this, or at least before I had heard any explanation of what he meant by a "separate Government," a gentleman of his family came in, and I took my leave. I had no further conversations with Mr. Burr or Mr. Blannerhasset. I lodged an information against Mr. Blannerhasset, and was with him before a magistrate.

Mr. Hay. Did you make particular observations to Mr. Blannerhasset about the sort of preparations he was making?

Answer. He spoke of the settlement of the Washita as their object. He never positively told me it was, but he said they avowed it as their object. I observed to him as a reason why I should not think it was, that young men without families, or without any of the implements of husbandry, were engaged to go. He said that their arms were to kill turkeys or Indians. He then launched out into an abuse of the administration, their neglect of the army and navy, &c. I forgot to state this circumstance. When Mr. Blannerhasset met me, to know how far he was at liberty to communicate my opinions to Colonel Burr, I urged to him the impropriety of his engaging in these objects he said it was impossible that Colonel Burr could have so much deceived him and his son-in-law, Mr. Alston.

Mr. Wirt. Was this remark after you had announced yourself as the agent of Government?

Answer. It was.

Question. Did he say any thing to your objection about the want of implements of husbandry?

Answer. He did say something about the opening of roads, but he never did tell me the real object.

Question. Do you know any thing of the Washita land?

Answer. I never was on it.

Question. What is its character?

Answer. Some say it is good, and some say it is bad. I believe the greater part of it is covered with water, but there is some very fine land.

Mr. Graham cross-examined.

THURSDAY, September 24.

Mr. Burr. Did you ever see Bastrop's patent? Answer. Never.

Question. Did you read it?

Answer. No: I always understood that there never was one.

Mr. Burr. You have said that the greater part was water; I will assure the court that it was to be laid out without any water. Were you ever examined before?

Answer. Yes: I made a deposition when I lodged information before the Legislature of Ohio.

Question. Were you examined on any other occasion?

Answer. I was before the grand jury.

Question. Did you say any thing then of a conversation you had with General Nevill?

Answer. Yes: I told General Nevill that I had come to make some inquiries into this affair. General Nevill informed me what had passed in his conversation with Mr. Morgan. He said the people had apprehended that your object was the separation of the United States; but that if it was the invasion of Mexico, you would be better received on your return than you had ever been.

Question. Did you not then speak of the boats? Answer. I did.

Question. Did you not say they were unfit to go up the stream?

Answer. I so understood at that time.

Question. Do you not know that they were seized by Government to send troops up the stream?

Answer. I did not hear of it before I came here.

Question. Did I give you a welcome reception?

Answer. I was not acquainted with your manner. It was cold, but I thought respectful.

Question. Have you not heard Governor Williams, Mead, and Rodney say that they would not suffer the military to take me?

Answer. I most certainly recollect that I both thought and said that it was improper to take you by military authority; and I heard Governor Williams say, if the attempt was made, he was not authorized to sanction it.

Question. Had you not heard of the stipulations made to me by Williams and Mead?

Answer. I knew not of Governor Williams stipulating with you; I heard of Mr. Mead's doing it.

Question. Was there no law to arrest me?

Answer. I mentioned to Governor Williams that, if the laws were not sufficiently energetic to meet such occurrences, it was better to provide one; but I never saw the law.

Question. Did you not hear of an officer being there to arrest me?

Answer. I had a conversation with a Lieutenant Peter, who was lately in this place, relative to this subject.

The counsel for the prosecution objected to this course of examination.

Chief Justice. If Mr. Burr means to allege these measures as an excuse for his own military preparations, he may press these inquiries.

Mr. Burr. I did suppose, from the sort of duties which Mr. Graham discharged in that country, that he must have known of the stipulations of Mead and Williams; and that, in direct violation of these, a party of officers in disguise, (that is, without their uniform,) and with concealed weapons, as dirks and pistols, were there to seize me. Mr. Graham certainly knows something on this subject.

Mr. Graham. I can only speak of my conversation with Governor Williams and Lieutenant Peter, for with no others did I communicate on this subject. Governor Williams told me that a Dr. Carmichael had been authorized to come to the Mississippi Territory and seize you; whether this was before or after your trial, I know not. He said that he was extremely unwilling to have any such thing done. I observed that it was extremely improper to suffer a person to be seized, who was then in the custody of the law. He said that he had remonstrated with Dr. Carmichael; that Doctor Carmichael had given it up, and returned.

Mr. Burr. Did Carmichael belong to the army?

Answer. No: to the Mississippi Territory. I was proceeding to state that the night Colonel Burr left Washington, I heard some of the officers in the room in which I slept conversing about him, and one of them observed, that if Colonel Burr was not arrested on that night, he would make his escape. The gentlemen left the room, and

I afterwards understood from Lieutenant Peter, that an application had been, or was about to be, made to Governor Williams, for permission to arrest Colonel Burr. Lieutenant Peter having understood that I had heard part of this conversation, informed me that he had come with other officers to arrest Colonel Burr; and I advised him to do nothing that would violate the laws of the country. He gave me to understand, that at that moment he felt himself bound to obey the orders of his general, like a good soldier. I urged every consideration I could suggest against the exercise of military authority; and I did then understand that it was not his intention to proceed against Colonel Burr. Indeed, I understood that Colonel Burr had made his escape. I advised Governor Williams to make such arrangements with him as would send him on to Washington for trial, or to detain him in that Territory for trial.

Mr. Blannerhasset. You stated that you had given information against me, and led to a prosecution?

Answer. I did not say that I had led to a prosecution, but only that I had given information against you, that you might be taken to the district where the expedition had been fitted out.

Question. Why did you prefer Judge Toulman to Judge Rodney; the last being the senior judge?

Answer. I made no choice.

Question. Did you not understand that Judge Toulman was the judge of Tombigbee county?

Answer. I understood that he was judge of the Mississippi Territory, and Judge Toulman still insists upon it that he possesses this authority.

Question. Did you not apply to the Attorney General of that Territory?

Answer. Certainly not. Judge Toulman would have interfered, but Judge Rodney issued a writ of habeas corpus.

Question. Was it by direction or request of the Government, that you informed against me for the misdemeanor?

Answer. By neither.

Question. Do you not expect to pay the $1,000? Answer. I expect not.

Question. To whom are you to pay it?

Mr. Graham here addressed the court; he said that Judge Rodney had refused to send Mr. Blannerhasset round for trial; but held him to bail; that he himself had been recognised; that the court was to sit some time in May; the judge considered the Supreme Court as the proper tribunal; the Attorney General thought otherwise, that before the court met he had besides been indisposed, and had obtained the certificate of his physician that he could not attend that court.

Mr. Burr. Are you still secretary of the Orleans Territory? Answer. I am not.

Question. Do you now hold any office under the Government, and what is it?

Answer. I am chief clerk in the office of Secretary of State.

Question. Was there any arrangement made to seize Colonel Burr after their judicial proceedings against him?

Answer. Governor Williams and myself both agreed that his trial in the Mississippi Territory was a mere farce, and that something ought to be done. He proposed to see Colonel Burr, and make some arrangements with him to come on to the city of Washington for his trial. Colonel Burr informed him that he was merely going to ride to Colonel Osborne's for that night. Governor Williams informed me that he received a great coat at the suburbs of the town, and disappeared.

Mr. Wirt. Was not Col. Burr held in recognizance? Answer. Yes.

Question. Did you see such a recognizance? Answer. Yes; I saw it myself in the clerk's office.

Mr. Burr. If it is there, I pronounce it to be a forgery.

Mr. Hay observed that the truth would appear in time.

Mr. Hay. Were any legal proceedings pending at the time of his departure?

The witness asked the court if this was a proper question?

Chief Justice. It is a mere difference of opinion about a fact.

Col. Burr contended that this recognizance had been complied with. (Governor Williams says not.)

Mr. Hay. Was his departure from Washington sudden?

Answer. It was certainly sudden, as Governor Williams told me he had been promised with a call from Col. Burr. FRIDAY, September 25, 1806.

Mr. John Graham was again called in at the request of the accused.

Mr. Wickham. You stated something about a communication from Mr. Blannerhasset, respecting Mr. Bradford?

Answer. I stated that Mr. Bradford was the person who (according to Mr. Blannerhasset) had given him the information respecting the Mexican association at New Orleans.

Mr. Burr. Do you know whether it was the practice then to seize on individuals by military authority?

Answer. I recollect to have been at Natchez, when about sixty persons were arrested on the suspicion of being concerned with you.

Question. I do not mean so late a period as that. As you were appointed to an office under the Government, I wish to know whether you, as an agent of Government, would countenance military arrests?

Answer. I certainly would not.

TUESDAY, September 29.

The examination of the witnesses was resumed on the part of the United States, although Colonel Burr was still unable to attend on account of his indisposition.

Mr. Graham observed, that when he was before the court the other day, he had omitted, he believed, to detail a part of a conversation which he had with Mr. Blannerhasset. He was also apprehensive that he had not been so explicit in relation to his conversation with General Nevill as he could have wished. He, therefore, requested permission of the court to add a few observations, by way of explanation.

He said that Blannerhasset observed, in the course of their conversation, that both Colonel Burr and himself believed that the people of the Western country would be benefited by a separation of the Union; but they had found that they were not ripe for the measure; and as they had no personal views, they were not disposed to hasten the event. I understood him to mean that the people of the Western country were not ripe for the measure. I think Mr. Blannerhasset went on to say that this was an event that must happen; but of this I am not so certain. This conversation took place at Marietta.

Mr. Hay. At what period of the conversation?

Answer. At the first conversation. Indeed I had but one conversation with him; our subsequent interviews and conversations were merely casual.

Mr. Hay. Was it at the first part of your conversation with him?

Answer. No: Towards the close; and after I had informed him that I was an accredited agent of the Government.

I have some reason to believe that I may have been misunderstood with respect to what I said relative to General Nevill. Colonel Burr had asked before what conversation I had about a gentleman in the neighborhood of Pittsburg, before the grand jury, without mentioning his name. The allusion was understood to be to General Nevill; and whenever I mention the name of a gentleman, it is my wish to state every circumstance which occurred as nearly as possible. My recollection of the conversation with General Nevill is this: After detailing the conversations which he had had with others, he said that there had been strong prejudice against Colonel Burr about Pittsburg: that the people there were attached to the Union, and believed that Colonel Burr had intended to separate it. Afterwards, he said there was reason to believe that the expedition was meditated against the Spaniards, and his visits might be more welcome.

[From the rapidity of Mr. Graham's pronunciation, it was impossible for us* not to commit some inaccuracies in the report of his testimony. Mr. Graham's absence prevented us from having the opportunity of correcting it before it was published. The two following errors occur in the statement of his opinion as to the Washita land:

Mr. Graham did not tell Mr. Blannerhasset that Colonel Burr would have no title under Bastrop's grant. He hazarded a doubt, or gave an opinion on that subject, for which he assigned his reasons; among these, that Colonel Lynch (under whom he understood Colonel Burr claimed) had purchased a part of this grant from Mr. Edward Livingston; that he had not complied with the conditions of the contract; and that it had been set aside by a decree of the Supreme Court of the Orleans Territory. From the manner in which this circumstance is reported in the Enquirer, it might be supposed that Colonel Lynch had no claim to any part of this grant, save what he derived from Mr. Livingston; an idea which Mr. Graham never meant to convey to Mr. Blannerhasset for any other person; for he expressly told Mr. Blannerhasset that Colonel Lynch had a claim to a part of this grant, which he derived from another source. Mr. Graham mentioned the purchase from Mr. Livingston, because he was under the impression that Colonel Lynch had sold his whole interest in this grant to Colonel Burr.

When Mr. Graham was asked as to the character of this land, he answered, that those who were interested in it said it was very good; those who were not, said that some of it was fine land, but that a great part of the grant was covered with water. Mr. Graham did not mean to say, as it is stated in the Enquirer, that the "greater part" was in that situation.]

Evidence of John G. Henderson.

THURSDAY, September 24.

I rode with Mr. Blannerhasset and his wife to my brother's house on the second Monday in September last: When we got near to my brother's, Mr. Blannerhasset introduced the subject of the separation of the Union. He stated, I think, that it was to be conducted under the auspices of Colonel Burr. He mentioned that there were many eminent characters in the Eastern and Western States concerned. He mentioned the names of General Eaton and Mr. John Graham, perhaps others at that time; I do not recollect. I do not believe that any thing more passed between us till we arrived at my brother's; when we got to my brother's, we took some refreshment (dinner.) I was not much in company with Mr. Blannerhasset till dinner, and I do not know whether his conversation led to that subject or not. After dinner we walked into the meadow; my brother, Mr. Blannerhasset, and myself. The subject was then renewed, under injunctions of secrecy, which we agreed to observe: Mr. Blannerhasset observed that it was a subject of great importance. He stated that the object was the separation of the Union; he mentioned characters who were concerned in it; observed that Colonel Burr was at the head of it, or words to that effect. He spoke very much in praise of Colonel Burr; mentioned an instance of his goodness of heart with respect to the Manhattan Company, and making the fortunes of many without benefiting himself. General Eaton's and Mr. Graham's names were again mentioned as concerned, and a number of others whom I do not recollect, that were acquainted with it; among the rest was Mr. Harper, and Mr. Alston's name was mentioned as being highly pleased with the scheme. In the course of conversation, Mr. Blannerhasset observed that New Orleans would be seized. He mentioned that the park of French artillery at New Orleans, which Mr. Jefferson was too economical to purchase, was to be procured; whether seized, or obtained in any other way, I do not recollect. He stated that the people in the lower country were displeased with the present Government on account of their interests not being protected or attended to. He seemed to apprehend no opposition in that quarter. He said the attempt would be made in less than nine months; that he himself had embarked in it. He observed that it would be a favorable juncture for effecting the object, owing to a want of energy in the administration; I am not, however, certain whether he, or which of us, made the observation; we all three concurred in it. I think Mr. Blannerhasset observed, that he hoped he should see my brother at the head of a regiment of horse at some time, but I do not recollect. He seemed anxious for us to join. Some time in the course of conversation, the name of Mr. Granger was mentioned; I thought in a threatening style, as if he would have cause to repent his having made use of an expression some time before published, importing that danger was threatening in the West. I do not know whether my brother was present during this observation. Mr. Blannerhasset said, that we must take an active part one way or the other, as we could not remain neutral. He mentioned an expression of Colonel Burr's, respecting the people in the city, or the administration, that if they were anywise impertinent, he would tie them neck and heels, and throw them into the Potomac.

Mr. Hay. Did I understand you to say that this was an expression as quoted from Colonel Burr?

Answer. Yes. We desired Mr. Blannerhasset, just before he left my brother's, not to consider us as committed; that it was a subject which required reflection; and that we must consult our friends on this side the mountain, who were interested in that country. I mentioned it to my father, under the same injunctions on which I had received it from Mr. Blannerhasset. I recollect having asked Mr. Blannerhasset, when he spoke of the leading characters of the Union, whether John Randolph had been made acquainted with it. He answered no.

Mr. Wirt. Why did you put that question?

Answer. Because Mr. Blannerhasset had said that the leading characters of the country were concerned I asked Mr. Blannerhasset what kind of a Government he would establish in the Western country. He said that this was not yet determined, but that a more energetic one than the present would be adopted. I asked Mr. Blannerhasset, also, if any foreign Power was concerned. He assured me there was not.

Mr. Hay. You asked him what form of government was to be established? Answer. Yes.

Question. Where did you suppose the seat of this energetic Government was to be?

Answer. He did not mention, but I supposed it was some central place.

Mr. McRae. Did he mention the line of division?

Answer. He did not particularly, but he said that the people in the South Branch would be in an awkward situation.

Question. Did he mention the Allegany? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Did he mention any thing about commanding the passes of the Allegany?

Answer. Yes. He said that, with a few cannon and a few sharp shooters, he could defend any pass in the Allegany.

Question. Did he mention the "Querist" in your presence? Answer. He did.

Question. What did he say of it?

* By us it is meant the Richmond Enquirer from which journal this report is principally copied.

Answer. He read one number of it. The first words in it were, "Universal history every where teaches or informs," or some such expressions.

Question. Did you remember what was the object of these pieces?

Answer. I understood that it was to promote the separation of the Union.

Mr. McRae. Do you recollect any observations about Blannerhasset's property?

Answer. I think he estimated his property on the island at $50,000; and besides, he had a small fund in Europe, which he said would be safe. He said they could not touch that.

Mr. McRae. What did he mean by "they?"

Answer. I do not know his allusion; but I suppose he meant the Government.

Mr. Wirt. Do you recollect any observation about the expense of supporting Government?

Answer. He said that we were contributing three or four millions to the present Government, when one hundred thousand would be sufficient for a Government of our own.

Witness. I have omitted to state that, after my brother received his last letter from Mr. Blannerhasset, my brother and myself went down to inform him of our decided opposition to this plan. He and Mr. Alston were gone down the river, and we directed the overseer to inform Mrs. Blannerhasset of our intentions. There was a subsequent meeting of the people of Wood county on this subject, and resolutions were adopted in opposition to the scheme; and a month afterwards, the militia volunteered their services to suppress it. Shortly after I left that country for Dumfries.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Wickham. Was this conversation in earnest or jocular? Answer. Perfectly serious.

Question. Did you hold any conversations with Mr. Blannerhasset before this which led to it? Were you in the habit of expressing opinions adverse to the Union? Answer. I never was opposed to the Union.

Question. Is it talked of in that country?

Answer. It has been talked of as an event that would take place in half a century or a century.

Question. Was your deposition ever taken? Answer. It never was.

Question. At whose instance did the meeting of the people you spoke of take place?

Answer. Several of us called it, and, among the rest, my brother and myself.

Question. And they passed resolutions about this plan? Answer. They did.

Question. How were they informed of this scheme?

Answer. From reports in the county.

Question. Did you communicate any information to this meeting?

Answer. No; nor my brother; any thing but general observations.

Question. What was the purport of these resolutions?

Answer. Nothing but to prepare for the danger which was to be apprehended. One of the resolutions alluded particularly to Colonel Burr.

Question. Was Mr. Blannerhasset's name ever mentioned?

Answer. A proposition was made to insert Mr. Blannerhasset's name in one of the resolutions; but I opposed it.

Question. Did you communicate on this subject with Mr. Graham?

Answer. I had left the county at that time.

Mr. Martin. What were your politics? Answer. They were federal, and are so still.

Mr. McRae. What have you considered Mr. Blannerhasset's politics to be? Answer. Democratic.

Chief Justice. Did you understand that this separation was to be effected by political means, quietly, or by force?

Answer. I understood him to mean, that if the lower country was in their possession, it would bring the upper country along with it.

Mr. McRae. And he conceived the lower country to be dissatisfied with the Government? Answer. He did.

Mr. Wirt. Did Mr. Blannerhasset state the manner in which this revolution was to be brought about?

Answer. No; he did not.

Question. Did the meeting in Wood county arise from any of Mr. Blannerhasset's declarations, or from the movements on the Ohio? Answer. I suspect the last.

Mr. Blannerhasset. What movements?

Answer. I did not myself use that word. I alluded to the building of the boats and kiln-drying meal, &c.

Mr. John Henderson returned to supply an omission in his evidence: that Blannerhasset informed him, that the officers of the army and navy were disgusted with the administration, and disposed to join. Mr. Blannerhasset also mentioned, in the course of the day, that General Moreau was expected to reside near Pittsburg.

SATURDAY, September 26.

Mr. John G. Henderson wished to correct an error in his evidence, with respect to the time of the second meeting of the people in Wood county. The first meeting was on a Monday, and the second on the Saturday following.

Evidence of Charles Duval.

THURSDAY, September 24.

Two years ago I saw Mr. Burr in New Orleans, but never since; but I have had frequent communications with Mr. Blannerhasset. The first time I ever had any was at Marietta, in September, 1806, when I had flour to sell. I asked him whether he did not want to buy flour, and he engaged twenty barrels; he did not, however, receive more than five or six barrels of it. I mentioned to him that I had understood from Mrs. Blannerhasset that he was going down the river, and a number of my acquaintances were going with him, and that I did not know but that I too would go, if I knew what he was going for. He told me that Colonel Burr and himself and others had purchased large tracts of land, and wanted settlers to go on it. I told him I had land enough at home, and that I did not want to go to settle land. He then represented it as though there was something else in view; but he did not tell me at that time. He said that a number of people were going who had never asked what they were going for; they believed it to be something worth going for. They were leaving their plantations, their neighbors, every thing. He said if he was going to leave his, I might surely leave mine; and that I might suppose it was for something very handsome. I mentioned something about his leaving his own plantation; a man who was so well situated as he was. He said that what he had there he did not regard as a straw, in comparison of the object which he had ahead. I had a great many interviews with him on the subject; sometimes he told me one thing, and sometimes another. I told him that Mrs. Blannerhasset had informed me that Mr. Graham was one of the party. Mr. Blannerhasset agreed that it was so. The court will be pleased to notice that Mr. Graham and myself had once travelled to New Orleans together. He mentioned, if I would go with him, could I arm myself with a gun? I told him I had a rifle that I could take with me; that I never had used a musket. He said that that would answer. He asked me if the young men on the Muskingum, who were like to go with me, had arms or could get them? I told him it was probable they all had arms, as they belonged to the militia. He said, if they would find arms, he would find ammunition. Just before Mr. Blannerhasset's boats went off, Mr. Graham came to Marietta, and Mr. Blannerhasset was that night at my father's house. My father told me that my old friend Mr. Graham was in town; and Mr. Blannerhasset told my mother that she had better not let me go to see Mr. Graham, for Mr. Graham would certainly persuade me to go down the river.

Mr. Hay. Will you state the different objects which Mr. Blannerhasset held out to you?

Answer. He mentioned to me that he was going out into the Spanish territory, about the same time that he spoke of my arming; and said he supposed we should have a little fighting to do; but the Spaniards were cowards, and would soon run.

Mr. Hay. Did you understand where you were to fight the Spaniards?

Answer. Somewhere about the Washita lands; that they might be troublesome, and that he wanted men of my description to do it.

Mr. Hay. Did he profess any other object?

Answer. My father asked him what he wanted me for; if to work, that I would not work at home. He said he did not want all to work. He wanted men of my description; he did not care if he had 1,000 such.

When he was bringing up this kiln-dried meal, I asked him what it was for; he said that it was to take down the river. I asked him why he did not get flour. Because, he said, they were going into the Spanish country, and flour would not keep as well. He told me he wanted us to get knapsacks to carry eight or ten days' provision for marching. I mentioned I was a poor traveller, and I would get me a Spanish horse and ride. He said he was going out among the Spaniards, an ignorant set of men, and he wanted clever young men to go and take command of them; to have a commission and some office too. I mentioned to him that I would not hesitate to go there and stay two or three years, if I could make my fortune. He said, if I once got there, he'd warrant I never would return, I would be so fond of the place. I told him I never wished to go to a place whence I could not return to visit my friends. He said I should like the country so well, that I would be contented to stay there. He told me that when we got to the mouth of Cumberland river we should be joined by Colonel Burr and the whole party, when the whole secret would be divulged; and if I did not like it, he would bear my expenses back to Marietta. I told him that if I went down, and a number of my friends were going also, I should like to have choice of my boat's crew. He said if it was so, I must still expect to be under the same regulations as regular troops; that was, that we might have the privilege of choosing our own officers, till we got to the mouth of Cumberland; there we were to meet Colonel Burr; and we must then submit to such regulations as Colonel Burr thought proper. My motive for making this proposition as to my friends was, that a number of strangers were going, and I did not wish to be with them. I recollect nothing further of any great importance.

Mr. Duval's further examination was postponed, and the court adjourned till to-morrow.

Continuation of Charles Duval's testimony.

FRIDAY, September 25.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect any conversation with Mr. Blannerhasset about the temper of the people of New Orleans?

Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset told me that the citizens were dissatisfied with the Government under which they lived, and with Governor Claiborne; and that he would go to the Spanish country, and there establish a Government independent of the Government at New Orleans. He mentioned, at the same time, that Mr. Graham was much beloved by the people and party there. I observed to him that when I was in that country, I frequently heard the people talking against Governor Claiborne.

Question. Did he mention a particular time for the execution of this project?

Answer. He mentioned that he was to be at New Orleans by Christmas.

Question. Do you recollect of General Tupper's saying any thing about Allbright (a witness for United States) after Tupper returned home?

Answer. I did not hear him; but I heard people say that Tupper had declared Allbright had perjured himself, and he would make it appear.

Question. Did you know Allbright, and what was his character?

Answer. I was at Bellepré a few days before I left home; and the people said that Allbright was an honest industrious Dutchman, and they would take his word as soon as General Tupper's.

Mr. Wickham objected to these inquiries. Why were they not made when General Tupper was here?

Mr. Hay. It is a great pity, indeed, that he did not wait this investigation.

Mr. Wickham. He did wait six months.

Mr. Hay. Had you any particular communications with Mr. Blannerhasset about your going with him to New Orleans?

Answer. He told me that I might go to New Orleans with him, and if, when I got there, I did not like the place, I might see Mr. Graham, who was a particular friend of mine, and he would, no doubt, put me into some business.

Question. Was this before or after you understood that Mr. Graham was not of the party?

Answer. It was after. Mr. G. advised me to have nothing to say to this project; and that if I wanted to go down the river, it would be more to my credit to go any other way.

Question. Do you know any thing of the kiln-dried meal?

Answer. I do; it was ground and stored at my father's mill; about sixty barrels were of kiln-dried meal, and twenty or thirty that were not kiln-dried. The boats dropped down and took in the meal.

Question. Where is your father's mill? on the Muskingum? Answer. It is.

Question. Do you say that Blannerhasset's boats dropped down and took in the meal?

Answer. I do.

Question. What boats?

Answer. Those which were built by Colonel Barker up the Muskingum. Ten of these boats were finished. They dropped down to the mill about half way to Marietta, took in the meal, and stopped at Marietta.

Mr. Hay. Were any uncommon exertions made to finish the boats by a certain time?

Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset said if the boats were not all done by a particular time, he would take those that were finished, and leave the rest; and Col. Barker got all the hands he could.

Question. And were any additional hands employed for completing the boats within the short time prescribed by Mr. Blannerhasset?

Answer. There were.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Wickham. Did Mr. Blannerhasset say any thing to you of a war with Spain?

Answer. Yes; he mentioned to me, I think, that he expected there would be one.

Question. And was it pretty generally expected in that part of the country?

Answer. I believe it was.

Question. Was it generally wished for? Answer. I think not.

Question. Have you made any other affidavit than in this court? Answer. None.

Question. Did you give no information to Governor Tiffin? Answer. None.

Question. What has become of the boats and kiln-dried meal?

Answer. Eaten up, I suppose, by this time.

Mr. Martin. What! the boats too? Who took this meal?

Answer. It was taken by General Buel, and, as it was said, under the orders of the Government.

Question. What became of the boats?

Answer. They were taken to a creek at Marietta. Some were sunk, some were broken to pieces, and others were fitted up to carry away troops of the United States.

Mr. Burr. Were these troops taken up the Mississippi above its junction with the Ohio?

Answer. So I heard.

Question. To St. Louis? Answer. I heard so.

DAVID C. WALLACE SWORN.—In the fall of 1806, Mr. Blannerhasset informed me that he was engaged in a plan with a number of persons, which he thought would be highly advantageous, and that he was authorized to offer me the appointment of surgeon-general; I inquired, surgeon-general of what? and he replied, that he was not at liberty to explain, until I had engaged in the expedition; he used various arguments to induce me to join; he said that I should be in very excellent company; that the association would consist of respectable individuals, and particularized Col. B.; he thought that after so long an intimacy I might rely on his friendship. The conversation ended with my peremptory refusal to join in any expedition, the nature and plan of which I was not fully informed of, and approved. I heard Mr. Blannerhasset make proposals to several individuals to join; offering one hundred acres of land, each man to furnish himself with a rifle and blanket; he stated that when they got to the mouth of Cumberland the plan was to be disclosed; all those who did not like it were at liberty to return; some of the men engaged, others took time to consider the proposition fully. At this time the boats building up the Muskingum were nearly completed, and a general rumor prevailed that Burr, Blannerhasset, & Co. were preparing an expedition to dismember the States, and to carry the war into Mexico. When Mr. Blannerhasset again asked me to join, I replied that the same objections continued, and that I was not yet informed of the objects of the expedition; to which he replied, "You have heard what we were about;" which I understood as assenting to the truth of these reports. I told Mr. Blannerhasset that I expected they would be stopped descending the river: to which he replied, that he did not believe the country would be able to stop them; that he would have five hundred men from Marietta; he would have seven boats at that place, and they would be joined by others from above. I remarked that the people in the Western country were excellent marksmen, and that the woods on the banks of the river would afford them an excellent covering for firing upon those who were descending the river. He replied that, "in that case, we would land a party, and set fire to every house and town." I rode with Mr. Blannerhasset to see the boats that were building up the Muskingum, where he showed the builder of the boats and myself the articles by which the people under his command, as he called them, were to be governed on descending the river. Each boat's crew was to choose the captain, until they joined Colonel Burr at the mouth of Cumberland, where he was to direct their proceedings. At the boat yard he directed the builder to have an apartment fitted up in his boat for Colonel Burr, as he expected the colonel, when he joined him at the mouth of Cumberland, would sometimes wish to stay with him. During the ride, I observed to Mr. Blannerhasset that I did not believe the plan would succeed, as the people generally detested and execrated the plan. To which he replied, "if the people could not see their interest, we will not cram the measure down their throats." Mr. Blannerhasset showed me some letters he had received from Colonel Burr about this period—[Mr. Wirt. At what time was it? Answer. Between September and the time of going down the river.]—in one of which he admonished him not to be alarmed by the rumors respecting his arrest in Kentucky, as he apprehended no danger but delay to retard the intended settlement on the Washita. A person present (Captain Elliott) inquired whether Colonel Burr had mentioned any thing about the expedition; to which he replied, "No; nothing comes to us on that subject by the mail." Mr. Blannerhasset spoke to me to furnish them a quantity of medicines, and such directions for using them, as were calculated for a military expedition.

In a conversation with Colonel Burr in 1805, he expatiated upon the situation of the Western country; on its being compelled to pay large sums for the sale of lands which were spent in the Atlantic States, and on the $3,000,000 which he said we paid for tax. These observations made by Colonel Burr induced me to believe—

Mr. Botts objected to the witness stating any of his own inferences.

Witness. Col. Burr observed that this same money would vastly improve the commerce of the Western country.

Mr. Hay. Did you ever read the Querist?

Answer. I read the 1st and 2d numbers at Cincinnati.

Question. Did the observations in these papers recall to your recollection your conversation with Mr. Burr?

Answer. They did. When I saw these papers, I was asked my opinion about the author; I said that in my opinion, Colonel Burr had suggested the ideas, and that Mr. Blannerhasset had put them into words.

Question. Were the rumors that you spoke of general?

Answer. They were so. They were in every man's mouth.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Wickham. Have you had a medical education?

Answer. Yes; I received it in the University of Pennsylvania.

Question. Had you ever performed any surgical operation?

Answer. I had not. I never practised physic, nor did I ever intend it.

Question. Was this conversation with Mr. Blannerhasset after or before your refusal to join?

Answer. All the conversations were after that.

Question. Did any of the men applied to by Mr. Blannerhasset in your presence go?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. What was the tenor of these rumors?

Answer. That this party intended to effect a separation of the Union, and to carry an expedition into Mexico. Question. When the offer of surgeon general was made to you, did you believe it to be serious?

Answer. I cannot be certain of Mr. Blannerhasset's motive for making this proposition, but supposed that his object was to induce me to join, although I had not practised physic.

Mr. Martin. Were you in the habit of curing gun-shot wounds, or cutting off limbs?

Answer. No, sir, nor did I wish it.

Mr. Wickham. When were you in Philadelphia? Answer. In 1799 and 1800.

Question. Whose lectures did you attend?

Answer. I attended Dr. Woodhouse's, Rush's, Wistar's, and Barton's. Wistar was joint professor of anatomy and surgery with Shippen.

Question. Did you attend all the lectures? Answer. Yes, sir.

Mr. Hay. How long were you engaged in the study of medicine? Answer. Seven years.

Mr. Hay. Did Mr. Blannerhasset know of this? Answer. He did.

Mr. Wirt. Did you attend any surgical operations in the hospital?

Answer. I did, one winter.

Mr. Wickham. With whom did you study?

Answer. I studied about three years with Dr. White of Philadelphia.

Mr. Hay. Was this the same as Dr. White of Baltimore? "No," said Mr. Martin; "he was then in Ireland."

Witness. What, Dr. White of Philadelphia?

Mr. Martin. Oh! no; Mr. Hay and myself understand each other.

Evidence of Robert Wallace.

FRIDAY, September 25.

Question. Where do you live? Answer. I live in Marietta.

Some time last fall, I received a message from Mr. Blannerhasset to come down to the island. I went; it was soon after Mr. Blannerhasset returned from Kentucky. After I had been there some time, Mr. Blannerhasset took me into a small room, and said he wished to speak to me privately. He then asked me if I had not heard that he was going down the river; I told him that I had; he asked me if I would go with him. He said he was not then at liberty to reveal the object entirely, but if I would depend on his friendship he would do well for me. He spoke of the settlement of the Washita land, but intimated that there was something else in view. On the same evening there were several young men at Mr. Blannerhasset's house from Bellepré; they were all requested to join the expedition and go down with him; they were all to furnish themselves with a rifle and blanket. The next morning I had some more conversation with Mr. and Mrs. Blannerhasset. Among other things, I asked whether Government countenanced this expedition; I had heard something from Captain Elliott, the evening before, that this was an expedition intended against Mexico. Mr. Blannerhasset replied that it was immaterial whether Government aided it or not; Government was weak; they would have nothing to do with Government, unless it opposed the expedition; in that case, they would make resistance. Mr. Blannerhasset laughed at my staying at home and spending my life in obscurity behind the counter; it was a dull life; he told me if I would go with him, I would have an opportunity to distinguish myself. On the next day I rode up to Marietta with Mr. Blannerhasset, and on the way he was engaging several young men to go down the river with him, offering them lands; among the rest was one Rattburn, a schoolmaster; I told him he was a drunkard, and could do nothing towards the settlement of lands. "No matter," said Mr. Blannerhasset; "when he is brought under good discipline, he will make a good soldier, and his allowance will not be large enough to make him drunk." Mr. Blannerhasset was then going up the Muskingum, to see after Colonel Burr's boats that were building there, and to hurry their finishing.

Mr. Blannerhasset was at my father's house afterwards, and I was in the room when he offered my brother the place of surgeon general. My father told Mr. Blannerhasset he had better give up the enterprise, and stay at home on his island; that it was impossible he could succeed; that his force was too small, and the opposition too great. Mr. Blannerhasset said that General Wilkinson and the army would join him. When I was at the island, Mr. Blannerhasset told me that he expected we should have a little fighting with the Spaniards, but that they were great cowards, and would soon run and leave every thing in our possession. In the month of August, Mr. Blannerhasset was at my father's house, and used many arguments to prove that it was the interest of the Western States to separate themselves from the Union.

Mr. Wirt. Did Blannerhasset speak of Burr?

Answer. Yes, I understood that he spoke of him as the leader; I recollect to have asked him whether Colonel Burr was concerned. He answered, that he was one of the leaders. He also mentioned General Eaton as one concerned.

Mr. Hay. Did he mention what would be the result to you and to himself if the enterprise should succeed?

Answer. He said, if we succeeded, that our fortunes would be made; if not, that he was a ruined man.

Question. Did he say what he would do in case he met with resistance in his descent down the river?

Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset said they could land and burn the houses and towns, if the people attempted to oppose them:

Question. What arms did you see on the island?

Answer. I saw two or three guns, three blunderbusses, three braces of pistols, a sword and dirk, a keg of powder, and some bullets.

Mr. Martin. Were these arms owned by Mr. Blannerhasset for any long time?

Answer. Yes: I had seen them some time before.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Wickham. Did you ever agree to go with Mr. Blannerhasset?

Answer. I was undetermined if I should go; I said I was willing to go with my father's consent. Mr. Blannerhasset also said that he had so much respect for my father as not to wish me to go without it.

Question. Was there any talk of a Spanish war?

Answer. Mr. Blannerhasset gave some hints of such an event.

Mr. D. Woodbridge came into court to explain an observation which had been used on a former occasion. He said that the partnership accounts between him and Mr. Blannerhasset had been settled; from which it might be inferred that all their accounts had been settled. The truth, however, was, that though their partnership was dissolved, their private accounts were not yet adjusted.

Return J. Meigs, Jun., was then introduced; he inquired whether he should state any thing about the seizing of the boats.

Mr. Hay. No, sir; I wish you to state particularly what passed between General Tupper and yourself.

Mr. Burr. And what is that inquiry to the court?

Mr. Wirt. It is to fortify Jacob Allbright's testimony. I presume that such will be the conclusion, if it appears that General Tupper has told Mr. Meigs the very things which Allbright has substantially related.

Mr. Hay. Has not General Tupper left his affidavit?

Mr. Wickham. I know not; but when that shall be produced to the court, it will then be time enough to introduce Mr. Meigs.

Mr. Hay. We have Mr. Meigs's affidavit, and, if it be necessary, we will introduce it. Mr. Meigs was then discharged from further attendance.

David Gillmore sworn.

Mr. Blannerhasset was in Marietta at the latter end of October, with General Tupper. Mr. Blannerhasset asked me if I was the person who gave tuition in Marietta. After a short introduction, he observed that he was about to descend the Ohio, and go up the Red River, to make a settlement; that he supposed the accumulations I might make from my instructions were not adequate to what I might make with him. He would like to have me go with him; that he was going to settle a new country, which would be advantageous to those who would volunteer to go round to that settlement. He mentioned the fertility of the country; the advantages of a market that was near to it, not far from New Orleans. He thought the prospects were so promising and flattering, that I could not hesitate a moment in determining in favor of going. I said, if I knew the object, and was certain of benefiting myself, I would have no objections to go. He then observed that Mr. Belknap was a fine and promising young man; that he stood high in his estimation, and he would give me the same privileges as Mr. Belknap would derive. That evening he insisted very urgently upon my going down the river with him. I wanted time to consider; but that if he would make any engagements on which I could rely, I was willing to join. I said I would call at his island on the next Saturday. We walked to Mr. Woodbridge's, and he made inquiries if I was acquainted with surveying. I said if I could get any thing in that way, I would go; but I had heard of other objects being in view.

Mr. Hay. Did you press him to disclose the real objects of this plan?

Answer. I did. He referred me to Mr. Belknap; and if I concluded to go, he would let me know more when I called on him.

Question. Did you see Mr. Belknap?

Answer. I did; but I had not time enough to enter into the merits of the cause. Afterwards I visited Mr. Blannerhasset, and he asked me whether I had determined to go down the river. I told him that I had not yet had sufficient time to talk with Mr. Belknap. I asked him what were the prospects and what were the discoveries of the objects he would make to me, and then I would tell him whether I would go or not. He said that I must engage first, and then he would tell me. Mr. Blannerhasset seemed willing to say very little on the subject, and seemed rather to consider me as a spy. I wanted some assurances, and perhaps intimated that I wanted every thing to be put on paper. I told him that I had heard they would bear the expenses of the people back; and I think he said that that would be very unreasonable. I made some inquiries as to their numbers; and he said that some were coming down the river from Pittsburg, enough to furnish crews to the boats that were building on the Muskingum; I think he mentioned two hundred. He mentioned General Eaton as engaged. I asked him whether he expected three or four thousand men down the river. He said he could not tell. I asked him if he expected one thousand. He could not inform me. He observed that it was necessary for every person who descended the river to carry arms. I asked him the reason; and he said that there were a number of Spaniards or Indians on the Red River, who might attack them if they were not armed. He then observed that he would prefer rifles in preference to common fowling-pieces.

Cross-examined.

Question. Did any person go from your part of the country but Mr. Blannerhasset?

Answer. No one from Marietta.

General William Eaton, sworn.

SATURDAY, September 26.

Mr. Hay. We only wish that part of your testimony, sir, which you have not yet delivered. You recollect that there was a part of it which was excluded by the decision of the court.

General Eaton. I know nothing concerning Blannerhasset and Smith. I have no recollection that their names were mentioned to me till after the prosecution was commenced. All that I know of Burr's project to dismember the Union is already before the court. After Colonel Burr had expressed to me the intended projects already related, and overcome my objections, he went so far as to assert that he would erect his standard at the seat of Government. Mr. Burr inquired of me with what officers of the marine corps and of the navy I was acquainted. I told him with most of them. It is impossible for me at this period to remember distinctly every adverb expressed to me in the course of conversation; but this I perfectly recollect, that if he could gain the marine corps, and secure to his interests the naval commanders, Truxton, Preble, and Decatur, he would turn Congress neck and heels out of doors, assassinate the President, (or what amounted to that,) and declare himself the protector of an energetic Government. If that distinct expression was not used, (though the impression is strong on my mind that it was used in the course of conversation) yet he used such expressions as these: "hang him," "throw him into the Potomac," "send him to Carter's mountain." Mr. Burr proposed to me to endeavor to gain the marine corps, and to sound Preble and Decatur, with whom I had been in habits of intimacy, but I had not been so with Truxton. A circumstance now recurs to my recollection. He also desired me to gain a Captain Davidson, a very brave man, and who is as honest as he is brave. Mr. Burr seemed to select a Mr. Reynolds, a lieutenant of marines, a handsome and excellent officer, whom he wished to engage. He grew importunate on the subject of the marine corps, and asked me, with some eagerness, how the marine corps stood. I answered him, "make yourself easy, sir; the marine corps stand as they should stand." Here, I beg leave to observe, that I never felt myself prepared to insult the honor of either of those gentlemen by making such propositions to them; and if I had thought them corruptible, I was not yet prepared. I remonstrated with Colonel Burr on the fallacy of his hopes to engage such men as Truxton, Preble, and Decatur in the projects he had conceived; observing that these gentlemen were clothed with well-merited honors, independent in their circumstances, and that such were not the materials for a revolution. This Mr. Burr admitted; but observed that they were undoubtedly like others, conscious of the imbecility of the Government, and, like all military men, would prefer (I think that was his expression) a Government of more energy, where enterprise would be encouraged and merit duly rewarded.

I stated obstacles to the project then in speculation, such as I thought insurmountable. I asserted that it would be impossible to find a party of men in this country who would support him in projects of such a treasonable, and,

I think I said, murderous nature. He observed that he knew better the dispositions of the principal citizens of the United States than I did. He made reference, I think, to the political divisions of the people. At this distant moment, however, I cannot be positive. I recollect to have mentioned to Colonel Burr that I had lately travelled from one extreme of the Union to the other; and though I found a diversity of political sentiment among the people, they appeared united at the most distant aspect of national danger. He again recurred to the weakness and want of energy of the administration, and to his own resources; he seemed to make his project meritorious, as he said the degraded situation of our country required more energy in the Government; he said that the blow must be struck, and if he struck it at that time and place, he would be supported by the best blood of America. I observed that one solitary word would destroy him. He asked me what word. I said "USURPER." He smiled at my want of confidence, and quoted examples from ancient and modern history, in which I think were named Julius Cæsar, Cromwell, and Bonaparte. Much speculative conversation passed, which I cannot distinctly recollect, but which went to convince me of the unprepared state of the people of these United States to defend themselves against an energetic blow; which conversation was pretty much closed by this observation of mine, that if he should succeed at the seat of Government, his throat would be cut in six weeks by Yankee militia.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Baker. At what time was this conversation held?

Answer. Between the middle of February and the last of March, 1806.

Question. Cannot you come nearer to the time?

Answer. We had frequent conversations. I received various notes from Colonel Burr, requesting to see me. Our conversations were commonly held at the house of Mr. Wheaton, sergeant-at-arms, where Colonel Burr boarded. I frequently dined at that house with gentlemen in Congress, and we sometimes passed an hour or a half before dinner in conversation. We had interviews at other times, when the subject was started.

Mr. Botts. At what particular period was it, sir, that you exclaimed against the views of Colonel Burr?

Answer. As to the time, I do not recollect.

Question. I mean as to the stage of your communication?

Answer. It was when he opened his views to me of overturning the Government. But, through the whole of our intercourse, I used such strong expressions of disapprobation against his plans, that Colonel Burr ought to have been satisfied that he had no right to use my name.

Question. Was there no particular expression by which you conveyed to him your unwillingness to associate in his plans.

Answer. I have already stated to the court that my expressions must have convinced Colonel Burr that I was not disposed for the enterprise.

Question. Was there no particular objection you made more distinguished than any other by energy of language?

Answer. None more so than I have already stated. I did not think it good policy to awaken the suspicions of Colonel Burr.

Question. Do you recollect the time when you threw off the mask?

Answer. It was when I told him that the people were not prepared for his usurpations; that the very name of usurper would put him down; and although he might calculate on the weakness of some quarters of the Union, yet there was strength in the north, which would cut him off. When Colonel Burr returned to the subject of dismembering the Union, the central project seemed to have been abandoned.

Mr. Wickham. You said that it was not your policy to be more explicit; will you explain what you meant by that observation?

Answer. I have already given you an explanation of that before the court and the jury, but I will repeat it. I knew not that Mr. Burr had made communications to any one else; and if I had positively declared that I would oppose him, I doubted whether he would not turn the tables upon me. I had a further view. Had Mr. Burr, by means unknown to me, got his outrage upon the Government into motion, I should have endeavored to have been near him.

Question. Was your conversation about the marine corps before or after throwing off the mask?

Answer. I think that it was previous. My memory, as to time, is not the most accurate. Many things may have escaped my memory; and, as it relates to the question of time, I cannot be positive on the subject.

Mr. Botts. Did you say that your toast was printed in a Springfield paper?

Answer. I was about to observe, with the permission of the court, on that subject. I never meant to be positive on that point. I am impressed with the opinion that this toast went through the hands of Stephen Pynchon, of Brimfield, and through him to said paper. The toasts have been given to the public, and it is more than possible I gave it more than once.

Question. Who was the printer of the Springfield paper?

Answer. I do not at this time recollect his name, though he is among the number of my friends.

Mr. Wickham. Or the title of the paper? Answer. "The Spy."

Mr. Botts. You have detailed a number of harsh expressions which you used to Colonel Burr. Did he keep in perfect good temper all this time?

Answer. Colonel Burr, sir, has a powerful command of his muscles; I did not find at all times that they were unruffled; I could read in his countenance sometimes concern, sometimes solicitude, and sometimes a disposition to make a trifle of my objections.

Question. I think you said that it was generally your purpose not to disclose, in your intercourse with Colonel Burr, that you were inimical to his views?

Answer. You understood me correctly.

Question. But that, nevertheless, his muscles were sometimes ruffled? Answer. They were.

Question. Were your observations then of a nature to ruffle him?

Answer. I spoke to Colonel Burr, sir, with much plainness; and, even if I had been cordial in my approbation of his plans, I should have sounded my objections, that I might have tried his force. I have done the best that I could for my country; I have attempted to exert all my wisdom; it was a painful ground on which I was taken. I took the advice of two intelligent gentlemen, (whose names I am at liberty to mention,) and they did not think it advisable for me to make a full disclosure to the Government, for my solitary communication would not avail against the weight of Colonel Burr's character; for, with all the evidence even now before the world, I still feel the weight of that character.

Mr. Baker. And who were the gentlemen that advised you?

Answer. The Honorable Samuel Dana and John Cotton Smith.

Mr. Burr. Had we any conversation before the month of January?

Answer. It recurs to me as highly probable that I first spoke to you, in Philadelphia, between the 20th and 24th of December.

Question. On this subject?

Answer. I had a communication with another gentleman, at that time, of a very indefinite nature. At Philadelphia you gave me no distinct nor well-digested ideas of the project, but you spoke of a Spanish war.

Mr. Martin. We must have that gentleman's name. Who was it?

Answer. Jonathan Dayton.

Mr. Burr. Had you any expectations or promises of a military command from Government?

Answer. It is true that the chief clerk in the Department of War, though in confidential terms, asked me whether I would accept a vacant rank of lieutenant colonel on the establishment; I answered that I would take no rank on a peace establishment. There were no other overtures to me on this subject; but, when there was a prospect of war, you, and other men whom I thought as honorably of as I then thought of you, proposed a command to me in case of war. It is true that a gentleman near the Government asked me if I would take a command under the celebrated General Miranda. I asked him if he was authorized by Government to make this proposition? He said no! I then observed the question required no measure, (as I found that, too, to be a project of darkness.) I was determined to know to what it all tended.

Mr. Baker. Who was that man?

Answer. Dr. William Thornton. I will ask the indulgence of the court to make one observation. It has been asserted by Colonel Burr that it was his intention to disqualify me for the stand which I now occupy; I shall remain here a reasonable time to indulge him in the attempt; it will not avail him. Let him look through all the pages of my life; he may find some errors and extravagances there, but he will find neither felony, nor fraud, nor neglect of duty.

Evidence of General Wilkinson.

SATURDAY, September 26.

Mr. Hay. Will you be so good as to state the written communications made to you by Colonel Burr, and the oral communications of Mr. Swartwout?

General Wilkinson. On or about the 8th of October of the last year, (1806,) I was sitting, in the evening, with Colonel Cushing, at his quarters, and with him alone, when a gentleman entered.

Mr. Hay. At what place?

Answer. At Natchitoches. The gentleman inquired for Colonel Cushing, who rose and received him; he presented a letter to the colonel, who broke the seal and read it. The gentleman then announced himself to be the Mr. Swartwout referred to in that letter, and Colonel Cushing introduced him to me as the friend of General Dayton; handing me, at the same time, the letter, a copy of which I have, and the contents of which I well recollect. The general then produced a paper, said to be the deposition of Colonel Cushing, which comprehended this letter.

Mr. Botts. When you are about to show a paper, you will please submit it to our inspection.

General Wilkinson. I shall be governed by the judge in that respect.

Mr. Botts. Then we shall request the judge to govern you in that respect.

General Wilkinson. I shall endeavor to conduct myself with propriety, and in the most decorous manner to the court.

[Here General Wilkinson recapitulated the contents of the letter, which may be seen in the annexed deposition of Colonel Cushing, marked A.]

Mr. Swartwout took a seat, and informed us that, being on his way down the Mississippi for New Orleans, in company with a Mr. Ogden, they had heard at Fort Adams of the impending operation against the Spaniards, which had induced him to ascend the Red River in order to join me, and volunteer his services in the campaign; and that Mr. Ogden had proceeded on his journey to New Orleans. Colonel Cushing retired for a few minutes, and, pending that interval, Mr. Swartwout slipped from his side pocket a letter and packet or envelope, which he said he was charged by Colonel Burr to deliver to me. I hold the letter in my hand, and it is a formal letter of introduction of Mr. Swartwout by Colonel Burr.

Mr. Martin observed that, if any letters were produced, they should be lodged with the clerk, where both parties might have an opportunity of inspecting them.

Chief Justice. Not unless they are read. [The letter was laid upon the clerk's table.]

I inquired of Mr. Swartwout where Colonel Burr was; he answered that he was in Philadelphia, or that he had left him there. Colonel Cushing returned, and the conversation took a general course. After some time Mr. Swartwout withdrew, and I retired to my chamber, and in the packet or envelope I found a letter addressed to me in cipher from Colonel Burr.

Chief Justice. I did not understand you. How did you get that letter?

Answer. It was in the packet or envelope. This letter was principally in cipher; the closing paragraph, however, was in the ordinary script; I resorted to the key, and attempted an interpretation of the letter; I did not complete it, but discovered enough in the course of the evening to satisfy me that there was some illicit project on foot. I arose early in the morning, and called on Colonel Cushing, my second in command, and adjutant and inspector to the army; I stated to him that Mr. Swartwout had borne me a letter from Colonel Burr, the nature of which I explained; and observed to him that Mr. Swartwout's declarations that he had come with a view to volunteer his services in the campaign against the Spaniards were merely intended to cover his real design; I then communicated to Colonel Cushing the measures which I should pursue, enjoining on him, at the same time, to observe the strictest secrecy. Were it permissible to be read, here is a statement of facts, sworn to by Colonel Cushing. [The general held, at this time, in his hand, the paper marked A.]

Mr. Wirt. This statement is signed by Colonel Cushing, with a certificate of his qualification, in legal form, annexed.

Mr. Wickham. An affidavit forming no part of the case before the court cannot be introduced.

Mr. Hay. General Wilkinson states that, on the morning after the letter was partly deciphered, he stated to Colonel Cushing its contents, and communicated to him the measures which he should pursue. These are facts detailed in that deposition, and, if the gentlemen do not wish to see them, there is an end of the controversy.

The general proceeded. One paragraph of the letter I have observed was in the ordinary script. [Here the paragraph was read by General Wilkinson in the following words: "He is a man of inviolable honor and perfect discretion; formed to execute rather than to project; capable of relating facts with fidelity, and incapable of relating them otherwise; he is thoroughly informed of the plans and intentions of _____, and will disclose to you as far as you inquire, and no farther; he has imbibed a reverence for your character, and may be embarrassed in your presence; put him at ease, and he will satisfy you."] I determined to avail myself of this reference to obtain from Mr. Swartwout that information which I could not discover from the letter—that is, the object to which Colonel Burr expressly directed his views; and, in the course of several days, I obtained from him, substantially, the following facts: That he had left Colonel Burr at Philadelphia, occupied almost day and night on an enterprise which he had in contemplation: that he lived in a retired part of the city, in a small house, with several rooms, where he received persons with whom he had to transact business; and that he saw no two persons at the same time; he observed to me that Commodore Truxton was frequently with him, and zealously engaged in his enterprise; he observed, at the same time, that a man who superintended the public buildings at Washington was also zealously engaged in his enterprise; he did not recollect his name, but on my mentioning the name of Latrobe, he said that was the man. He said that he had been despatched by Colonel Burr from Philadelphia, and had traversed the States of Ohio and Kentucky; I so understood the gentleman at that time, but have since discovered that he descended the river.

Mr. Botts. By whom did you understand that he had descended the river?

Answer. By a man who informed me that he had rowed him down from Pittsburg.

Another reason why I may have been mistaken was this: he informed me that he had passed to Frankfort in quest of General Adair, for whom he had despatches for Colonel Burr; and, not hearing of him there, had returned back to Lexington in pursuit of him, where he was informed by Major Waggoner that General Adair (being in ill health) had gone to some medical spring, and that, if he would wait a few days, he might see him; that he did so, and thus had an interview with him, without incurring any suspicion; at which time he delivered his despatches. He said General Adair was zealously engaged in the enterprise, and observed, "tell him that I will not write to him, but that I expect to meet him at the place; that he may depend I will meet him at the spot;" or words to that effect.

Mr. Swartwout proceeded to inform me that he came to Louisville, and felt himself at a loss how he should reach me with the most certainty; that a rumor had prevailed there that I had descended the river. Finally, on the advice of Mr. Floyd, he determined to go across the country, under an expectation of finding me at St. Louis. Accompanied by Mr. Ogden he prosecuted his journey to Kaskaskias. Finding that I had descended the river, he determined to alter his route; he purchased a skiff, employed hands, and followed me down to Fort Adams. At this point I asked him whether this sudden change of route might not expose him to suspicions? He said that, to guard against this, he had wounded his horse with his penknife, and informed the people that his intentions were to have visited St. Louis; but, having experienced this accident, he should pursue his original destination, which was to descend the river to New Orleans. On arriving at Fort Adams, and discovering that I had proceeded to Natchitoches, he determined to follow me; and his friend, Mr. Ogden, (pursuing his route,) went on with despatches from Colonel Burr to his friends in New Orleans. Mr. Swartwout informed me that Colonel Burr, supported by a numerous and powerful association, extending from New York to New Orleans, was about to levy an armed force of seven thousand men, with a view to carry an expedition against the Mexican provinces; that five hundred men would descend the Allegany river with Colonel Swartwout and a Major or Colonel Tyler; that the boats were already built. He observed that this Territory would be revolutionized, where the people were ready to join; and that some seizing, he supposed, would be necessary at New Orleans; that they expected to make their embarkation about the first of February; that they proposed landing at La Vera Cruz, and marching from thence to Mexico. I observed to him that there were large sums of money in the Bank of New Orleans. He replied that he knew that full well. I observed, "surely you will not violate private property?" He said, "we mean only to borrow, and will return it;" that they must equip themselves at New Orleans; that naval protection would be had from Great Britain; that Commodore Truxton and the officers of the navy were so disgusted with the Government, that they were ready to join; and that pilot-boat built schooners were contracted for on the southern coast of the United States for the service.

He inquired of me whether I had heard of Dr. Bollman? and, on my replying in the negative, he expressed some surprise; observed that Dr. Bollman and a Mr. Alexander had been despatched from Philadelphia, by sea, to New Orleans, with despatches from Colonel Burr to me, and that they must have arrived. Mr. Swartwout informed me that he was obliged to go to New Orleans; and was also under engagements to meet Colonel Burr and General Dayton at Nashville on the 20th of November. I think Mr. Swartwout left Natchitoches about the 18th of October for New Orleans, as I understood.

It may be proper, in this stage of my testimony, to say that the envelope, which contained the ciphered letter from Colonel Burr, covered also two other letters. To save misapprehension, it may also be proper to say that, when I speak of an envelope, it is in contradistinction to a sealed packet. It occurs to my recollection that a letter, addressed to John Peters, Esq. of Nashville, was enclosed in the envelope, as well as another letter, from General Dayton, in cipher. (See Dayton's letter, note C.)

Mr. Baker. Do you say that the letter from General Dayton was enclosed in another ciphered letter?

Answer. No. I say expressly the reverse. It came with it.

Mr. Wickham objected to reading the letter from General Dayton. He said that General Dayton being absent, he had no opportunity of consulting him, or of ascertaining his wishes respecting it. If there be no other evidence that the letter was from General Dayton, except that a letter was received by General Wilkinson, purporting to be a letter of General Dayton's, it was not evidence.

Mr. Hay. The fact stated by General Wilkinson is, that he received this letter. It may have had a considerable influence with him, as to the course which he pursued. He received the letter, together with another ciphered letter from Colonel Burr; and the fact being that he received this letter, purporting to be a letter from General Dayton, it surely may be read.

Mr. Wickham. If the letter by itself would not be evidence, its being connected with others would not make it so.

Mr. Hay. On that distinction I mean to offer it. If General Dayton were before the court, he might require some other evidence as to the authenticity of the letter. General Wilkinson is telling his whole story; he is to give his whole narrative; and all the circumstances will bear upon each other.

The Chief Justice at first said that, if General Wilkinson could say that the letter influenced his conduct, it might be read; but, finally, he observed that, on the motion now before the court, it might be improper to read it. If it be the intention of General Wilkinson to state that certain conduct of his was produced by that letter, he may state that such conduct was produced.

General Wilkinson. I must say this letter materially influenced the measures which I pursued.

Mr. Hay. There is certainly a wide difference between this case, a mere examination before a judge, and a trial before a jury. This letter may identify General Dayton with the meeting at the mouth of Cumberland.

General Wilkinson. Here is the letter, addressed to J. Peters, Esq., signed A. Stephens. It appears to be in a disguised hand; but I have no doubt of its being the hand-writing of Colonel Burr. (See note D.)

I returned from the operations against the Spaniards the 5th of November, and on the next morning—

Chief Justice. To what place did you return? Answer. To Natchitoches.

On the morning of the 6th November a small Frenchman (whom I had never seen before, nor have I ever seen him since) presented a packet to me and took his leave. This I found to be a letter from Dr. Bollman, covering a letter from Colonel Burr. The letter from Dr. Bollman, in his proper hand-writing, bears date September 27th, 1806, from New Orleans. (See note * * *) Here is the ciphered letter enclosed by Dr. Bollman; and I find it is an exact duplicate, as it professes to be, of the one received by Mr. Swartwout, with this variation: "Dr. Bollman, equally confidential, better informed on the subject, and more intelligent, will hand this duplicate." [This letter was laid upon the clerk's table.] That letter also enclosed one from General Dayton.

Mr. McRae. Of the same tenor as the former? Answer. No; quite different.

This letter of General Dayton is partly in cipher, and partly in the common script. (See note E.)

Mr. Wirt. Are you acquainted with General Dayton's hand-writing? Answer. Perfectly.

Mr. Hay. How did you become acquainted with it?

Answer. From a long and familiar correspondence. Here is a letter from General Dayton to me, introducing his son, which will show the similarity of the hand-writing: [here the general produced the letter of introduction.] On the same morning I received the following information from Natchez, in a letter from James L. Donaldson, dated the 30th November, 1806: [here General Wilkinson offered to read the letter, but it was rejected by the court.—See note F.] In consequence of the receipt of this letter from Mr. Donaldson, and my reflections on the letters from Colonel Burr, I determined to concentrate my whole force at New Orleans as soon as possible. [Mr. Hay said that he was willing, in order to save time, to waive every thing which related to the operations of the army; and requested that General Wilkinson would proceed to relate what occurred at New Orleans.] I proceeded from Natchitoches to Natchez, and, descending from that place, reached Fort Adams on the 18th of November, where I found Mr. Swartwout, who had been taken ill on his route from Natchitoches to New Orleans, and, for his accommodation, was invited by some one of the officers to that place. He informed me that Mr. Ogden had reached that place on his way to Tennessee; but, being alarmed by the rumors which prevailed in that part of the country, he was afraid to proceed, and had halted there. I inquired of Mr. Swartwout whether Mr. Ogden had borne any letters. He said that he had not; but that Lieutenant Spence, of the navy, had been sent, some time before, from New Orleans through the country, with letters from Colonel Burr. I proceeded on, and reached New Orleans on the 25th of November, in the evening; and on the 26th, in the morning, I received this letter from Doctor Bollman: [here General Wilkinson produced the letter.—See note G.] This letter reminds me of a circumstance which I had omitted. The morning after I had received the letter of Doctor Bollman at Natchitoches, I acknowledged the receipt of it in a short note, and informed him that I should be in New Orleans about the 20th. I did not call on Doctor Bollman till the 30th. After the ordinary salutations, I inquired whether he had heard of Colonel Burr since his arrival. He informed me that he had not. I asked him whether he had heard of Lieutenant Spence's arrival in Tennessee. He inquired how I came to know any thing of Lieutenant Spence. I informed him that it was through Mr. Swartwout. He assured me that he had sent despatches for Colonel Burr by Lieutenant Spence, and that he had heard of his arrival at Nashville. He then inquired what part I meant to take. I observed that I felt myself delicately situated. It was impossible that I could take any part while I held my commission, and I was so circumstanced that I could not get rid of it. He asked me what I thought of the competency of the force of the undertaking. I observed that it depended upon a variety of circumstances, such as winds, weather, composition and appointment of the troops, skill in conduct, the resistance of their opponents, and other causes on which the success of military operations depends. But I gave it as my opinion that the force was insufficient. He said that Colonel Burr had gone too far to retract; that he had numerous and powerful friends in the United States, who stood pledged to support him with their fortunes; and that he must succeed. He then inquired of me my opinion as to the state of the magazines of provisions in New Orleans. I observed that, if Colonel Burr descended with the force proposed, they would starve, unless he brought provisions along with him; for I had before ascertained precisely the quantity then on hand. He said that it was his opinion, also, that there would be a scarcity of provisions; that he had written to Colonel Burr on the subject, and that he expected a supply from New York and Norfolk, where Colonel Burr had many friends. He said that he had noticed in the public prints the sailing of some vessels with flour, and supposed that they might be destined for that place. I did not see Doctor Bollman afterwards till the 5th of December, the day after the arrival of the mail; and I called on him to inquire the news. He said that he had seen a letter from Colonel Burr, of the 30th of October, in which he stated that he should be at Natchez on the 20th of December, with two thousand men, to be followed by four thousand more; and that he could have raised or levied twelve thousand men as easily as six, if he had thought them necessary. I then informed Doctor Bollman that, if Colonel Burr came to New Orleans, I should oppose him. He replied, they must come there for provisions and equipments. He observed that Colonel Burr had great confidence in me; but he did not know what had passed between us; and asked if I could not make such a defence as would cover my reputation, and still permit him to come. I replied in the negative, and we then parted. Some few mornings afterwards, he called at my quarters; there was a gentleman in the room, and I took him into the piazza. He said that he wanted to know my determination. I expressed my surprise, and told him that he knew my determination.

Mr. Hay. While you were thus extracting from Dr. Bollman the secrets of his party, were you taking any measures for the security of New Orleans?

Answer. Yes; my orders and instructions will show what measures I deemed it my duty to pursue. For these I am responsible to the Executive of the United States.

Mr. Martin. Are the ciphered letters filed? Answer. Yes.

Question. Is the key furnished? Answer. Here it is.

[Mr. Botts mentioned the situation of Mr. Tazewell, who was summoned as a witness on the part of Colonel Burr. He said that Mr. Tazewell had represented the situation of his family to be such as to require his immediate return home. Mr. Botts observed that, although he had introduced the request of Mr. Tazewell to be discharged, he should be compelled to oppose it.]

Mr. Tazewell stated that he had been unexpectedly summoned, he well knew, to answer interrogatories as to certain proceedings before the grand jury; that he had just been informed of an occurrence in his domestic affairs which made it indispensably necessary for him to return immediately; that there were many gentlemen in this place and its vicinity of the grand jury who were as competent to give evidence on the points to which he should be called upon to depose as he possibly could be, and who would be subjected to no kind of inconvenience in attending. If he were to be examined at all, he requested that it might be immediately done, for the situation of his family was such that he should be compelled to return.

The Chief Justice said to Mr. Tazewell that he knew full well that it was not in the power of the court to discharge him.

Mr. Botts said it was impossible to examine Mr. Tazewell till General Wilkinson had gone through his testimony. It was not possible to know the importance of his evidence till General Wilkinson was cross-examined.

Mr. Hay observed that it was an unprecedented measure to introduce any member of the grand jury to prove what had passed in the jury room.

Mr. Botts. We have not said for what purpose we mean to introduce him.

Mr. Hay. I presume I may be permitted to presume for what purpose.

Mr. Baker said that he meant to speak generally of the propriety and convenience of giving testimony as to what passed in the grand jury room. One good effect, at least, would result from it: that, by introducing witnesses to prove what had passed there, it would prevent people from giving information to the grand jury which they could not support elsewhere.

Mr. Botts called for the key to the ciphered letters of Colonel Burr. General Wilkinson handed him a small pocket dictionary, and a paper containing certain hieroglyphics.

Mr. Botts. In the duplicate received by Dr. Bollman there is an erasure; will you be so good as to explain the cause of it?

General Wilkinson. That erasure was made by myself, and the words afterwards introduced by me. I have a deposition which will be more satisfactory than my own explanation.

Mr. Botts. Whose deposition? Answer. Mr. Duncan's.

[Mr. Wirt read the deposition of Mr. Duncan; for which see note H.]

Mr. Botts. When was the erasure made?

Answer. During the sitting of the Legislature in New Orleans.

Question. When were the words restored? Answer. I cannot now state with certainty.

Question. Was the letter exhibited to the Legislature?

Answer. It was introduced, but I confined myself to oral communications.

Question. What was the occasion of the erasure?

Answer. To put it out of the power of a certain faction in the Legislature, to whom, at that time, I intended to submit the paper; to conceal it from that faction who were opposed to my measures, and who, I believed, were inimical to the true interests of their country, and were laboring to excite suspicions that I was connected with Colonel Burr, in order to destroy the public confidence in me, and thus to defeat my measures. At the head of this faction I considered John Watkins, Esq., the Speaker. Having determined not to submit the letter, I restored the words.

Question. Did you prepare any translation to submit to the Legislature?

Answer. No; I only made notes.

Question. Did you make a translation for any other purpose? Answer. Only a partial and imperfect one.

Question. For what purpose? Answer. To understand it.

Question. Was there any other occasion for which a translation was made? Answer. No.

Question. Did you make any translation for the Executive? Answer. No.

Question. Were those words, "yours, postmarked 13th of May, is received," erased? Answer. Yes.

Question. Where is the copy of your letter covering a copy of that of Colonel Burr, and your deposition to the President of the United States?

Answer. It is among my papers.

Mr. Hay. Do I understand you correctly when I suppose you say that the translation intended for the Legislature of New Orleans was sent to the President?

Answer. No.

Mr. Hay immediately observed that, on recollecting dates, he perceived that he had misunderstood General Wilkinson; that the letter was sent to the President before the session of the Legislature of New Orleans.

Mr. Botts. Do I understand you to say that this was your translation of the letter which was intended for the Legislature of New Orleans?

Answer. No; it was Mr. Duncan's.

Mr. Botts. Have you ever sworn that this was a true translation? Answer. No; only substantially so.

General Wilkinson. May I be permitted to offer a few words of explanation? When Doctor Bollman was arrested, I will confess to you that I was so little acquainted with judicial proceedings, that I did not know it was necessary to do more than accompany him with a letter of advice. I was about to send him off in this way, when Mr. Duncan suggested to me the propriety of sending forward a deposition to justify his commitment. I put the letter into the hands of Mr. Duncan, with the key; and he made out the interpretation. When Mr. Duncan presented the translation to me, I stated my objections to the omissions. He urged me to sign the deposition. The time was urgent; the express waiting; and I confess that I feared a rescue. This did not give me much time to consult my understanding. If I had, it is probable that I should have resisted the signing of the deposition, with those omissions, notwithstanding my confidence in the judgment and integrity of my counsel. I was also at the time oppressed by domestic afflictions; and my mind was hurried and agitated by the painful and interesting scenes which surrounded me.

Mr. Botts. Were there variations between this original letter in cipher, and that sent on to the President?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Were they noticed by you or by Mr. Duncan in your presence?

Answer. I suppose so; because I objected, generally, to the omissions.

Question. How was the cipher formed?

Answer. It consisted of an American edition of Entick's dictionary, and of hieroglyphics.

Question. Which was formed first? Answer. The dictionary.

Question. When was that formed? [Here General Wilkinson referred to a letter, without a signature, dated in 1800; and said he presumed it must have been formed about that time.]

Question. Do you know the time of the year? Answer. I presume it was October.

Mr. Baker. To whom was that letter addressed? Answer. To myself.

Question. By whom was it written?

Answer. By Col. Burr. [Gen. Wilkinson observed that it was a private letter, to which he had referred merely to refresh his memory, the concluding paragraph of which is, "When I receive your cipher and your address, you shall hear from me." Mr. Wickham insisted on seeing the letter; Gen. Wilkinson refused; but said it was at the disposal of Col. Burr, and handed it to him.]

Mr. Botts. With whom was the cipher formed? Answer. Col. Burr and myself.

Question. When were the hieroglyphics agreed upon?

Answer. To the best of my recollection the hieroglyphics, which refer to the alphabet, were formed about the change of the administration, after the induction of the President. The hieroglyphics are divided into two parts: one part relates to the alphabet and figures, and the other part to arbitrary names or designations.

Question. When were the arbitrary names established?

Answer. I think in the year 1795 or 1796, but not delivered to Colonel Burr at that time.

Question. Who originally devised the cipher?

Answer. That you hold in your hand (the hieroglyphics) was devised partly by myself, and partly by Captain Campbell Smith.

Question. Are you sure that it was in 1796 in which that part was devised?

Answer. I think I said in 1795 or 1796, but could not ascertain which; but, adverting to the motives which induced me to form it, I think it was in 1794.

Question. Are there no circumstances which can enable you to ascertain the time?

Answer. I could have proved with certainty the time, if a witness whom I had summoned had attended. Here is another cipher made by Captain Smith, in 1794; and the hieroglyphics representing the President and Vice President are the same with those used in the cipher with Col. Burr.

Col. Burr. What was the mode adopted by you of sending round the prisoners? By public vessels?

Answer. No. My plan was to engage passages on board private vessels, and to lay in a double stock of stores for their accommodation.

Question. When did your despatches go on board the vessel? Can you ascertain the time?

Answer. Not without recurring to my correspondence.

Mr. Wirt. You had been for many years in habits of intimate correspondence with Col. Burr? Answer. Yes.

Continuation of Gen. Wilkinson's evidence.

TUESDAY, September 29.

Gen. Wilkinson, addressing the judge:

From the rapidity with which the interrogatories were put, and the promptitude of my answers when last before you, I fear some misapprehension may have occurred; I therefore beg leave to explain the facts to which the interrogatories appeared to be pointed, which I trust I shall be able to do clearly, concisely, and satisfactorily.

The only explanation of the ciphered letters of Col. Burr, transmitted by Swartwout and Bollman, which I have made, was done hastily, and by piecemeal, at Natchitoches; I think I have called this an imperfect interpretation, and I have done so, because, although it gave me their full sense, yet, by omissions and abbreviations, it could not be well understood by another.

On reflection, I think it was from this document, and not from notes, that the purport of Col. Burr's letters was given to the Legislative Council and Representatives of the Territory of Orleans. I find the summons from the House bears date the 15th of January last, and I believe the examination commenced on the 17th. It lasted two days, and therefore I cannot recollect the particular course or circumstances. I find, by references to my papers, that certain documents were submitted to the clerk to be read under restrictions; and it is probable I carried with me to the House all the papers respecting the subject of inquiry.

I have some impression that this same document was proffered to the grand jury to aid them in their interpretation of the ciphered letters of Colonel Burr, but I cannot speak with certainty. This examination lasted several days, and, like that before the Legislative Council and Representatives of the Territory of Orleans, was diffuse, desultory, and complicated; and therefore it is impossible for me to charge my memory with minutiae.

The interpretation of Mr. Duncan was made the 25th or 26th of December, 1806, twenty days before my examination by the Legislative Council and Representatives of the Territory of Orleans.

I did not transmit an interpretation of the ciphered letter to the President, but I well recollect explaining it to Mr. Isaac Briggs, the confidential messenger sent with my letter of the 12th of November, who was charged also to make oral communications to the President.

By reference to the original letter, it will be found that a deposition is attached to it: this was done preparatory to the transmittal of it to the President, as was my intention, by a special messenger; but the fear that it might be lost changed my determination. I kept it in my possession, and brought it with me.

Referring to Colonel Burr's letter of the 10th of October, 1800, I have said that I believed the cipher depending on the book was formed in that year, yet it may have been afterwards. I perfectly remember that, about that period, Colonel Burr informed me he had to send one hundred and fifty miles for the counterpart of the book; and, also, in answer to a letter I wrote him from the frontier of Georgia, the Oconee river, in the year 1802, he then being in Charlestown, he informed me he could not write as freely as he wished, as he had not the cipher with him.

In accounting for the erasure of the duplicate of Colonel Burr's letters, I have mentioned the apprehension which had been excited of my being an accomplice of Colonel Burr's, and that I was preparing for his reception. This device had excited such alarm, and the friends of Government were so incensed, that I was cautioned by Silas Dinsmore, Esq. to take care how I moved, as I was in danger of being tarred and feathered.

After General Wilkinson had finished his address to the court, Mr. Martin asked him if he had the original translation of the ciphered letter of Colonel Burr? His answer was, I have not. I have looked for it, but cannot find it.

General Wilkinson then said that he wished to present the deposition of Captain Walback, formerly a member of his family. It went to explain his very general habit of corresponding in cipher. (See the deposition of Captain J. B. Walback.)

Mr. Wickham. Have you ever accurately deciphered the letter sent to the President?

Answer. No. I have said before that the only interpretation I ever made was hastily done at Natchitoches.

Question. Then you are not able now to point out the difference between Mr. Duncan's translation and the original letter?

Answer. Specifically I cannot, substantially I can. Such parts were left out as were calculated to inculpate me, for the reasons already stated.

Question. I observe one of the ciphers is in hieroglyphics designed in 1799 or 1801.

Answer. That is erroneous. When the hieroglyphics were formed, they were taken from a small slip of paper, and annexed to that in your hand to prevent its being lost.

Question. Can you tell when they were made?

Answer. I cannot, precisely. I have before stated the time, as nearly as I can.

Question. Can you tell upon what occasion they were made?

Answer. For the purpose of communicating with Colonel Burr.

Question. Do you recollect your having sent a letter to Colonel Burr, from St. Louis, in May or June, 1806?

Answer. I have such an impression, but have not the most distant recollection of its contents.

Mr. Wirt submitted it to the court whether it could be proper for the opposite counsel to interrogate General Wilkinson as to a letter which was in their own possession. If they meant to rely upon the letter as evidence, they ought to produce it. He considered it unfair to select such parts as might tend to inculpate General Wilkinson, and keep back those which would lead to an explanation of his conduct.

Mr. Wickham said it was their own paper, and they were not bound to produce it till they thought proper. Their object was to cross-examine the witness, and see whether he was consistent with himself. This they had a right to do.

The Chief Justice said that the question would not be permitted to have any bearing on the cause, unless the letter was produced. Any thing drawn out of the letter would not be testimony, unless the opposite party, who had it in their possession, would exhibit it to the court; but it was obvious that they had another object, which was to ascertain the consistency of the witness.

Mr. Wirt. If the object be to shake the credibility of the witness, is it not fair to him and to the conduct of the cause to exhibit the whole letter?

Mr. Baker. A very ingenious mode has been adopted by the gentlemen. We put the questions, and they undertake to furnish the answers, without leaving it to the witness to do it himself. We do intend to shake the credibility of General Wilkinson, and to make him produce the shake himself.

Mr. McRae. I understand the court to say that the examination, as to the contents of the letter, shall have no effect, unless the letter itself be produced.

Chief Justice. General Wilkinson says that he has no recollection of the contents of the letter. The subject-matter of the letter cannot be established by the examination; but the witness may be cross-examined for the purposes avowed by the opposite counsel.

Mr. Wickham. Do you recollect that you did write to Colonel Burr in 1806?

Answer. I have before stated that I have such an impression; but I have no recollection of the contents of any communication made to him, although I remember the motive which induced me to write.

Question. You have no recollection of any particular expression?

Answer. No: except in a letter of October or November, 1805.

Question. Have you no recollection of any expression or sentiment expressed in your letter of 1806?

Answer. I have no recollection.

Question. Was it your expression that we should have a war with Spain?

Answer. It was my opinion; and there was a very general impression that we should have a war with that Power.

Question. Do you recollect writing any thing respecting the measures of the Government in relation to a war with Spain? Have you no recollection of any opinion expressed in a letter to Colonel Burr?

Answer. I do not recollect having expressed any opinion respecting the measures of the Government. The only expression of which I have any idea, is one used in a letter of October or November, 1805, in which, I believe, I say, "I fear Miranda has taken the bread out of your mouth."

Question. There were letters published from you while in the neighborhood of the Spaniards. Have you copies of these letters here?

Answer. I have the whole correspondence.

Question. We only want the letters of September and October, which state that war with Spain is inevitable.

General Wilkinson. I think I may have said so, and I believe that I have papers here which throw some light on the subject. Here are my instructions to the officer who commanded the troops when they left St. Louis. (General Wilkinson handed to Mr. Wickham copies of his instructions to Colonel Cushing.)

Mr. McRae. What is the date of those instructions?

Answer. The 6th and 8th of May, 1806.

General Wilkinson said that he would with pleasure submit the whole correspondence, if he could do it consistently with his own ideas of propriety; but there were contained in it such secret military operations as it might be improper to expose.

Mr. Wickham. I think you state that, at that time, the expectation of a war with Spain was very general?

Answer. It was so; and, if my instructions to Colonel Cushing can be read, they will show my own impressions.

[Here Mr. McRae read the instructions of General Wilkinson to Colonel Cushing, of the 6th and 8th of May, 1806, for which see notes K and L.]

Question. I think you have said that there was a universal expectation of a war with Spain, about the time when the troops of that nation crossed the Sabine?

Answer. Yes, I have said so; I had made arrangements for a general attack.

Question. To what cause are we to ascribe the accommodation which took place between the two armies?

Answer. To a wish to spare the effusion of blood, and, perhaps, because on one side there was reluctance to fight.

Question. On which side? Answer. On the side of Spain.

Question. Can you tell the particular motive which induced them to recross the Sabine, and change their position?

Answer. I think I can explain them. Immediately on my arrival at Natchitoches, on the 24th of September, I addressed a letter to Governor Cordero, whom I considered the commander-in-chief of the Spanish forces on that frontier; I communicated to him my orders from the President, and urged him, on the ground of right and of humanity, to withdraw his troops from the east of the Sabine, and recross that river. Whether this or the vigorous preparations for offensive operations which I immediately commenced on my arrival at Natchitoches, produced the effect or not, I cannot tell; but the fact is, that the Spaniards, about the 27th of the month, raised their camp at Bayou Pierre, marching by their right, intersected the highway from Natchitoches to Nacogdoches, about twenty miles in my front, pursued that route, and recrossed the Sabine about the 29th or 30th.

Question. Was this after you had received the ciphered letter? Answer. No; it was some time before.

Question. Had you any correspondence with the Spanish commandant on the subject of Colonel Burr's expedition against Mexico?

Answer. None. The earliest communications which I made on that subject were after my return to Natchez?

Question. Has the jurisdiction of the United States ever been exercised as far as the Sabine?

Answer. I cannot tell.

Question. Was it in consequence of instructions from the Government that you concluded the convention with the Spanish commandant? Answer. No.

Question. I do not recollect whether that convention has ever been published? Answer. Never.

Question. Have you any copy of that convention?

Answer. Yes; but, until it shall be the pleasure of the Government to publish it, I do not think myself at liberty to divulge its contents; I do not think it reconcilable to the duty of a military commander to anticipate his Government in the publication of official communications.

Question. Were there any secret articles in that convention? Answer. None. There was but one article.

Question. Was there any sum of money agreed to be paid on either side? Answer. Not one cent.

Question. You note two letters of the President, one of the 21st of October, and the other of the 12th of November, 1806. Have you a copy of that of the 12th of November? and will you give me leave to ask whether that letter was before the grand jury?

Answer. It was submitted to the grand jury.

Mr. Wickham said that they called for a copy of that letter; if the counsel on the other side thought proper to oppose it, they might do it at once.

Mr. Hay. We shall certainly oppose the production of the letter; the President has been consulted on the subject, and he has excepted such parts as he thought it would be improper to produce.

The Chief Justice remarked that, after the President had been consulted, he could not think of requiring from General Wilkinson the exhibition of those parts of the letter which the President was unwilling to disclose.

Mr. Wickham. The whole letter having been before the grand jury, and acted upon by them, we certainly have a right to call for it also.

Question. Were the Spaniards in considerable force on the east side of the Sabine?

Answer. They were reputed to be so.

Question. What was the strength of the army of the United States?

Answer. About five hundred effective men.

Question. What orders did you receive from the Government in the months of December and February last?

Answer. I cannot say what particular orders I received during those months. Owing to the frequent changes of my position, I was for more than six months without orders. But it is impossible for me to answer the interrogatory to the extent to which it is put, without subjecting myself to severe military penalties; nothing can be more improper or dishonorable than to divulge military orders of a secret or confidential nature.

Mr. Wickham. There can be no doubt but, under the sanction of the oath which General Wilkinson has taken, he may be compelled to give testimony as to the points on which he has been interrogated. In England, nothing is more common than for the most secret transactions to be disclosed in a court of justice. Considerations of delicacy in the witness have never been permitted to have any weight.

Mr. Hay. There is a material difference; those were cases between individuals; this is a communication from the Executive Government. We are not at liberty to dive into the secrets of the Executive Department to know what orders they give to their agents, and to proclaim those orders to the world—orders which were given for the public good. There can be no doubt but that the public good does require that various orders of the Government should forever remain a secret.

Mr. Wickham. The gentleman did not understand my question. I asked General Wilkinson what orders he had received from Government in relation to Colonel Burr.

Question. Did you receive any orders to attack Colonel Burr and his party?

Answer. That question may require some qualification.

Question. Did you send any officers in disguise to take Colonel Burr?

Answer. I sent three.

Question. Their names?

Mr. Hay said that he did not think General Wilkinson was bound to answer such questions; that he was not bound to furnish evidence against himself, or to subject himself to prosecution. Although he believed that the exigencies of the times would justify the measure which General Wilkinson had adopted, it was left with himself to determine whether he would answer the question or not.

General Wilkinson. If the question goes to criminate myself, I presume that I am not bound to answer it.

Chief Justice. Would General Wilkinson be subjected to an action for sending to apprehend Colonel Burr, unless he had been seized?

Mr. Hay. It may go to criminate him as a military man; he may have acted without orders.

Mr. Wickham. I do not presume that he acted without orders, but under the orders of the Government.

The Chief Justice said that he could not perceive the application of the evidence; but, as evidence was introduced to show the flight of Colonel Burr from Washington, this, he presumed, was intended to account for it.

Mr. Wickham. Will you state the names of the officers sent to apprehend Colonel Burr?

Answer. Captain Hook, Lieutenant Peter, Lieutenant Mulford, Doctor Davidson of the army, and Doctor Carmichael, of the Mississippi Territory.

Question. Did you direct them to go without uniform?

Answer. I believe I did.

Question. Did you direct them to conceal the object of their mission?

Answer. I feel great delicacy in revealing my orders. I think I did mention to them the propriety of going in the attire of private citizens, to elude the vigilance of Burr's spies, many of whom were in New Orleans, and would give him notice of their departure from that place; it was also prudent to send them in that manner, that the jealousy of the Spaniards, through whose territories they had to pass, might not be excited. They were sent privately, for the success of the enterprise depended upon it.

Question. Did you give them written or oral instructions? Answer. Both.

Question. Have you copies of the written instructions? Answer. Not here.

Question. Will you furnish copies?

Mr. Hay objected to the production of those orders; he said that they had a right to impeach the credibility of the witness, but not to compel him to disclose the orders given to those under his command.

Question. Were these orders to seize Colonel Burr wherever they could find him?

Answer. They were sent on that service expressly. I think the orders were confined to Natchez; information having been received that Colonel Burr had taken up his quarters there.

Question. Were there any orders to seize him, even in court?

Answer. I cannot say, but presume there were not.

Question. Were any private soldiers sent on this service? Answer. No.

Question. Were any soldiers sent to Lieutenant Jones's gun-boats?

Answer. Infantry were furnished to supply the place of marines in all the gun-boats.

Question. Were any instructions sent by you that the men in Lieutenant Jones's gun-boats should act?

Answer. I gave Lieutenant Jones no orders, as he was not under my command.

Question. Was Commodore Shaw considered under your authority?

Answer. He was rather considered as co-operating with me; but he had a discretion of his own.

Question. Was there a recommendation to Commodore Shaw to give directions to Lieutenant Jones to take any measures to apprehend Colonel Burr?

Answer. I think the orders required him to do so.

Question. What orders were given for the disposal of Colonel Burr?

Answer. The orders were that he should be put on board a vessel, and sent by the way of New Orleans to the city of Washington.

Question. Were these orders written? Answer. I believe they were.

Question. What orders had you from the Government, or did you do it on your own authority?

[General Wilkinson took time till to-morrow to consider the subject, and to examine his papers.]

Question. When you were at New Orleans, were not letters addressed to other persons frequently brought to you from the Post Office; by whose orders were they delivered to you; were they opened, and with what view?

Mr. Hay thought they had no right to ask such a question. It might be important between the United States and General Wilkinson. But it does not appear to be proper to interrogate him as to his conduct any where, unless it has some bearing on the cause; nor can a witness be asked any question, the answering of which might subject him to a prosecution. If we had introduced evidence on that point, they had a right to cross-examine him.

Mr. Wickham. We may suppose, without impeaching the credit of General Wilkinson, that he will give as favorable an account of his conduct as any man standing in his situation may be disposed to do. General Wilkinson has detailed a number of facts to account for the conduct of Colonel Burr: he has taken very strong ground. We wish to show that the general has the strongest possible motive to criminate Colonel Burr. We were permitted to ask him about sending officers in disguise to seize Colonel Burr; we wish now to prove some other seizures. This evidence has a direct reference to the case of Colonel Burr. If General Wilkinson took all these measures, it will surely have a tendency to weaken his testimony.

Mr. Martin. We mean to show that General Wilkinson is identified with the Government; and the Government had declared they would justify him. We have a witness to prove the express declaration of the Secretary of War, that General Wilkinson stood low with the Government till his energetic measures at New Orleans had raised him in the estimation of the President. They can only justify his acts, by showing an impropriety in the conduct of Colonel Burr. The more we show that the constitution has been trampled on, and the rights of the citizens invaded, the more they will endeavor to show the impropriety of the conduct of Colonel Burr, in order to justify it.

Mr. Hay. Mr. Martin has avowed the motives of Colonel Burr's counsel to be to identify General Wilkinson with the Government. Admitting that General Dearborn had made the declarations ascribed to him; admitting that the President had formed that opinion of General Wilkinson, how can his answer to the question propounded have any bearing on this case? Suppose General Wilkinson should say, that, in consequence of the expected arrival of Colonel Burr, the agitated state of the country, and knowledge that he was surrounded by the accomplices and partisans of Burr in New Orleans, he had taken letters from the Post Office (and he would only have done what he ought,) how could it affect the present case? It is manifest that an answer of General Wilkinson must leave the question between the United States and Colonel Burr exactly where it was before.

Mr. Wickham. When these questions were asked Mr. Murray before, they were thought proper, and he was even cross-examined by the counsel for the prosecution. The gentleman had ascribed to Colonel Burr improper acts. Now, to impeach General Wilkinson's credibility, we show that he has been guilty of violent acts. Is he not interested to show the conduct of Colonel Burr to be improper, in order to justify his own?

Mr. Baker. Suppose, says Mr. Hay, this declaration of General Dearborn to be true; suppose that General Wilkinson did not deserve to stand high in the confidence of the Government; would it not have any bearing on the case? would it not leave the question between the United States and Colonel Burr exactly where it was before? At one time the counsel on the other side seem willing to give the general up. Now they stand forward as the champions of the worthy general. Suppose it be proved that he has thrust his hand, or directed others to do it, into the Post Office, and pillaged letters. Suppose it be proved that he has made erasures in letters, and then sworn that translations of them were true copies, which were as much like the originals as any other thing; and that he has sworn to this, that, and the other, whether true or false; will not all these things affect his credibility?

Mr. Wickham said that it was a question entirely for the consideration of General Wilkinson himself. If he thought proper to answer the question, it was not the business of the prosecution to interfere.

The Chief Justice, after making some remarks on the nature of the question, observed that General Wilkinson was not bound to answer any question that might criminate himself.

Some observations were made as to the extent of the opinion of the court. Mr. Wirt supposed, from the decision of the court in the case of Wyllie, that General Wilkinson could not be bound to answer the question.

Mr. Wickham thought directly the reverse.

Mr. Wickham (to General Wilkinson.) You have heard the opinion of the court. Were or were not letters addressed to other persons frequently sent from the Post Office to you; by whose orders, and were they opened, and with what view? Can you answer that question without criminating yourself?

Answer. I shall not answer that question.

Mr. Wickham. Were orders sent to stop and examine travellers?

Answer. There were. These were the joint orders of Governor Claiborne and myself. At that time Colonel Burr was daily expected at Natchez with two hundred men, and I wished to cut off all communication between that place and New Orleans, in order to prevent him from receiving information from his adherents, and to gain time for strengthening our defences. The imperious circumstances which justified this measure I will relate. A general panic had seized the friends of the Government in New Orleans.

[Here General Wilkinson was interrupted by the counsel of Colonel Burr, who objected to his stating the motives which governed him.]

Mr. Wirt said, that if the witness were called on to accuse himself of arbitrary acts, he ought to explain the motives with which those acts were committed.

Mr. Wickham said it was their wish to go on with the cause, without being interrupted with the explanation of the witness; and after they had gone through, the counsel for the prosecution might ask for any further explanation which they deem proper.

Mr. Wirt observed that he did not mean to interrupt the examination. But it was well known that the proceedings of each day are published; and it is important to the feelings of the witness that he should state the grounds on which he proceeded.

Mr. Martin. The proceedings have heretofore been published without regard to the feelings of Colonel Burr.

Mr. Wickham (to General Wilkinson.) When did General Adair arrive in New Orleans?

Answer. On the 14th of January.

Mr. Wickham. Has your conduct, in seizing Adair, Ogden, Swartwout, and others, been approved or disapproved by the Government? Have you received any communications from the Government on that subject?

Mr. Hay. It has been the constant effort of the counsel on the other side to identify General Wilkinson with the Government. We have heard of the plundering of the post offices, violating oaths, and prostrating private rights. Now it is asked if the Government approved of these acts. Is it decorous, is it proper, to pursue this course? They may ask questions to implicate General Wilkinson, but is it proper to endeavor to cast an imputation upon the Government? I feel no solicitude on the subject; for when all the circumstances are considered, and the real situation of that country understood, though I will not say that the measures were strictly lawful, yet I will say the exigencies of the times called for them; and that the person who held the high and responsible situation of General Wilkinson was bound to pursue the course which he did. General Wilkinson still retains the command of the army. If the gentleman wish to infer from that circumstance that the Government approved of his conduct, let them do so.

Mr. Wickham. It is not our object to criminate the Government, but to obtain the truth. We hope that General Wilkinson will not say that his conduct has been approved by the Government. Is this a State secret?

The Chief Justice said, that he should be sorry to require an answer which would state the opinions of the Government. He was sorry that an objection had been made to answer the question.

Mr. Hay said, he believed that the Government knew nothing about it, and rather than it should be supposed that the administration directed measures which they were unwilling to avow, let them go on. He was willing that they should go on; and, instead of making this an inquiry into the conduct of Colonel Burr and his accomplices, let it be solely, as it seemed to be, an inquiry into the conduct of the Government.

Mr. Wickham repeated the same question to General Wilkinson, whether his conduct in seizing General Adair, Ogden, Swartwout and others, had been approved or disapproved by the Government; and whether he had received any communication from the Government on the subject?

General Wilkinson said he had no objection to answer the question, except so far as the answer might be considered a disclosure of what might be deemed private instructions. In the first instance, said General Wilkinson, I acted on my own responsibility. I have said that I was left six months without orders. But I seized no man under the orders of the President.

THURSDAY, October 1.

General Wilkinson was about to explain more fully some of the interrogatories put to him at his last examination, when he was interrupted by

Mr. Wickham, who declared that he felt no disposition to interfere with the explanations of the witness, but was very anxious to go on with the cause. With respect to the motives with which any act was done, he knew nothing and cared nothing.

The Chief Justice declared that General Wilkinson had a right to explain any interrogatories; and again repeated the substance of the opinion which he had before given.

General Wilkinson proceeded:—I have been asked whether, in October, 1806, I did not expect immediate hostilities with the Spaniards? I was required to account for the cause of the sudden change of position of the Spanish army? I was interrogated as to the convention with the Spanish commandant, and with peculiar delicacy I was asked whether any money was received as a condition? also, whether I had not posted guards on the high-ways about New Orleans, to intercept travellers? To these interrogatories, quite unexpected, I made such replies as I was then enabled to do from memory. By referring to my papers, they will show that I did expect a war with Spain so early as September, 1806. [Here the general referred to an extract of his letter of the 8th of September, and his letter of the 4th of October, 1806, to the Secretary of War, which were read. See notes M. N.] On my advance to take command of the barrier post, I passed Fort Adams on the 12th of September. There I found two letters from Colonel Cushing, detailing his correspondence with the Spanish commander. I was then asked for a copy of the convention. I am now about to do that for which my country and gentlemen of my profession may, perhaps, condemn me. But under the charges and insinuations by which my character has been assailed, I flatter myself that, should I be guilty of any impropriety, the circumstances in which I am placed will excuse me. Here are all the papers relative to that convention. [General Wilkinson produced a number of letters containing the correspondence between him and the Spanish commandants, about the time the troops of that nation recrossed the Sabine.]

Mr. Martin said they wished to have the papers, and hoped the court would have no objection.

The Chief Justice observed that he had no objection, but wished it to be distinctly understood that he would not coerce the production of any paper which related to a negotiation between this country and any foreign Government.

Mr. Martin said that would depend upon circumstances. He held it a sacred principle, that if the Government thought proper to prosecute a citizen, they were bound to produce every paper which might be necessary for his defence, or give up the prosecution.

Mr. Hay thought it would be improper to read the papers, because they related to a negotiation with a foreign Government, and because they had no relation to the subject before the court. General Wilkinson had, indeed, from the insinuations which had been made, been induced to produce those papers; but it was evidently done with a considerable degree of embarrassment, and would not justify the reading of them if it were otherwise improper.

Mr. Wickham. I have asked for the convention with the Spanish commandant, but am told that it was a State secret. I concur with Mr. Martin, that when an individual is prosecuted by the Government, no State secrets should prevent the production of every paper necessary for his defence.

General Wilkinson said, he wished it to be understood that these were very imperfect translations of the letters from the original Spanish, and therefore that he could not deliver them, but under the stipulation that they should be accurately translated before publication, as he had discovered Governor Cordero and Governor Herrera to be officers of polished education, from his correspondence with them. He had made this stipulation as a duty which military men owe to one another throughout the world. These letters contain the convention, a convention without an article.

The Chief Justice said that he would not compel the production of the convention, unless its bearings on the case be shown.

Mr. Martin. We have a right to it. I hope it will be noted that we have made a solemn demand of these papers.

General Wilkinson proceeded:—The next question which was asked was, whether I had not made private communications to Lieutenant Jones. I have said that I gave no orders to Lieutenant Jones; but if I had, here are documents to show, if not a justification of my conduct in all the measures I presumed, at least an extenuation. [Here General Wilkinson presented several papers, showing the agitated state of New Orleans, and the dangers with which it was threatened. They were not read. See O, P, Q, R.]

Mr. Wickham to General Wilkinson. Do you recollect the last question I put to you? Has your conduct in seizing Swartwout, Bollman, Ogden, and Adair been approved or disapproved by the Government? And have you received any communications from the Government on this subject?

General Wilkinson said he must refer to his honor to know whether he was bound to answer that question.

The Chief Justice declared that it might be answered under the restrictions already laid down.

General Wilkinson. I can say that three of those persons, perhaps four, were seized on my own responsibility, without any orders from the Government.

Mr. Wickham. Which three? Answer. Bollman, Swartwout, Ogden, and perhaps Adair.

Question. Had you any orders then or afterwards to seize them? Had you any orders with respect to the seizure of Colonel Burr by military force? Answer. No, not at that time.

Question. Had you any afterwards?

Answer. That is a question of very great delicacy with me. (Addressing the judge:) Can a question be fairly put, and an answer coerced, which may destroy a man's honor?

Mr. Wickham said there was no rule of law which prevented a witness from giving an answer, unless it subjected him to a criminal prosecution. Mere sympathies were no cause of refusal. However unpleasant these questions might be to General Wilkinson, it would be a shameful dereliction of duty in the counsel of Colonel Burr not to put them. He said that he had not experienced any sympathies towards his client.

General Wilkinson (to the judge.) Is a trial before a court-martial similar to a criminal prosecution? I might be subjected to military punishment, to as severe punishment as could be inflicted by a civil tribunal, for revealing my orders.

The Chief Justice said that he was not sure that General Wilkinson could be required to answer that question.

Mr. Wickham contended that there could be no articles of war which could punish a man for disclosing what he is called upon to declare in a court of justice. The court had a right to require the disclosure, and would enforce its own authority.

Mr. McRae contended, that when the answer required would lead to the discovery of a fact which might subject a man to punishment, it was always deemed a good reason to withhold it. He understood the answer which might be given by General Wilkinson to be of this nature. The question was calculated to extract from him a fact, the disclosure of which might tend to subject him to punishment. He could not say what would be done before a military tribunal, but it was possible that he might be punished if he should answer in a particular way. Suppose he should say that the Government did not authorize him to seize the persons of Burr and his accomplices, and that he acted upon his own responsibility; or suppose he should be acting under the authority of Government, but, upon examining his powers, should find that he had transcended them; would not a disclosure of this fact criminate him, and subject him to prosecution?

The Chief Justice said that the question did not lead to the fact of seizing those persons, but to the authority with which it was done. If General Wilkinson had committed the act with authority, he must show his orders.

Mr. Wickham said he did not believe that any thing which General Wilkinson could say would be legal evidence in the cause. It was not that kind of evidence which was admissible in prosecutions of this nature; but it was important to know what orders the Government had given, and whether he had exceeded those orders.

Mr. Martin. We wish to know the conduct and character of the Government on this occasion. We wish to know whether any, and what, orders were given by the Government. Is there to be one rule as to the prosecution who wish to take the life of one man away, and another rule as to the man whose life they seek to take?

Mr. Hay had no objection to an answer from General Wilkinson as to the conduct of the Government throughout. He said that Mr. Martin had disclosed his real object to be to try the Government and not the accused. Will this ascertain the innocence or guilt of Colonel Burr? The object evidently was to arraign the Government before the bar of the public; but he was perfectly satisfied that when the conduct of the Government should be known, the people of the United States would think that the Government had done exactly as it ought to have done.

Mr. Wickham. In commenting on the evidence we shall endeavor to show that a number of witnesses have been brought forward by the Government who have taken a most decided part in the prosecution; and that their real object has been to render themselves acceptable to the Government.

General Wilkinson. I had an order from the Government.

Mr. Wickham. From what department? Answer. From the administration.

Question. From whom? Answer. From Mr. Jefferson.

Question. Have you any written order?

Answer. I have among my papers, but I will not produce it; I had rather go to jail.

Mr. Wickham demanded the production of the order; but said that if General Wilkinson required time to consider the consequences of a refusal, he had no objection to allow it to him.

General Wilkinson, (addressing the judge.) You are, from professional experience, more competent to decide on the propriety of revealing my orders than I possibly can be. The letter which conveys the particular order alluded to may embrace a variety of other matter, many parts of which it would be highly criminal in me to divulge. I conceive I should forfeit my honor, and the confidence of all military men, if I were to reveal my correspondence with the Government, without the command of my superior.

Mr. Hay had no doubt but the order was in strict conformity with the law; but if there be private and confidential communications in the letter, it would not be required of General Wilkinson to produce it.

Chief Justice. If the order be mingled with other things, private and confidential, the court will not require its production.

Mr. Wickham (to General Wilkinson.) Did you, by letter or otherwise, request any person, not of the army, to seize Colonel Burr and put him on board a vessel?

Answer. I gave instructions to a gentleman who is now here, (Silas Dinsmore, Esq.,) and who is not of the army.

Question. Did you give such orders to others?

Answer. I recollect Doctor Carmichael, but no other person except the officers of the army.

Question. Do you recollect expressing to any person that he would confer the highest obligation on the Government by seizing Colonel Burr?

Answer. It is probable that I did, for those were my sentiments. My great object was to apprehend him and deliver him over to the civil power for trial; and the city of Washington was the place to which I wished him sent; but I had no idea of doing an injury to his person. I recollect a German came to me, and proffered to take Col. Burr; but, on coming to particulars, he said he would take him dead or alive. I was shocked at the idea, and declined employing him.

Question. Have you the cipher No. 2? Answer. I have not.

Question. Are you acquainted with a person by the name of Kibby?

Answer. I am acquainted with two of that name.

Question. Where do they reside? where does Timothy Kibby reside? Answer. In Louisiana.

Question. Have you had any communication with him on the subject of an invasion of Mexico, and when?

Answer. I cannot recollect; I have seen a deposition ascribed to him, inserted in the public prints, replete with falsehoods.

Question. You are not certain, then, whether you ever wrote to him on the subject?

Answer. I am certain that I never wrote to him specifically on that subject. He was an officer of the militia, and I might have corresponded with him on some matters relating to his command. I recollect to have received an order from the Government to ascertain the strength of the militia in the Territory, and I might have spoken or written to him on that subject.

Question. Can you say whether you did or did not? Answer. I cannot.

Question. Did you inform him of the object of Lieutenant Pike's expedition?

Answer. I think not, from the deposition I have seen; here are my orders to Lieutenant Pike. [General Wilkinson produced his instructions to Lieutenant Pike; see notes S, T.]

This is the information given by me to General Samuel Smith, which goes to illustrate my ideas of the state of our controversy with Spain. [Here General Wilkinson read the extract of a letter annexed, marked V.]

Mr. Wickham. You mentioned that Swartwout was with you about the 1st of October?

General Wilkinson. I think about the 8th or 10th; I believe I said the middle, because I marched on the 23d, and Swartwout had left me some days before.

Mr. Wickham. Your letter to the Government is of the 21st of October; will you assign a reason for so long delay?

Answer. I took time cautiously to draw from Mr. Swartwout what information I could obtain, lest I should excite suspicion. Another circumstance was, that I was busily engaged in making arrangements of the artillery, transports, and other military equipments, in order to take the field.

Mr. Wickham. You say, in your letter to the President, "that you are not only uninformed of the prime mover and ultimate objects of the daring enterprise; but you are ignorant of the foundation on which it rests, of the means by which it is to be supported, and whether any immediate or collateral protection, internal or external, is expected." I beg leave to ask, why you stated this to the President after getting the information you did from Swartwout?

Answer. The answer is very plain, but the question is complex; if you will dismember it, I can answer it.

Mr. Wickham read an extract from the letter, (being part of that just quoted,) and said, I think this is different from the information you gave the court.

General Wilkinson. I doubted the information I received from Swartwout; I could not suppose that Colonel Burr, or any other individual, would have the audacity or folly to undertake such an enterprise without the assistance of some foreign Power; I could not, therefore, view him as the prime mover, but as the instrument. I doubted Swartwout's declarations, and, although they had an effect upon my mind, I could not place solid confidence in them. He said that the people of the Territory were ready to join; he was a stranger in the country, and, therefore, could know nothing of their dispositions but from information; I was acquainted with them, and had heard of no such disposition.

Question. Then you doubted whether Swartwout was authorized to make these communications?

Answer. I beg your pardon; I believe that he was authorized and instructed to deliver me lessons of falsehood.

Question. Then you say that you still doubted?

Answer. It is so expressed in the letter.

Question. These expressions, I understand, conveyed the true state of your mind at that time?

Answer. I wish you to understand me. When I contemplated the audacity, the iniquity, and the folly of the enterprise, I did believe that Colonel Burr was stimulated by some foreign Power. With respect to revolutionizing the Territory, I could not place any solid confidence in it, until I received the communication of James L. Donaldson, Esq., when, combining all the circumstances, I wrote my letter of the 12th of November.

Question. Then I understand you to say that this was the true state of your mind at that time?

Answer. Yes. Propounding this question brings to my recollection a subject not thought of before. I inquired of Mr. Swartwout from whence Colonel Burr derived his funds; he said, from the aid of friends and the sale of property, in which sale he had been employed. I knew that Colonel Burr had no property. This declaration of Swartwout gave me less confidence in his communications.

Question. I observe, in your letter of the 21st of October, this expression—"my desire to avert a great national calamity." At that time you had doubts whether the enterprise might not be salutary?

Answer. Would it be improper to assign my reasons why I supposed it might be salutary? As I passed through Natchez, I understood that Mr. Meade, who exercised the functions of Governor, had spoken of an attack on the Spanish post of Baton Rouge, and I was informed by a Mr. Dunlop and a Mr. Smith, that he had said the Government would connive at the measure.

Question. This postscript on the letter: "should Spain be disposed to war seriously with us, might not some plan be adopted to correct the destination of the associates, and, by a suitable appeal to their patriotism, engage them in the service of their country? I merely offer the suggestion as a possible expedient to prevent the horrors of a civil contest; and I do believe that, with competent authority, I could accomplish the object." Am I to understand that this postscript contains the true state of your mind at that time?

Answer. There is some uncertainty whether that postscript is a part of the original letter; it is noted on the corner in my own hand-writing, and not in that of Mr. Burling, who was then one of my aids-de-camp, and by whom the copy was made.

Mr. Baker. It never was understood that a copy would be received by Colonel Burr. Now we see the necessity of having the original.

General Wilkinson. I have no sort of hesitation to state what my feelings were. If the Spaniards had been seriously disposed to war, I did believe that, by a suitable appeal to the feelings and patriotism of the deluded citizens who might have descended with Colonel Burr, they would have been induced to join our standard, and oppose a foreign enemy, sooner than enter into a conflict with their own countrymen. My idea was this: that the President should have forwarded to me blank commissions, to be offered to influential leaders.

Mr. Wickham. This postscript says nothing as to leaders, but to the body in general.

General Wilkinson. I cannot give any definite idea of my sensations at the moment; I think I could not have meant leader, but the leaders.

Question. If you were ignorant of the intention of the leaders, why not as well apply the expression to the leader?

Answer. Because I did not think I could offer any thing to him which he would accept.

Question. As to the postscript, you are uncertain whether it was written at the time of the original letter?

Answer. Though I am uncertain of that, yet I believe it contains a correct representation of my feelings.

Mr. Randolph. In case of actual hostilities, were you authorized to accept the services of volunteers?

Answer. I should certainly think I had.

Question. And to commission them?

Answer. No; but I might have mustered them. The President has no power to grant commissions, but with the approbation and consent of the Senate. I recollect that, during the administration of Washington, volunteers were accepted: there were no commissions granted, but warrants of authority, which were obligatory in those corps, but conferred no command over an officer of the line.

Mr. Randolph. My question is this: if hostilities had been determined on with the Spaniards, would General Wilkinson have been authorized to accept the services of volunteers?

Answer. I think so at present, but a reference to my instructions will more fully show.

Question. And to drive the Spaniards beyond the Sabine, and pursue them into Mexico?

Answer. Not to pursue them beyond the Sabine.

Question. If the Spaniards had not made the convention, and receded from their position on the east side of the Sabine, would you have attacked them? Answer. Yes.

Question. From your own responsibility, or the orders of the Government?

Answer. From specific instructions. I had contemplated the possibility of such an event, and had given my orders accordingly. [These orders were not offered in evidence, but may be seen in note W.]

Mr. Martin. Did you not drive them beyond the Sabine?

Answer. (witness smiling.) It was a sort of driving.

Mr. Wickham. You say that the first intimation you had of Colonel Burr's designs was from the ciphered letter?

Answer. I have said so; but I had received a number of ambiguous hints before.

Question. In what way? Answer. By letter.

Question. When did you communicate the contents of this ciphered letter to the Government?

Answer. You will observe, in my letter of the 12th of November, reference is made to a confidential messenger, Mr. Briggs, to whom I repeatedly read the ciphered letter, to enable him to communicate the contents to the President.

Question. What communication did you make through Mr. Briggs? was it Mr. Duncan's translation?

Answer. No: Mr. Briggs left Natchez immediately after the date of my letter of the 12th of November; Mr. Duncan's translation was made in New Orleans after I arrived there.

Question. Have you the paper about you containing the instructions to Briggs?

Answer. I gave no instructions to Briggs except verbal ones.

Question. Have you the translation made by you?

Answer. No: I have looked for it, but cannot find it.

Question. Was it before the grand jury?

Answer. Yes; it was an old worn out paper.

Question. Was this information by Briggs an exposition of the whole contents?

Answer. I read the heads to him, and verbally explained the contents.

Question. Was the letter completely deciphered?

Answer. I have said no frequently; I have said that the only interpretation made by me was hastily done at Natchitoches?

Question. Then you did not relate the whole contents to Briggs?

Answer. I laid it before him, and explained the contents as already stated.

Mr. Randolph. I think in this letter you say "Miranda has taken the bread out of your mouth?"

Answer. No; you are quite mistaken. That letter was written, I believe, in October, 1805.

Question. Admitting it to have been so far back, how came it to be a matter of surprise to you that an expedition was set on foot, according with your own ideas? or that you should say Colonel Burr's views were not distinctly known till you received the ciphered letter?

Answer. I had received a number of ambiguous letters from Colonel Burr; and in a letter of mine to him, I made use of the expression "I fear Miranda has taken the bread out of your mouth," in order to draw from him his real object.

Question. In what manner did you consider Miranda as taking the bread out of his mouth?

Answer. If I can state the grounds of those opinions, I would say that they were derived from letters I received from Colonel Burr, which I am not at liberty to disclose.

Mr. Randolph. Was the position taken by the Spanish forces considered by the President as an invasion of our territory? Answer. Certainly.

Mr. McRae. I understood that opinion was founded upon what appeared in the public prints.

General Wilkinson. The President's orders were explicit to drive them out of the territory claimed by the United States. These orders I communicated to the Spanish commandants.

Mr. Randolph. In the intercourse between you and the Spanish commandants, were all the forms of war observed?

General Wilkinson. In what respect?

Mr. Randolph. As to the military interviews; I considered this a state of war.

Answer. Between Natchitoches and Nacogdoches there was a constant intercourse.

Mr. Randolph. But in the relation of one army to another?

General Wilkinson. I can state the situation. I remember that the day on which I reached the Sabine, my advanced guard captured three Spaniards without arms on the left bank. I had them returned to the Spanish commandant, and desired that he would not permit a repetition of the trespass.

Mr. Wickham. I think you said that you wrote to Colonel Burr from Natchitoches.

General Wilkinson. When did I say so?

Mr. Wickham. I thought I heard you say so.

General Wilkinson. You guess well; but if I am not mistaken, you got that information from Swartwout.

Question. Did you write? Answer. I did.

Question. What did you do with the letter? Answer. Destroyed it.

Question. Did it go out of your hands?

Answer. It did; it was sent to Natchez, to which place I followed, recovered, and destroyed it. I will give you my reasons for so doing. After writing, I received the letter from Mr. Donaldson, dated 30th of October, and conveying the information received from Myers Michael, which removed my doubts as to the extent of Mr. Burr's designs, and their sinister nature.

Question. Then I understand you to say, that Mr. Donaldson gave you the first correct information?

Answer. It excited very strong apprehensions in my mind that some general and deep-rooted conspiracy had taken place above:

Question. You have no recollection of the letter of the 13th of May?

Answer. No: I wish it could be produced. It would release me from all obligation to withhold the confidential letters of Colonel Burr:

Question. Did you write him any other letters?

Answer. I have an impression on my mind that I wrote him two or three letters.

Mr. Wickham. The ciphered letter gave you the first idea of a plan of revolutionizing the Western country?

Answer. The ciphered letter gave me no information on that subject.

Mr. Wickham. Did you ever give the Government any information before?

Answer. I had no definite idea of Colonel Burr's plans. I had received from him several letters of a very ambiguous cast, but they contained nothing treasonable. I wrote to a minister, (Robert Smith,) and in my letter I say "Burr is about something, but whether internal or external, I cannot discover. I think you should keep an eye to him."

Mr. Wickham. When was that letter written?

Answer. I cannot tell when I wrote it.

Question. When was Colonel Burr at St. Louis?

Answer. Colonel Burr was at St. Louis on the 11th of September, 1805, and left that place on the morning of the 19th: In the interim he had been in that quarter of the country where Kibby lives, though I do not know that he saw him.

Question. Which Kibby?

Answer. The fellow who gave the deposition which has been published.

Question. What is the date of your orders for descending the river?

Answer. I cannot tell.

Question. Have you those orders here?

Answer. I am not certain; most of my papers are in Williamsburg. The troops descended in the beginning of May.

Question. Did you authorize any officer to arrest any person after you descended?

Answer. No: I gave instructions to Lieutenant Peter, whom I had left at Natchez, and required him to give me regular information. [See deposition of Lieutenant Peter, note X.] At the time I descended the river we had no posts except the Chickasaw Bluffs, on the Mississippi, and Massac, near the mouth of the Ohio, except a small party at the Arkansas, and another opposite to Cincinnati.

Mr. Hay. Was there any post between the Chickasaw Bluffs and Massac? Answer. No.

Question. Was there any military post between Pittsburg and New Orleans?

Answer. None except those which I have mentioned.

Mr. Wickham asked General Wilkinson for his alphabetical cipher, who went to his lodgings for it.

Mr. Wickham (to General Wilkinson after his return to court.) Can you ascertain when the hieroglyphic cipher was made?

Answer. The arbitrary characters were designed, I think, in 1794; but I do not say it was given to Colonel Burr at that time.

Question. Will you give me leave to ask upon what occasion it was formed?

Answer. I will with pleasure. Pending the Indian war, we had unhappily much dissension in the army. I felt myself extremely oppressed and persecuted, and I had reason to believe that every artifice was put in operation to injure my standing with the Government, and to have me removed from service, if possible; and there were many who shared my persecution. In the autumn and winter of the year alluded to, a number of officers retired from the army, either on furlough or by resignation, among whom was that most gallant officer, Captain Leonard Covington, since a member of Congress. At this time my quarters were embosomed in a wilderness, and remote from any post office, and we had no regular mail. The cipher was, therefore, designed to secure safety to a free correspondence and an unreserved interchange of sentiment respecting public men and public measures, particularly such as related to the army.

Mr. Wickham. I think you say it was formed in 1794?

Answer. Yes; and I will give you my reasons. I have another cipher, in which the hieroglyphics representing the President and Vice President are the same as in that now before the court, which was designed by Captain Smith for Captain Covington, in the year 1794, at the time he retired from the army. [See an extract of a letter from Captain Covington to General Wilkinson, note Y.]

Mr. Wickham. I observe the word republican is represented in the hieroglyphic by '76, aristocratic by '89, navy by '96, city of Washington by a single house, and that an indifferent one. Pray, why was that, as the seat of Government was not removed till many years afterwards? I observe the city of Washington, but not Philadelphia, nor any place mentioned as the seat of Government.

Answer: The cipher was formed by my aid-de-camp, Captain Smith; and the designations originated in his caprice, without my privacy or participation.

Mr. Wickham. Do you recollect for what purpose New Orleans was designated in the hieroglyphics?

Answer. I can probably account for it. If you will refer to those periods, you will discover that we were in an equivocal situation with all the maritime Powers, more particularly with England and Spain. The navigation of the Mississippi had been a subject of much discussion, and one in which the Western people felt a considerable degree of interest. The Ohio is also designated. That is probably confined to mere locality. We were then engaged in a war with the Indians, and were in the woods on the waters of the Ohio: I have before said that I could not account for the various designations; but I offer these as circumstances which may have influenced Captain Smith in forming them.

Mr. Wickham. Do you recollect when the alphabet in cipher was put on this paper? (alluding to a paper on which the hieroglyphics were written, which he then held in his hand.)

Answer: Last winter; I believe they were put on to prevent them from being lost.

Mr. Wickham. Have you brought up the letter or communication from the Government which we wished to have here to look at? Answer: I have not.

Mr. Hay. I think you said there was no military post between Pittsburg and New Orleans, but Fort Massac, the Chickasaw Bluffs, and one at Cincinnati?

Answer. Yes; that at Cincinnati was established by the Government after the flight of Blannerhasset.

Question. Was there none at Natchez?

Answer. There were only Lieutenant Peter and a few men left at that place to keep a look out, and give me regular information.

FRIDAY, October 2.

Mr. Wickham called on General Wilkinson to produce the President's letter approving his measures.

Gen. Wilkinson. By referring to my papers, I discover I have made a mistake. I find I have no orders from the President directing the seizure of Colonel Burr; the order is from the Secretary of War, and has been already published, directing me to seize the principals in the enterprise. I did believe I had an order from the President specifically directing the arrest of Colonel Burr. The mistake arose from my misapprehension of the tenor of a letter from the President, of February, which blends public communications with private affairs.

Mr. Wickham. Have you no letter from the Secretary of War approving your conduct in general terms?

Answer. I never had such letter from him. The approval of my conduct is expressed in qualified terms.

Mr. Wickham. You wrote the President about these transactions; was the letter to which you referred an answer to these communications?

Answer. That letter in its public relation merely acknowledges the receipt of two letters from me, and the arrival of a confidential messenger I sent to the President. It gives some directions, but generally conveys information merely.

Mr. Wickham then applied for the production of this letter; it might be important to Colonel Burr in this point of view. General Wilkinson sends on certain communications by Mr. Briggs, and in this letter the President acknowledges the receipt of them. So that, by referring to that letter, it was easy to know what were the communications made to the President by General Wilkinson.

Mr. Martin. We have a right to demand this letter.

Chief Justice. It is easy to read the passage which refers to the two letters and to Mr. Briggs's communications. Mr. Martin proposed to put the letter into the hands of the Chief Justice, who might mark such passages as he might think improper to be read.

General Wilkinson. The letter is in the hands of the attorney for the United States.

Mr. Hay. If the court will state those subjects to which the letter should relate to have any bearing on this case, I am ready to produce such passages.

Mr. Burr observed that he knew of but one ground on which a public document should be withheld from a court of justice, which was, that it might contain something relative to foreign negotiations actually pending, and the public good required its concealment. But in the present case, the transactions referred to in the letter might have passed over; a letter, too, which is not a public document, but a private communication.

Mr. Martin. No Government ever dared to suppress information which was necessary to an individual against whom it had commenced a prosecution. There never was such an attempt to establish a new principle, as is done on the present occasion.

Mr. Hay. Mr. Martin asserts that there never was such an instance as the present, and that we are attempting to establish principles altogether new. I do not, sir, attempt to establish new principles; I do aver my confident opinion, that this paper does not, in the slightest degree, relate to the present case. I will not say that the gentlemen know this fact, nor do I say they have other objects in view; what effects they may have out of doors, what materials of declamation they may furnish to gentlemen of a certain way of thinking, I know not. But I do assure gentlemen, that when this letter is produced, it will have a very different effect from what they may contemplate. Mr. Hay then read the last paragraph of the letter.

Mr. Burr. If there be a single sentence in that letter relating to me, I have a right to demand it. Why is greater regard paid to the President's secrets than to mine? My papers have been fraudulently seized, and such passages only culled from them as suited the purposes of my enemies.

Mr. Hay. I am placed in an embarrassing situation; I have no objection to the production of this paper; but, in my opinion, it has not the smallest application to the present case. If this letter ever is produced, it will but place the conduct of the President on that high ground of propriety which has ever been contemplated and assigned to him by the people of the United States. If gentlemen want this letter, let them state how it is relevant. I am content that you, sir, (the Chief Justice,) should read this letter, or that any other person should; but I cannot consent to produce every paper which gentlemen may think proper to ask for.

Mr. Wirt. These gentlemen, it seems, are carrying on an impeachment against the President of the United States. What is their object in demanding this letter? It is no more than vainly to attempt to inculpate the President, and to gratify their spleen and their resentment against him. Is that their object? Is Aaron Burr more or less guilty because he has approved or disapproved the measures of General Wilkinson? They want to ask you which is the most guilty, Thomas Jefferson or Aaron Burr? Are you, then, trying the President? And even if you were, would you not have him here, and give him an opportunity of answering to his accusers? This letter, sir, if ever it is produced, will show that the motives of the administration were as pure and as proper as its friends could wish, or its enemies could fear; it will appear that the reprobated conduct of General Wilkinson, in this instance, was such as was justified by the circumstance of the case; and that if the administration have approved it, they have approved of nothing but what was proper. We hope that, unless the court be satisfied of the relevancy of this paper, they will not unnecessarily violate the sanctity of private correspondence.

Mr. Wickham. It has been said that we wish to inculpate the Government. No, sir, our object is to defend ourselves; and if, in doing this, we do inculpate the Government, so much the worse for them. When, sir, the Government have spent $100,000 on this prosecution; when every quarter has been ransacked for evidence against us; is it not important for us to show from what motives this prosecution has been commenced? General Wilkinson has been under examination these two days. He has produced documents which he has mutilated and then restored. Gentlemen say that he is the pivot on which the prosecution turns. We wish, sir, to examine how far this witness has been consistent with himself, and what credit is due to his declarations.

Mr. Martin. It has been already decided in this court, that the President has no more rights here than the man who walks the streets in rags. "What!" says the gentleman, "will you then violate the sanctity of private correspondence?" Sir, when that gentleman made this declaration, I looked at his face to see whether it did not blush with shame, and even burst with blood, at expressing such a sentiment.

Mr. Wirt. I hope, sir, the redness of a man's face is no evidence of his guilt. Mr. Martin mistakes me. I demanded whether this court would violate the sanctity of correspondence, unless there was an adequate necessity for it.

The argument was continued for some time in this desultory manner; after which the Chief Justice observed, that he much regretted that any difficulty had occurred on the subject; that it was irksome to him, and it was with considerable reluctance that he required the production of such a paper; but that he did only what his duty prescribed to him; that it was impossible for him to determine, even if he saw the letter, how much of it was relevant to the present case, because he could not anticipate what ground of defence would be taken by the accused. He saw, however, no necessity for reading it in public.

Mr. Wickham. Let us see the letter, and then, if we think it to be relevant to the present case, we may read it in the cause; but no copy need be taken.

Mr. McRae. I should rather, sir, that it be exhibited in the most public form. It is the only way to avert the misrepresentation of its contents.

[Mr. McRae then read the letter marked Z.]

Mr. Wickham demanded the production of the whole letter of the 12th of November.

Question. General Wilkinson, did you lay it before the grand jury? Answer. I did.

Mr. Burr. The entire letter has been used against me before the grand jury. All idea of State secrets is therefore at an end; and there can be no objection to produce the whole of it in court. I shall expect that General Wilkinson will bring the whole of it into court to-morrow.

Mr. Hay. I have nothing, sir, to say on this subject.

Chief Justice. The President has certified his reasons for communicating only certain parts of that letter; and he believes that the other parts have no application to the present prosecution.

Mr. Martin. I hope the court has not already decided that point. Has not this court already declared that the President has no more power here than any other man? If this be law, for which gentlemen now contend, God forbid that I should remain a citizen of the United States! And is Mr. Jefferson to be a judge of the relevancy of evidence, in a prosecution in which he has taken so active a part against the accused? Mr. Jefferson, sir, is a man of no great legal knowledge. He was of no celebrity as a lawyer before the revolution, and he has since been so much engaged in political pursuits, that he has had time enough to unlearn the little law he ever knew.

Mr. Hay. The only end of this conversation is to abuse Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. Martin. Sir, we shall so use Mr. Jefferson as not to abuse him. Remember that the life and liberty of Col. Burr are shown to be no longer dependent on Virginians, and therefore I am freed from any restraint in declaring what I think. If Mr. Jefferson himself were here, would not this court call him before it, and make him disclose, upon oath, the contents of that letter? Suppose, sir, that in this letter General Wilkinson has denounced Governor Claiborne and Cowles Meade; suppose that he has represented all the people of New Orleans as disaffected; suppose that he has attempted to throw every influential man but himself under the suspicions of the Government, in order that he may raise himself into favor; is this a satisfactory reason why this letter should be respected or withheld?

Mr. Burr repeated that this letter had been laid before the grand jury; that it was, therefore, no longer a State secret; and that he had a right to ask for any thing which General Wilkinson had showed or said to the grand jury.

Chief Justice. After such a certificate from the President of the United States as has been received, I cannot direct the production of those parts of the letter, without sufficient evidence of their being relevant to the present prosecution. I should suppose, however, that the same source, which informed you of the existence of this paper, might inform you of the particular way in which it was relevant.

Mr. Burr. In such a case, I ask no man's opinion but my own.

Chief Justice. I cannot assist you.

Mr. Burr. Have not I a right to ask what any one said before the grand jury?

Mr. Wickham read certain parts of the extracted and furnished copy, to show that from the context of those parts, the omitted passages bore directly on the subject. The President of the United States might have had proper reasons, on account of General Wilkinson, to withhold those parts, but General Wilkinson himself has no right to withhold them; and if he produced the whole letter before the grand jury for the sake of criminating Col. Burr, he may certainly be called upon to lay it before this court.

General Wilkinson begged leave to correct the expression of the gentleman about his motives. He did not produce this letter before the grand jury to criminate Col. Burr, but to vindicate himself.

Mr. Wickham. That is the very thing which I say. Why did he wish to vindicate himself, but to give greater effect to his crimination of Col. Burr?

General Wilkinson begged leave to state another consideration. When he appeared before the grand jury, he recollects Mr. Taylor of the grand jury inquired of him, whether he introduced certain papers to vindicate his own conduct, and that he replied in the affirmative; he remembers, also, observing to the grand jury, that certain parts of his informations involved such delicate personalities, that he should not willingly give it publicity; and therefore he hoped what he said would be received in confidence; to which a member, (Mr. Barbour,) after some pause, replied, "Whatever you say here, sir, is received in confidence."

Mr. Hay. Mr. Tazewell is here, and will confirm that statement.

Mr. Burr. Then they did a very improper thing; and I hope this court will not countenance such a proceeding. The gentleman must be mistaken, sir. The grand jury could not thus receive secret information.

Mr. Hay observed that gentlemen acted very precipitately in condemning the grand jury unheard; and appealed to Mr. Tazewell for what he knew on this subject.

Mr. Burr. They have no right to introduce a witness now, when we have one under examination.

Mr. Wirt supposed that, when the grand jury was thus charged by the accused or his counsel, they had a right to appear in vindication of their own conduct.

Mr. Burr. That may be a pleasant occupation to the court hereafter; but at present we have a witness under examination.

After a long and desultory argument, the Chief Justice determined that the correct course was, to leave the accused all the advantages which he might derive from the parts actually produced; and to allow him all the advantages of supposing that the omitted parts related to any particular point. The accused may avail himself of them as much as if they were actually produced.

Mr. Wickham. We shall then insist, in the course of argument, that our suppositions, if not disproved, must be received as evidence.

Mr. Martin. And I shall take the liberty of stating what is actually contained in the omitted parts of the letter; for I know what they are.

Mr. Wirt. Mr. Martin, sir, is privileged to say what he pleases of any person or thing.

Mr. Burr (to General Wilkinson.) Was there not an order given by you to seize the person of Mr. Pintard?

Answer. I have no recollection that I gave such orders; and I conclude, from the circumstance of an explanation I made in the newspapers, that I did not.

Mr. Burr. I have seen an order, said to have been from you, for seizing him?

Answer. I do not recollect it; but if any such is shown to me, I shall certainly confess it.

Question. Did you give any orders to arrest Daverzac?

Answer. I gave general orders only; I stationed a guard about two miles above New Orleans, to stop boats and persons.

Question. What were the orders given to that guard?

Answer. To stop all persons descending the river.

Question. And to seize papers too? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Were the papers of Mr. Pintard brought to you?

Answer. They were, but they were immediately returned.

Mr. Hay. Is it the opinion of the court that General Wilkinson is to be interrogated about all his transactions at New Orleans? I object not to hearing the truth, but I cannot consent to this sacrifice and waste of time. I believe it to be a principle of law, that, when a witness is introduced by the prosecution, he is only to be cross-examined about the points of his original testimony. Is this prosecution never to end? Or are we to wait to give the accused an opportunity of entrapping General Wilkinson, which they avow to be the object of these interrogatories?

Mr. Wickham. It is a novel idea just started by the gentleman. If such were the law, the prosecution need only to seize on the most material witness on behalf of the accused, examine him only as to a few points, and then dismiss him. All his evidence in favor of the accused would, consequently, be lost.

Mr. Hay. The law is laid down in 2d Atkins.

The Chief Justice overruled the objection, and the examination proceeded.

Mr. Burr. What letters directed to me did you take from Pintard or Daverzac? Answer. None.

Question. Did you return to those gentlemen all the papers you took from them?

Answer. I think I did not; but I do not recollect what part of them I retained.

Question. You have read the constitution; by what authority did you seize private papers?

General Wilkinson (to the court.) Am I bound to answer questions which may criminate myself?

Mr. Burr. To state the authority by which he seized the papers cannot criminate him, though the fact of seizing might.

Chief Justice (to General W.) When you discover that any question may criminate you, you need not answer it.

Mr. Baker. And when he does resort to that expedient, he is to be understood as shuffling from the question, and as likely to criminate himself by his answers.

Mr. Wirt. And it is also understood that, when called on in this manner, he may explain his conduct by drawing a picture of the defenceless condition in which he found New Orleans, and the necessity of resorting to such strong measures for its defence.

Mr. Baker. And if he does give us a picture, it must be a true and faithful one.

Chief Justice. I have stated to General Wilkinson that he is at liberty to explain the motives of his conduct.

General Wilkinson. Then, sir, I will explain and substantiate the motives of my placing this guard, and of my other measures. Here is a paper, a letter of advice from General Jackson to Governor Claiborne, warning him of the approach of a large body of men to New Orleans, combined and engaged for unlawful purposes. Here, sir, is a deposition which goes to show that Judge Prevost, the step-son of Colonel Burr, saluted a public officer in the streets of Orleans, and congratulated him on the arrival of General John Adair, as the second in command to Colonel Burr, at New Orleans. Here is a deposition of Commodore Shaw, which shows that Bradford, the printer, had reported a most terrific account of the movements in the upper country, of an armed brig being equipped, and even of 12,000 stands of arms being issued by Colonel Burr. These were the reasons for my taking such decided steps; and so impressed was I with the dangerous situation of my country, that, if I had omitted these precautionary measures, I should have deserved the severest denunciations of the Government. I was prompted by that pure patriotism which has always influenced my conduct, and my character for which I trust will never be tarnished. I shall continue to defy the utmost art, fraud, deception, and villany that my enemies can practise towards me.

Mr. Wickham objected to the production of the depositions.

After a desultory argument, the Chief Justice determined that it was not correct to read them. If these affidavits had been made previous to the transactions at New Orleans, they might have been read as explanatory of the grounds of General W.'s conduct; but, being taken since, they are objectionable, as every thing of that kind ought to be subjected to a cross-examination. General Wilkinson has stated the grounds of his own conduct, and very properly; but he has no right to support his explanation by illegal evidence.

Mr. Baker. The court having disposed of the depositions, the only question that remains relates to the letter. On this question two points occur: 1st, whether this is a correct copy of a certain letter; and, 2dly, whether that letter was written by General Jackson.

Chief Justice (to General Wilkinson.) Do you know the hand-writing of General Jackson?

Answer. I know it only by comparison; I never saw him write.

Mr. Wickham. Did you compare this letter? Answer. My clerk did, and he is here.

Mr. McRae. Is it not your best belief that this is a true copy of the original?

Answer. I believe it to be a correct copy.

Question. Did not this letter form the ground, in part, of your conduct?

Answer. It did certainly influence my conduct.

Mr. Wickham objected to its being read, because it was only proved to be a true copy by the general recollection of the witness.

Some desultory discussion ensued.

Chief Justice. Both sides admit that it is immaterial whether General Wilkinson's impressions of the state of New Orleans were actually true or false. Both sides admit that he may produce any letter which is verified by himself. But this copy is not proved by him to be a true copy. There is no objection to General Wilkinson's stating the contents of this letter; but that statement cannot be confirmed by the copy that is offered.

Mr. Wickham. There is one thing more to be considered. The court has not come to any positive decision as to the letter of 12th November. If General Wilkinson does not produce the omitted parts, by the rules of evidence we are at liberty to state and to use them, until they are disproved. General Wilkinson may, if he pleases, produce the whole letter at any subsequent period.

Mr. Hay. The President of the United States has prescribed the course which should be pursued. It is he, and not General Wilkinson, who withholds the omitted parts. Is it fair, then, that the opposite counsel should supply these omissions as they please, and that their suppositions should be received as evidence?

Chief Justice. I have already decided this question. It is certainly fair to supply the omitted parts by suppositions, though such ought not to affect General Wilkinson's private character. If this were a trial in chief, I should, perhaps, think myself bound to continue the cause, on account of the withholding the parts of this paper; and I certainly cannot exclude the inferences which gentlemen may draw from the omissions.

General Wilkinson. I have to offer, sir, a letter from James L. Donaldson, which Mr. Martin called for yesterday.

Mr. Martin. This is only an extract.

General Wilkinson. I had no other.

Mr. Martin, (returning the paper.) We take no extracts.

Mr. Wirt, (in an under key.) Unless it be of molasses.

General Wilkinson. I have also another paper; it is the extract of a letter from Mr. Covington, showing that the cipher was invented in 1794.

Mr. Wickham. Did you ever use these ciphers, or any of them, or any other cipher, in correspondence with the Baron Carondelet?

Answer. No; but I must reflect on that question before I answer it decidedly.

SATURDAY, October 3.

Mr. Martin. You offered an extract of your instructions to Lieutenant Pike yesterday; we wish to see them.

General Wilkinson. I have now in my hand a complete copy of those instructions. If they are admitted, I wish them to be read. [They were received and deposited with the clerk.] Mr. Martin had asked me yesterday respecting the information which Major Bruff had given to General Smith and Mr. Read, of the Senate. I have a copy of it. Here it is.

Mr. Martin. We only want to know when it was received.

Answer. I do not recollect; it was dated on the 1st of March, 1807, at the city of Washington.

Mr. Martin. Then it could have influence on your conduct at New Orleans. We do not want the paper.—[See note A A.]

General Wilkinson said that this same Major Bruff had been summoned here as a witness by Colonel Burr, to take revenge, as he had alleged, for past injuries.

Colonel Burr asked whether this was offered as testimony?

General Wilkinson. No; I only offer what I can prove.

Colonel Burr said that, if General Wilkinson had any further evidence to give, he would go on with it. But these appeared to be mere conversations, and he did not know whether dictated by passion or not.

General Wilkinson, (addressing the judge.) I stand here in a very complex character. On the one hand, summoned as a witness on the part of the United States; on the other, arraigned as an offender by Colonel Burr and his counsel. I therefore hope that, should I commit any impropriety, it will be ascribed to the peculiarity of my situation.

Mr. Wickham. I ask you if you had any communications with Timothy Kibby, and whether you had ever made any propositions to him as to an invasion of Mexico?

Answer. I cannot charge my recollection. There was a very general idea that hostilities with Spain would certainly take place. It is possible that I might have spoken to him, as an officer of the militia, with respect to the probable force which he could bring into the field in such an event.

Question. Have you ever made any confidential communications to him or to any other person on that subject?

Answer. I am not conscious that I ever did.

General Wilkinson, having been informed that there were no more questions to be propounded to him, addressed the judge as follows: Upon a former occasion you will recollect, sir, that reference has been had to a certain letter of which so much has been said. That letter is designated by the words said to be used in it, "yours, postmarked the 13th of May, has been received." Yet that letter has been withheld, under the pretext of delicacy; while we have seen it employed in the most artful and insidious manner to injure my reputation and tarnish my fame. Sir, I demand the production of that letter. I hope that a reputation acquired by nearly thirty years of service is not to be filched from me by the subtlety, artifice, or fraud of Colonel Burr and his counsel. I hope that, on Monday next, you will permit me to introduce a variety of letters and documents explanatory of the insinuations and innuendoes which are calculated to implicate me as an accessory in his plans. A member of the grand jury has been brought forward to state what my evidence was; which is an additional reason why I should be permitted to explain. It was my intention to have commenced my testimony by giving a regular detail of the proceedings of Colonel Burr from his first passage of the mountains, but I have been advised to confine myself to a narration of the occurrences which commenced at Natchitoches. It is now my duty to go back to that period, and trace Colonel Burr step by step.

The Chief Justice said that the court could not sit to hear any thing except what related to the cause. As to the intention with which General Wilkinson had done any particular act, he had been permitted to explain, in the whole course of his testimony. With respect to what had been drawn from Mr. Tazewell, as he understood it, there was no variation between his statement and that of General Wilkinson. The papers which General Wilkinson wished to refer to had as well appear before the public in any other way as through the channel of this court.

Mr. McRae said he did not know that General Wilkinson had gone so fully into an explanation of the various parts of his evidence as he intended. He had understood the court to say, that General Wilkinson might be permitted to explain himself as to any particular fact mentioned in the course of his testimony. It is the wish of General Wilkinson, on every occasion, to explain the motives which governed him; and if in some points he has not been so full as he intended, he hoped that the court would still hear him.

Mr. Wickham. General Wilkinson must necessarily stand in a very delicate situation. Very heavy charges are brought against Colonel Burr, which are attempted to be established by the testimony of General Wilkinson. It must have been foreseen that the counsel of Colonel Burr, if they did their duty, would endeavor to impeach the credibility of General Wilkinson as a witness. But this is a common case. It is a thing which may happen in the case of every witness who is brought before the court. A witness is brought forward on whose testimony much reliance is placed. He is, of course, cross-examined to see whether he be consistent with himself, or whether his credibility can be impeached. In the present case, I am certain that General Wilkinson has been treated with every degree of delicacy which the nature of the case would admit of. With respect to myself, I am conscious of having done nothing but what my duty dictated, and of having used as much delicacy towards General Wilkinson as his relation would justify. We do not see the necessity or propriety of General Wilkinson's entering into explanations. If these are to be made, they had better be reserved for some other time, and some other place.

Colonel Burr. General Wilkinson has been sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. If he has not told the truth, let him do it now; and not, by his explanations, interrupt the examination of other witnesses.

General Wilkinson. I have received, and have now in my possession, a number of letters from Colonel Burr, of an ambiguous nature, combining matters personal with matters political; but they contain nothing which would subject him to legal penalty or legal obstruction. I have before observed, that under the circumstances in which these letters were received, I did feel myself at liberty to divulge their contents without the permission of Colonel Burr. I now ask that permission, for I feel that delicacy which others profess to feel. The letter post marked the 13th of May, has often been mentioned, and has been used to injure my character, and envelope it in doubts and suspicions. This letter, if written at all, must have been in answer to one received from Colonel Burr. Why has it not been produced? I challenge its production; for if it were brought forward, it would release me from all obligation to silence, and would enable me to exhibit to public view the letters of Colonel Burr. Sir, I am incapable of uttering an intentional falsehood; and, under the solemnity of the oath which I have taken, I have no hesitation in saying, that the declaration of that gentleman (pointing to Colonel Burr) that he had put the letter beyond his power and with my knowledge, is totally destitute of truth.

A A.

WASHINGTON, March 1, 1807.

Major Bruff communicated to S. S. and Colonel Read:

That Judge Easton, (immediately after the first number of the Western World appeared,) told him (Bruff) that it was in his power to ruin Colonel Burr; that he had told him his plans; that they were such as had made his hair stand on end, but he had gone so far that he could not recede. Bruff told him, that he owed it to himself, as an honest man, to inform Government. That I cannot do, said E., for I am under an oath of secrecy. But you had previously taken an oath, paramount to any other, to your country; I cannot tell, said E., but I will communicate the whole to you, if you will come under an oath of secrecy; indeed, continued he, Colonel Burr told me, that he had heard of you, that he had heard you was a brave man, had sense and firmness, and desired me to speak to you. I am therefore at liberty to tell you all the plans, if you will swear that you will keep the secret. Bruff refused, and advised Easton to act like a man of honor and a friend to his country, or he would hereafter repent.

Evidence of Commodore Shaw.

FRIDAY, October 2.

Mr. Wickham. For what is Commodore Shaw introduced?

Mr. Hay. To authenticate the copy of the letter from General Jackson to Governor Claiborne, shown to General Wilkinson.

Commodore Shaw. I recollect to have seen the original.

Mr. Wickham. You will please, sir, to state its contents.

Commodore Shaw. Governor Claiborne sent his servant to me with an invitation to dinner; adding that he wished to see me on public business. I was unable to wait upon him that day; but I saw him on a subsequent day, when he took a letter from his pocket and showed it to me. It was a letter from General Jackson to himself, and had been thrown into the office by some anonymous person. This letter gave Governor Claiborne a strong suspicion of General Wilkinson, and reminded him of the ides of March, and insisted upon the necessity of placing New Orleans in a state of defence.

Chief Justice. When was this? Answer. Some time in December.

Chief Justice. Did report convey any information of troops approaching New Orleans?

Answer. Yes. Every day in December and January rumors were arriving of the movement of troops on our southwestern frontiers; and my impression was, that every thing should be done for the safety of the city; and that if General Wilkinson had not taken the measures that he did, he would have deserved censure.

Mr. McRae, (looking in the letter in his hand.) Do you recollect whether General Jackson recommended in his letter, that the governor should use every possible means of defence?

Mr. Wickham objected to putting questions from the letter.

Chief Justice. You must not, sir, take the letter in your hand, and propose questions from it. It is really of no consequence whether the letter be read or not. No doubt the substance of it has been stated.

Mr. McRae. Have I no right to read over the letter, and afterwards to interrogate the witness as to its substance? It is my object, I confess, to draw out the substance of the original letter.

Mr. Wickham. In that letter were there not strong suspicions expressed against General Wilkinson?

Answer. There were.

Mr. Wickham. I should suppose, then, that General Wilkinson might have easily judged from that circumstance of the correctness of the rumors which were circulated about Colonel Burr.

Mr. McRae. State, sir, what you know of these transactions.

Answer. The alarm at New Orleans in December and January was very considerable. We did not know when the enemy would advance upon us. There was an apprehension of an attack by sea, and I was then authorized to purchase a large ship, to be stationed at the Balize. The gunboats, which had been ordered to enter Lake Pontchartrain, were commanded to take a different position. Some time after there was a report that a fleet, under English colors, was actually cruising off the mouth of the Mississippi; and this increased the alarm.

Mr. Burr. Was it a fact or not that this fleet was there?

Answer. I do not know. Such was the report, and it was brought by a packet which comes up weekly from the Balize. It was not said to be a fleet of merchantmen, but of ships of war. The report was, I believe, on the counting-house books. Mr. Bradford, the printer, also made a communication to me on the 6th of January, which produced a considerable effect. He informed me that he had spent some time in the city of Washington and Philadelphia; and from Philadelphia he had travelled to Pittsburg, and from thence proceeded to New Orleans; that he had seen a number of men under arms at the mouth of Cumberland river; two gunboats building, which the men at work on board told him would be delivered up by Colonel Lyon to Colonel Burr; besides a number of small arms, and a thirty-two pounder, ready to go aboard; and that this flotilla was to be under the command of Captain Talbot.

Mr. McRae. Did this information reach General Wilkinson?

Answer. Yes. I told him of it myself. The communication was made in the company of Mr. Hynes and Major Spence.

Mr. Wirt. What was the situation of New Orleans at that time? was it in a condition to defend itself against any attack by sea?

Answer. It was in a very defenceless condition.

Mr. Wickham. Were these rumors before General Wilkinson's arrival at New Orleans, or afterwards?

Answer. Afterwards. General Wilkinson made to me a full communication of all he knew; I dare say, a week before it was known to the public. He showed me the ciphered letter from General Dayton, with his signature to it. This enabled me the sooner to get my naval preparations ready.

Mr. Hay. Did General Wilkinson give you this information under injunctions to keep it secret until the proper time should come for divulging it?

Answer. He did; until he could obtain more complete information from some of Colonel Burr's agents then in town.

Mr. Hay. Was Colonel Freeman then at New Orleans? Answer. He was.

Mr. Wirt. What was the strength of the garrison in New Orleans?

Answer. In the upper fort there were three pounders and one twenty-four pounder. All the guns in the lower fort were dismantled. In the upper fort there were six men and a corporal's guard. I am sure there were not more than three guns there.

Mr. Wirt. What was the number of regular men in garrison?

Answer. It was a small garrison. Generally there were parts of four companies of regulars there. What was the precise number of men I do not recollect.

Mr. Hay. Did not those who were responsible for the safety of New Orleans suspect many of disaffection?

Answer. I did suppose that there were many in and near New Orleans who were inimical to the Government of the United States.

Mr. Wirt. Suppose an attack had been made by a fleet from below and an army from above, would the people of the city have resisted with a proper spirit?

Answer. I thought, sir, that the people were not as patriotic as they ought to have been. Many endeavored to discourage the belief that there was any danger of an attack.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Wickham. Did General Wilkinson show you the ciphered letter? Answer. Yes; in manuscript.

Question. Did he show you the translation? Answer. He did.

Question. Was it General Wilkinson's copy? Answer. I so understood it.

Question. As a copy of the whole letter?

Answer. Yes; as the true copy of the whole of the letter received by General Wilkinson through Mr. Swartwout.

Question. Did you say there were four companies of regulars at New Orleans?

Answer. I said they were not full.

Question. Was there any alarm before General Wilkinson got down? Answer. None, that I heard of.

Mr. Wickham. Did you suspect the people of New Orleans to be disaffected because they would not believe these rumors?

Answer. No; not for that reason. I believed them disaffected, for other reasons.

Mr. Wickham. Whilst these rumors prevailed, did the ordinary commerce of the flat-bottomed boats coming down the river continue?

Answer. It did.

Question. Did the mails arrive as usual?

Answer. They were not regular in January. I thought some of my letters were detained, and I then determined to communicate with the Government by water.

Question. Did you obey any orders from General Wilkinson?

Answer. No; our service was quite distinct; but I had orders to co-operate with General Wilkinson, and he might send the squadron to what point he pleased.

Question. Who gave you the orders to apprehend Colonel Burr?

Answer. They were from Government, and I think from General Wilkinson. My orders from the Government have been published, and I suppose Colonel Burr may have seen them in Natchez. The original orders are at my lodgings.

[Here Mr. Hay produced a copy of these orders.]

Mr. Burr. That is not the order, Commodore Shaw, which was published at Natchez?

Answer, (having read it.) The very same, sir, verbatim.

Question. Did you not see an order in the newspapers directing my boats to be destroyed? &c.

Answer. I did not, sir. These orders (those in his hand) were put on the custom-house books.

Mr. Burr. Was there any qualification "if attacked," in the order that was published?

Answer. There was.

Question. Was it not an order to attack and destroy, without any qualification? Answer. Oh, no, sir.

[Documents referred to in General Wilkinson's evidence.]

Deposition of Colonel Cushing.

On or about the 8th of October, 1806, I was sitting at the dining-table in my quarters, at Natchitoches, with General Wilkinson, when a gentleman entered the room and inquired for Colonel Cushing. I rose to receive him, and he presented to me the letter from General Dayton, of which the following is an exact copy, viz:

DEAR SIR:

ELIZABETHTOWN, N. J., July 27, 1806.

This will be presented to you by my nephew, a son of the late General Matthias Ogden, who commanded one of the Jersey regiments in the revolutionary war, and whom you probably recollect. He is on his way to New Orleans, and is advised by me to call at your post, if it should be Fort Adams, or elsewhere upon the Mississippi, as I am told it is. His merits, and the esteem in which he is held by me, make me anxious to procure for him a welcome reception, even for the short stay of a few hours that he will be able to make with you.

Any instance of friendly attention or assistance shown to him and his very worthy companion, Mr. Swartwout, will be gratefully acknowledged, and regarded as a favor conferred on

Dear sir, your sincere friend and very humble servant,

JONATHAN DAYTON.

Colonel CUSHING.

The gentleman informed me that he was the Mr. Swartwout mentioned in the letter, and I presented him to General Wilkinson as the friend of General Dayton, and requested him to take a seat with us at table, which he did. Mr. Swartwout then observed that Mr. Ogden and himself, being on their way to New Orleans, had learned at Fort Adams that our troops and some militia were assembling at Natchitoches, from whence they were to march against the Spanish army then in our neighborhood, and that the object of his visit was to act with us as a volunteer. He remained with us some time, and conversed on various topics, but said nothing which could excite a suspicion against him; and he left us with a strong impression on my mind that his business to New Orleans was of a commercial nature, and could be conducted by Mr. Ogden during his absence. While he was in my quarters I was called out on business, and was absent from five to ten minutes.

The next morning I was walking on the gallery in front of my quarters, when General Wilkinson came up, and taking me aside, informed me that he had something of a very serious nature to communicate to me; so much so, that although it was necessary to hold it in strict reserve for the present, he begged me to bear it in mind, that I might be able to make a fair statement of it at any future period. He then asked me if I knew or had heard of an enterprise being on foot in the Western States. I replied that I had heard nothing on the subject, and asked him what the enterprise was to which he alluded. He then said, "Yes, my friend, a great number of individuals possessing wealth, popularity, and talents, are at this moment associated for purposes inimical to the Government of the United States; Colonel Burr is at their head, and the young gentleman who delivered you the letter last evening is one of his emissaries. The story of serving as a volunteer is only a mask. He has brought me a letter from Colonel Burr, which, being in cipher, I have not yet been able fully to make out; but I have discovered that his object is treasonable, and that it is my duty to oppose him by every means in my power. He assures me that he has funds; says the navy are with him; offers to make me second in command, and to give the officers of the army any thing I may ask for them; and he requests me to send a confidential friend to confer with him at Nashville, in Tennessee. In fact, he seems to calculate on me and the army as ready to join him." I then asked the general whether he had received any information or instruction on this subject from Government; to which he replied that he had not, and that he must therefore adopt such measures as in his judgment were best calculated to defend the country. He said he would immediately march to the Sabine, and endeavor to make such terms with the Spanish commander as would justify him in removing the greater part of his force to the Mississippi, and that the moment this should be effected he would send me to New Orleans in a light barge, with orders to secure the French train of artillery at that post, and to put the place in the best possible situation for defence, and that he would follow with every man that could be spared from Natchitoches with all possible expedition. He told me that he would give the information he had received to the President of the United States, and solicit particular instructions for his government; but as delay might prove ruinous, he would pursue the course before suggested, as the only means in his power to save the country, until the pleasure of the President could be known. On our march to the Sabine, the general told me that he thought his presence at New Orleans at as early a period as possible was absolutely necessary, and that the moment he could make terms with the Spanish commander he would set out for that place, and leave me to bring on the troops.

PHILADELPHIA, July 25, 1806.

DEAR SIR:

Mr. Swartwout, the brother of Colonel S. of New York, being on his way down the Mississippi, and presuming that he may pass you at some post on the river, has requested of me a letter of introduction, which I gave with pleasure, as he is a most amiable young man, and highly respectable, from his character and connexions. I pray you to afford him any friendly offers which his situation may require, and beg you to pardon the trouble which this may give you.

With entire respect, your friend and obedient servant,

A. BURR.

His Excellency GENERAL WILKINSON.

It is now well ascertained that you are to be displaced in next session. Jefferson will affect to yield reluctantly to the public sentiment, but yield he will; prepare yourself, therefore, for it: you know the rest.

You are not a man to despair, or even despond, especially when such prospects offer in another quarter. Are you ready? Are your numerous associates ready? Wealth and glory, Louisiana and Mexico. I shall have time to receive a letter from you before I set out for Ohio—OHIO. Address one to me here, and another to me in Cincinnati. Receive and treat my nephew affectionately, as you would receive your friend

SIR:

I have concluded to undertake the land purchase which we talked of last winter, and determinet to go on the lands this fall—any number of settlers could be had on this side of the mountains, but I should prefer to have the greater part from the Western country. You promised to write about the horses, but have heard nothing from you, and suppose there will be no difficulty on that head. The money for the first payment is now ready. I shall be at Frankfort about the 15th Augus, and hope then to meet you and Colonel Lynch there; it is quite necessary that I should see Lynch, as I shall be provided with cash to go on vigorously with our speculation. Some of the concerned are now on their way to see you, and will be with you nearly as soon as this letter. Please to encourage them, and give them a good account of things.

Your humble servant,

A. STEPHENS.

Letter from Doctor Bollman to General Wilkinson of September 27, 1806.

SIR:

NEW ORLEANS, September 27, 1806.

I have the honor to forward to your excellency the enclosed letters, which I was charged to deliver to you by our mutual friend.

I shall remain for some time at this place, and should be glad to learn where and when I may have the pleasure of an interview with you. Have the goodness to inform me of it, and please to direct your letter to me, to the care of Messrs. Chew & Relf, or enclose under cover to them.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient servant,
ERICK BOLLMAN.

General WILKINSON.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

JULY 16, 1807.

As you are said to have removed your head-quarters down the river, and there is a report that the Spaniards intercept our mails which pass necessarily through the territory occupied by them, in order to reach you, I think proper to address you in cipher, that the contents may be concealed from the Dons, if they shall make so free as to open the letter. Take the following for the catchword or checkword, and you may very readily decipher the figures, viz: in your own hieroglyphics [ . ]; but in your alphabet thus:

[Hieroglyphics.]
V  $\frown$  — O I A

Every thing, and even Heaven itself, appears to have conspired to prepare the train for a grand explosion; are you also ready? For I know you flinch not when a great object is in view. Your present is more favorable than your late position; and as you can retain it without suspicion or alarm, you ought, by no means, to retire from it until your friends join you in December, somewhere on the river Mississippi. Under the auspices of Burr and Wilkinson, I shall be happy to engage; and when the time arrives, you will find me near you.

Write and inform me by first mail what may be expected from you and your associates. In an enterprise of such moment, considerations even stronger than those of affection impel me to desire your cordial co-operation and active support.

DAYTON.

Courage and union. }

Let me hear from you by mail, as well as by the first good private conveyance, and believe me, with the best wishes for your prosperity and happiness, most truly,

Your friend and servant,

JONA: DAYTON.

If you write in cipher, use the same word, viz: V  $\frown$  — O I A

Extract of a letter from James L. Donaldson, Esq., to General James Wilkinson.

NATCHEZ, October 30, 1806.

Michael Myers arrived here to-day in thirteen days from St. Louis, on his way to New Orleans. He made a communication to me, with permission to transmit to you, which might stagger even credulity. On his information, he says he is certain, and most firmly believes in the intelligence he communicates. This is neither more nor less than that a plan to revolutionize the Western country has been formed, matured, and is ready to explode; that Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, Orleans, and Indiana are combined to declare themselves independent on the 15th November; that proposals have been made to some of the most influential characters at St. Louis, by an accredited agent of the conspiracy, to join in the plan; that this person, whose name Myers refuses to reveal, is in a most respectable line of life, and had the most unquestionable vouchers of his mission in French and English; that he declared if money was necessary, that it might be commanded to any extent.

It is proper to add that the persons thus applied to at St. Louis altogether refused to concur in any plan of the kind, saying that it should be only superior force that should dispense with their oath of fidelity to the United States. This may all appear to a person, as well acquainted as you are with the politics of the Western country, as a second Spanish conspiracy, and as such he ridiculed; and such is my impression of the wonderful plan. But Myers so firmly believed it, that, having set forth on his journey by land to the United States, he was induced by his fears hastily to return to arrange his business at all events, and prepare for an explosion. He most solemnly protests the truth of the communication, and declares there are only four persons in St. Louis who are privy to the disclosures made by the secret agent. It is not improbable that this may be a ruse de guerre, a stratagem set on foot by the patron of the Western World, to foster and keep alive the dissensions, which, excited by the pretended exposition of ancient conspiracies, may be fanned into a flame, by spreading an alarm of an immediate and pressing treasonable combination. This I am apt to believe is the case; and, in order more fully to succeed, they may study and affect mystery, as better calculated to excite suspicion, and that they may have the honor of a new discovery. However, be the matter as it may, I communicate it to you as I received it, and have only to regret that you had it not in person from Myers's information, of which, whatever your judgment might pronounce, the solemnity of his assertion, and his certainty of the plan, (although he was not at liberty to divulge the means,) must have staggered the mind capable of believing it.

The deposition of A. L. Duncan, a witness in behalf of the United States against Aaron Burr, taken at the request of said witness, but by the consent of George Hay, Esq., attorney for the United States in the district of Virginia, and of the said Aaron Burr, to be read in evidence, if required, on all trials, motions, or other proceedings in course of law, in which the said Aaron Burr shall be concerned, at the prosecution of the said United States.

I consent that this affidavit may be read in all cases in which the United States are concerned against Aaron Burr, in the same manner as above expressed.

GEO. HAY, U. S. Attorney for Virginia district.

During the commotions excited in New Orleans last winter by what was termed Col. Burr's conspiracy and his associates and accomplices in that place, I was called upon in my professional capacity by General Wilkinson for counsel and advice in some measures which he was about to adopt. The temper and disposition which I had discovered in New Orleans, and the reports which daily reached that city from above, induced the belief that half measures were not suited to the times, and that the public safety required the exertion of extraordinary energies. I therefore urged the general repeatedly to the seizure of suspected persons, and the declaration of martial law. When Bollman was seized, I suggested to the general the expediency of transmitting with him a statement of facts, on oath, to justify the step, and to warrant his commitment. He then put the letters which he said were written to him by Col. Burr, and which he also said were transmitted to him by Swartwout and Bollman, into my hands, on which, together with some further information and knowledge of their views which the general possessed, I framed the deposition which accompanied Bollman, intentionally omitting every thing which was calculated to inculpate the general, or which might, by exciting suspicions, have a tendency to weaken his testimony. Having prepared the deposition, I presented it to General Wilkinson to be deposed to, who strongly and repeatedly objected to the omission I had made, and urged warmly that the whole should be introduced. He also desired that a declaration of Bollman, with which he frequently interlarded his conversation, should be entered, viz: "That he had come to New Orleans with views to the settlement of lands on the Washita, and was a mere spectator." And it was only after a full exposition of the sole objects of the document, that I could prevail on him to depose to it. It is idle and absurd to impute any sinister intention to the omission, because, on any trial which might ensue, it was known the original documents must be introduced as they have been. I recollect, during the winter, General Wilkinson was called before the Legislature of the Territory to give an account of the state of public affairs, and he informed me he had intended to submit to their inspection Colonel Burr's duplicate, he having erased such parts as had been intended to implicate him, as he knew several of the members, and particularly the Speaker, to be interested in opposition to his measures, and for the promotion of such a state of things as were best calculated to favor Colonel Burr's enterprise. I understand that the erasure made on this duplicate was but partial, the general having determined to give oral information to the Legislature, which employed him two successive days; and that he considered the duplicate unimportant, (whilst the original has been preserved untouched,) excepting the short paragraph relative to Bollman, which is preserved in its original state, and the only words erased, "Your letter, post-marked 13th May, is received," have been re-inserted in the general's own hand. On or about the 15th August, since my arrival in this city, General Wilkinson put into my hands, and those of J. L. Donaldson, Esq. four or five letters, observing to us, "I submit to you those letters which I have not examined since I left St. Louis; they are from Colonel Burr; I do not recollect their particular contents, but having received them in confidence, and knowing they blend personalities with politics, I have not permitted myself to re-examine them, because I feel an insuperable repugnance to violate the trust of any man. I give them to you, here is the cipher, decipher them, consider their contents well, and then inform me whether their promulgation may be necessary to my honor." We did so, and we gave the general our opinion that the promulgation might be necessary and proper. From an examination of those letters, and the general's evident surprise, and prompt declaration of his ignorance when we communicated certain passages of these letters, it was my own and Mr. Donaldson's opinion, that he had but partially deciphered them.

In answer to interrogatories on the part of Colonel Burr, I recollect to have solicited the command of a party to Natchez for the purpose of arresting Col. Burr, and delivered from the instructions which the general possessed, together with the state of things at that period, that the measure was warrantable; and having seen several communications from the Government to General Wilkinson, and particularly that in reply to his letter of the 21st of October, I had no doubt of the sanction of Government to any measures which were calculated to defeat the views of Colonel Burr. I have seen communications of a confidential nature from the President to General Wilkinson, and I believe in reply to the general's letter of the 21st of October.

Deposition of Captain J. B. Walback.

I had the honor to become acquainted with General James Wilkinson some time in August 1799; became attached to his military family in December, 1800; was appointed an aid-de-camp in the spring following, and continued in that capacity until the last of November, 1804.

During the above period, I have witnessed that General Wilkinson did employ ciphers of different kinds in his correspondence; among them was an English pocket dictionary. Several of these ciphers I have made myself; designed copies of some of them are still in my possession, and others I have recognised since my arrival at the city of Richmond; particularly one to the late Gen. James Jackson, and another to the late Major General Alexander Hamilton; a third to a Mr. Hulings, then at New Orleans; a fourth to Colonel Cushing; a fifth to Mr. Silas Dinsmore, and one to myself. Several of these were projected in 1802 and 1803, at the time the port of New Orleans was shut, and for the purpose of procuring and conveying intelligence to the Government.

Question. Did you ever observe in General Wilkinson any act or disposition, which marked inattention to his duty, as to the zealous and faithful discharge of the trust reposed in him as an officer of the United States?

Answer. From my own observation and experience, (being now nearly twenty-six years in military life,) I can declare that I have never known an officer more zealously devoted to the service in which he was engaged, and I can safely declare that I have never seen an officer of General Wilkinson's rank voluntarily and cheerfully expose himself to such privations, hardships, and sufferings in the course of his duty, as I have seen him meet with alacrity.

Question. Do you know the hand-writing of Captain C. Smith? Answer. I do.

Question. Are these hieroglyphics of his writing? Answer. They are.

Question. Are they the same which were employed by Colonel Burr in his correspondence with General Wilkinson?

Answer. They are the same which are employed in Colonel Burr's letters, shown me since my arrival at the city of Richmond, and said to be delivered by Messrs. Swartwout and Bollman to General Wilkinson.

Question. Do you recollect when Captain C. Smith left General Wilkinson's family?

Answer. Some time in July, 1801.

Question. Do you think General Wilkinson afterwards saw or was near him?

Answer. I am certain not, because General Wilkinson did not return from the Mississippi until May, 1804, and Captain Smith resided in the State of Maryland, and died in the winter of 1803 or 1804.

Question. Have you seen General Wilkinson employ the pocket dictionary now presented to you in writing cipher? Answer. I have.

Question. Will you say in what year?

Answer. I am not positive as to the year, but it was during the period I was attached to his military family.

Question. Did you hear a sentiment from General Wilkinson calculated to disaffect the troops, or to abate their zeal for its promotion?

Answer. No; on the contrary, I have witnessed that General Wilkinson always used his utmost endeavors to promote harmony, comfort, and good order among the troops, and, by his precepts as well as example, to insure subordination and patriotism.

J. B. WALBACK, Captain Artillery.

I am content that the above shall be read as evidence in all cases between the United States and Colonel Burr; and that any thing which may be added by the affiant, by way of answer to interrogatories, may also be read.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, May 6, 1806.

You are to embark to-morrow, and will sail early the next morning, with Lockwood's and Strong's companies for Fort Adams, and on arriving there, you are to add Campbell's company to your detachment, and must proceed without a moment's unnecessary delay up Red River to Natchitoches, where you are to take the command.

The point of your destination being deemed at present a critical one, it is desirable your companies should be kept complete to the establishment; and for this purpose you are to make such disposition of the recruits ordered from Tennessee or elsewhere, as may be found necessary.

Your remote position from the posts east of the Mississippi, renders it convenient and necessary that they should, as heretofore, report directly to and receive orders from head-quarters; but the commandants are to report to you monthly, and will be liable to your orders as senior officer of the district, whenever the public service may require the interposition of your authority, which should be made with due caution, to avoid clashing with the arrangements which may issue from head-quarters.

The posts west of the Mississippi are subject to your immediate command, and are to be governed accordingly. You are to appoint general courts-martial within the limits of your district, and are to decide on all sentences which may not affect a commissioned officer, agreeably to the rules and articles of war.

At the distance which separates us, it would be vain and presumptuous to prescribe precise rules for your conduct in command, where the occurrence of incidents and change of circumstances may be so unexpected and variable as to baffle anticipation, and to render positive orders destructive to the interests of the country. You are, therefore, to meet the public service with a sound discretion, and will be held responsible for events. The trust is a high and important one; but it is with singular pleasure I can observe, that my long experience of your judgment and capacity leaves no doubt on my mind, that the result will justify the public confidence, and prove honorable to your name and profession.

I will, therefore, submit one observation only to your consideration; it is, that you should not fail to employ the force confided to your command wherever it may be found most necessary to protect or defend the rights and interests of our country within the sphere of your authority.

With the warmest wishes for your fame and happiness,

I am, sir, your faithful friend, and obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Col. TH. H. CUSHING, 2d regiment infantry.

Instructions from General Wilkinson to Colonel Cushing.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, May 8, 1806. 1 o'clock, A. M.

Advice yesterday received from Major Porter makes it my duty to direct the acceleration of your movements by every practicable means, and I trust that in the present state of the waters, you may reach Fort Adams on the 20th inst.

On arriving at that port, the information you may receive must determine the course of your conduct. Should the Spaniards have resumed their positions east of the Sabine, or assumed a menacing aspect at Nacogdoches, you must add to your command every man at Fort Adams, excepting a mere locum tenens, leaving orders at that place for Lt. Col. Kingsbury to fall down to the mouth of Red River, and there wait the return of a sufficient number of your barges for his transport to the high grounds, from whence it may become expedient for you to march the whole of your command, excepting the boats' crews.

I hope Major Porter may have the precaution to transmit the Executive a copy of the information he has forwarded to me, and that you may receive from that source, at an early period, decisive instructions for your government; in the meantime, though war be our trade, it is not only opposite to the genius and disposition of our country, but also to its substantial interests. The sword must not, therefore, be drawn but in the last extremity, to punish outrage, to resist invasion, or repel an attack.

Should indications justify it, (and you must take measures to ascertain, if possible, the designs of your neighbors,) you are to call to your aid every man who can safely be spared from the garrison under your orders, and will employ every pains and exertion to put them in the highest state of fitness for offensive operations.

You will find, in the hands of Major Porter, an order from the Secretary of War, which might justify you in pushing your neighbors beyond the Sabine river, should they have recrossed it to the eastward. But, as it appears from the public prints that a pacific negotiation has, on our part, ensued these orders, you must not strain their construction to favor the effusion of blood, and involve our country in the certain calamities and uncertain events of war.

Learn, with all possible precision, the force, composition, and station of the troops opposed to you; be yourself prepared for combat; and, if a conflict must ensue, having previously animated your men by a strong exhortation, and sworn your officers in their presence to fall or conquer, make your onset with the bayonet; and your own glory, the honor of our arms, and the interests of the nation will be insured and maintained.

Wishing you life and laurels, health and fame, I am, your faithful friend and fellow soldier,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Colonel T. H. CUSHING, 1st regiment U. S. infantry.

P. S. You are to take with you from Fort Adams an eight inch howitzer, which you will find there properly equipped and amply ammunitioned.

Extract of a letter from General James Wilkinson to the Honorable H. Dearborn, Secretary of War, dated

NATCHEZ, September 8, 1806.

I arrived at this place last evening at six o'clock, and addressed a note to the Secretary of the Territory, (Governor Williams being absent,) of which you have a copy under cover with this answer; this morning I waited on him, and have seen the plan adopted by Governor Claiborne and himself, the first article of which appears to be in direct opposition to your order respecting the removal of the Spaniards from Bayou Pierre, to which place I understand they have fallen back from the vicinity of Adayes, and I hope they may continue there until my arrival at Natchitoches, for which place I shall commence my journey the moment after I have arranged with the Secretary of the Territory for such auxiliary force of militia as may eventually become necessary from his jurisdiction. Governor Claiborne has, I understand, arrayed militia in the western counties of the Territory of Orleans; but I shall discourage their march until I have penetrated the designs of the Spaniard, and may find him deaf to the solemn appeal which I shall make to his understanding, his interests, and his duty.

Let the President be assured, sir, I shall drain the cup of conciliation to maintain the peace of our country, and that the sword shall not be drawn but in the last extremity, after reason and remonstrance have failed to preserve inviolate our territory east of the Sabine; but, at the same time, that an awful responsibility restrains the inclinations and ambition of the soldier to this temperate course of conduct, in opposition to the order which I think I discern in the executive officers of these Territories, I will pledge my life to him that no act shall be suffered, within my knowledge, to tarnish the national honor or affect the lustre of his administration.

If the precautions embraced by my instructions to Colonel Cushing, of which I transmitted you a copy from St. Louis, have prevented the effusion of blood, I must believe I have done some good to the State, because the retro-spection of the Spaniards has rendered the ultimate appeal unnecessary, at least for the present; and as nothing can be lost and every thing may be gained by a little delay, it seems better that the opportunity for exciting hostilities should have escaped, than that it should have been seized on to let slip the dogs of war before the effect of conciliatory measures had been duly tested.

The retrograde of the Spaniards is not accounted for, but may be ascribed to three causes: the unhealthiness of the troops, the want of forage for the immense cavalcade with which they are incumbered, or the failure of provisions; but as they would scarcely have made so formidable and bold an advance, in the face of the prohibition uttered by Major Porter, without positive orders from the competent authority, it is reasonable to presume, when the cause of their progression has been removed, they may resume their former position, for which events some preparatory arrangements must be commenced. The Spaniards who have approached Natchitoches being all mounted and without artillery, and each private being obliged to keep up four horses and a mule for service out of his pay of one hundred dollars per month, it will be impossible for them to maintain a fortification; but the same circumstance will enable them to refuse or to give battle to our infantry, at their discretion. To remedy this disadvantage, and enable me, should I be forced to appeal to arms, to drive them effectually beyond the Sabine or to cut them up, I shall endeavor to procure about four or five hundred dragoons and mounted militia from the two Territories, unless I should find them so incautious as to enable me, by a forced march of the established troops, to surprise their camp under cover of the night; but this is scarcely to be expected, if the commanding officer possesses a spark of military knowledge or experience.

A blow once struck, it would appear expedient that we should make every advantage of it; and if men and means are furnished I will soon plant our standards on the left bank of Grand river. But I must beg leave to remark to you that, for distant operations, or the protection of our western frontier against the predatory incursions of the Spanish cavalry, a body of mounted men is absolutely indispensable.

SIR:

HEAD-QUARTERS, NATCHITOCHEs, October 4, 1806.

I yesterday morning received Governor Cordero's answer to my address of the 24th ultimo, copies of which you have under cover. The varied style of this letter, when contrasted with those of Governor Herrera to Col. Cushing and Governor Claiborne, combined with the circumstances of the Spanish troops having recrossed the Sabine to a man, has induced me, on the ground of economy and expediency, also to discharge the militia who had reached this place, and to countermand those under march, excepting about one hundred dragoons and mounted infantry, whom I shall retain in service until I am apprized of the determination of the Captain General Salcedo, to watch the movements of our neighbors, to prevent their sinister intrigues with our disaffected citizens, and, should they re-enter our territory, to aid the established troops in expelling them.

The Spaniards raised his camp at the Bayou Pierre on the 27th ultimo, traversed the country to the highway leading from this place to Nacogdoches, which he intersected on the 29th, about twenty-six miles in my front; and on the 30th crossed the Sabine, and took post on the right bank, where Colonel Cushing left him the 1st instant. But, notwithstanding, I have been determined to diminish my force, as the pretensions of Governor Herrera have not been retracted, nor our jurisdiction acknowledged, and as the position taken on the right bank of the Sabine is a material departure from the state of things at the surrender of the province to us, and exposes our territory to immediate invasion, I shall continue my preparations for defence and offence, and to wipe off the species of stigma which cavillers may attach to the Spanish repossession of the ground from whence we had driven them; to give confidence to our friends, to confirm the wavering and the disaffected; and, above all, to assert unequivocally the pretensions of the Government, I have taken post within the limits claimed by the officers of Spain, and in a few days shall move forward to the east bank of the Sabine, where I shall wait the answer of the Captain General Salcedo. Were I required to justify this step, I should reply that the United States having forced a Spanish guard to retire from a position within their acquired territory, that Power protested against the act, denied their pretensions, and armed for the avowed purpose of recovering the ground from which they had been driven; that a Spanish commander of respectable rank, at the head of a considerable force in military array, did not only recover that ground, but took a position much nearer to our barrier, and far within our limits; that this officer claimed the jurisdiction of the country east of the Sabine to the Arroyo Hondo, in behalf of his master the King of Spain, and declared his determination to protect and defend it as such. Were we to suffer such outrages upon the national sovereignty to pass over without notice, injurious interpretations might be levelled at our military character, and our forbearance might be construed into a tacit dereliction of our claims.

Under these circumstances, and to do away the shadow of right which the Spaniards may endeavor to found on their posterior occupancy, I feel it incumbent on me to take possession of the controverted tract to its utmost verge, where my conduct will be regulated by that of my neighbors, who the last evening occupied the spot where Colonel Cushing left him on the 1st instant with his advanced guard mounted immediately on the bank of the river; but you may rest assured, nothing shall be done on my part to excite unreasonable jealousies or to provoke hostilities; and, therefore, to prevent the misinterpretation of my movements, I have taken the precaution to write Governor Cordero this day, warning him of my intentions, and the motives by which I am actuated, agreeably to the copy now transmitted you. Of the militia from this Territory, about four hundred have turned out, which was more than I expected. From the Mississippi Territory I have not yet heard, and therefore cannot say in what force they are advancing. I have hope, from the aspect of Mr. Cordero's letter, and the actual state of their military at this moment, of which I have acquired the most clear and particular knowledge, that our differences here may be adjusted on honorable terms, and without bloodshed. I shall, however, be prepared for events, and will keep you regularly advised of every material occurrence.

With great consideration and respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

The Honorable HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

Letter from General Andrew Jackson to his excellency William C. C. Claiborne, Esq.

SIR:

NOVEMBER 12, 1806.

Although it is a long time since I sat down to write you, still that friendship which once existed remains bright on my part; and although since I had the pleasure of seeing you I have waded through difficult and disagreeable scenes, still I have all that fondness for my old and former friends that I ever had; and their memory has been more endeared to me by the treachery I have experienced since I saw you by some newly acquired ones. Indeed, I fear treachery has become the order of the day. This induces me to write you. Put your town in a state of defence, organize your militia, and defend your city as well against internal enemies as external. My knowledge does not extend so far as to authorize me to go into detail, but I fear you will meet with an attack from quarters you do not at present expect. Be upon the alert, keep a watchful eye on our general, and beware of an attack as well from your own country as Spain. I fear there is something rotten in the state of Denmark. You have enemies within your own city that may try to subvert your Government, and try to separate it from the Union. You know I never hazard ideas without good grounds; you will keep these hints to yourself. But I say again, be upon the alert; your Government I fear is in danger; I fear there are plans on foot inimical to the Union; whether they will be attempted to be carried into effect or not, I cannot say; but rest assured they are in operation, or I calculate boldly. Beware of the month of December. I love my country and Government; I hate the Dons; I would delight to see Mexico reduced, but I will die in the last ditch before I would yield a foot to the Dons, or see the Union disunited. This I write for your own eye and for your own safety; profit by it, and the ides of March remember.

With sincere respect, I am, as usual, your sincere friend,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Mrs. Jackson desires her best wishes to you.

Deposition of Commodore Shaw.

Be it known that, on or about the 7th day of January, Anno Domini 1807, Mr. Bradford, printer of the New Orleans Gazette, waited on this deponent, Captain Shaw, of the United States' navy; and, after delivering a letter from a correspondent, he observed, that he had spent some time in the city of Washington and Philadelphia, and from Philadelphia he had travelled to Pittsburg, and from thence proceeded towards New Orleans; that the country through which he passed was filled with commotion, and that there were a great number of the friends and followers of Colonel Burr. Mr. Bradford also mentioned that he had seen at the mouth of Cumberland river some of the public gun-boats, and a number of men employed in fitting them out, and that they were to join Colonel Burr; that the men at work on board the gun-boats told him (Bradford,) that Colonel Lyon had given up the gun-boats to Colonel Burr, and that he (Colonel Lyon) was one of Burr's partisans. Bradford further observes that he saw a number of small arms which he supposed were carried on board the gun-boats, and that the men at work on board the gun-boats informed him (Bradford) that Colonel Burr had issued arms and ammunition to twelve thousand men that Burr's flotilla consisted of seven gun-boats and a brig of ten guns; and that Captain Talbot was commander of the flotilla. Bradford also observed, that he was suspected; and that, in order to show his innocence, he would wait on General Wilkinson and disclose to him all he knew concerning Burr and his plots; and further this deponent saith not.

Deposition of Commodore Shaw and William Tharp.

Be it remembered, that this day, to wit, the 16th day of April, Anno Domini 1807, personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the city and parish of New Orleans, John Shaw, Esq., captain in the United States' navy, and William Tharp, Esq., who being first duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, declare and say, that on or about the 15th day of January last, 1807, passing from the coffee-house, about the hour of 12 o'clock at noon, they were accosted opposite the principal by Judge Prevost of this place, who observed that he was happy to inform these deponents that General Adair, the second in command to Colonel Burr, had arrived in town, and was then at Madame Nourages; that he had just waited on him, or had seen the man who had created so much stir, who said Colonel Burr would be in town in three days after him; that it would soon be discovered if the constitution and justice would prevail, or that of the usurpation of power and tyranny manifested in the measures at present adopted. Other remarks were made by the judge, in tone and gesture discovering evident marks of irritation and opposition to the measures of the officers of the Government, and impressed one of these deponents with an idea that the judge's object was to be personal with Captain John Shaw, and extorted a reply that he (Captain Shaw) knew no private character; he obeyed and executed his orders without partiality, and should always be alert to meet and apprehend the disturbers of the peace and harmony of his Government. These deponents remained but a few minutes with Judge Prevost, and went to the lodgings of the captain, where the deponents considered it correct to inform General Wilkinson that General Adair was then in town, which Captain Shaw did by sending his servant with a note to General Wilkinson.

WILLIAM THARP.

Copy of a letter from Wm. White to Col. Andrew Burk, of New Orleans.

DEAR SIR:

MIDDLETON, December 22, 1806.

Expect a large military force to take possession of your city; should it not happen before this reaches you, you may look out with hourly expectation of seeing it, headed by Col. Burr.

This is intended, should you see it in time, to apprise, in order that you may be in readiness to make your advantages of the times. A number of persons from this neighborhood are engaged in this expedition; amongst the number is your old acquaintance, Mr. A. Ralston.

Believe me to be, though much disappointed, still respectfully, yours,

WM. WHITE.

Col. ANDREW BURK, New Orleans.

Instructions to Lieutenant Pike.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, June 24, 1806.

You are to proceed without delay to the cantonment on the Missouri, where you are to embark the late Osage captives, and the deputation recently returned from Washington, with their presents and baggage, and are to transport the whole up the Missouri and Osage rivers to the town of the Grand Osage.

The safe delivery of this charge at the point of destination constitutes the primary object of your expedition, and therefore you are to move with such caution as may prevent surprise from any hostile band, and are to repel with your utmost force any outrage which may be attempted.

Having safely deposited your passengers and their property, you are to turn your attention to the accomplishment of a permanent peace between the Canzes and Osage nations; for which purpose you must effect a meeting between the head chiefs of those nations, and are to employ such arguments, deduced from their own obvious interests, as well as the inclinations, desires, and commands of the President of the United States, as may facilitate your purpose and accomplish the end.

A third object of considerable magnitude will then claim your consideration. It is to effect an interview and establish a good understanding with the Ya-i-tans, I-e-tans, or Cammanchees.

For this purpose you must interest Whitehair of the Grand Osage, with whom and a suitable deputation you will visit the Panis Republique, where you may find interpreters, and inform yourself of the most feasible plan by which to bring the Cammanchees to a conference. Should you succeed in this attempt (and no pains must be spared to effect it) you must endeavor to make peace between that distant powerful nation, and the nations which inhabit the country between us and them, particularly the Osage; and, finally, you will endeavor to induce eight or ten of their distinguished chiefs to make a visit to the seat of Government next September; and you may attach to this deputation four or five Panis, and the same number of Canzes chiefs. As your interview with the Cammanchees will probably lead you to the head branches of the Arkansas and Red River, you may find yourself approximated to the settlements of New Mexico, and, therefore, it will be necessary you should move with great circumspection, to keep clear of any hunting or reconnoitering parties from that province, and to prevent alarm or offence; because the affairs of Spain and the United States appear to be on the point of amicable adjustment; and, moreover, it is the desire of the President to cultivate the friendship and harmonious intercourse of all the nations of the earth, and particularly our neighbors the Spaniards.

In the course of your tour, you are to remark particularly upon the geographical structure, the natural history, and population of the country through which you may pass, taking particular care to collect and preserve specimens of every thing curious in the mineral or botanical worlds, which can be preserved and are portable. Let your course be regulated by your compass, and your distances by your watch, to be noted in a field-book; and I would advise you, when circumstances permit, to protract and lay down in a separate book the march of the day, at every evening's halt.

The instruments which I have furnished you will enable you to ascertain the variation of the magnetic needle and the latitude with exactitude; and at every remarkable point, I wish you to employ your telescope in observing the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites, having previously regulated and adjusted your watch by your quadrant, taking care to note with great nicety the periods of immersion and emersion of the eclipsed satellite. These observations may enable us, after your return, by application to the appropriate tables, which I cannot now furnish you, to ascertain the longitude.

It is an object of much interest with the Executive, to ascertain the direction, extent, and navigation of the Arkansas and Red River; as far, therefore, as may be compatible with these instructions, and practicable to the means you may command, I wish you to carry your views to those subjects, and, should circumstances conspire to favor the enterprise, that you may detach a party with a few Osages to descend the Arkansas under the orders of Lieutenant Wilkinson, or Sergeant Balling, properly instructed and equipped, to take the courses and distances, to remark on the soil, timber, &c. &c., and to note the tributary streams. This party will, after reaching our post on the Arkansas, descend to Fort Adams, and there wait further orders; and you, yourself, may descend the Red River, accompanied by a party of the most respectable Cammanchees, to the post of Natchitoches, and there receive further orders.

To disburse your necessary expenses, and to aid your negotiations, you are herewith furnished six hundred dollars' worth of goods, for the appropriation of which you are to render a strict account, vouched by documents to be attested by one of your party.

Wishing you a safe and successful expedition, I am, sir, with much respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Lieut. Z. M. PIKE.

Additional instructions to Lieutenant Pike.

SIR:

CANTONMENT, MISSOURI, July 12, 1805.

The health of the Osages being now generally restored, and all hopes of the speedy recovery of their prisoners from the hands of the Pattawatamies, being at an end, they have become desirous to commence their journey for their villages, you are, therefore, to proceed to-morrow.

In addition to the instructions given you on the 24th ultimo, I must request you to have the talks, under cover, delivered to White Hair and the Grand Peste, the chief of the Osage band, which is settled on the waters of the Arkansas, together with the belts which accompany them. You will also receive, herewith, a small belt for the Panis, and a large one for the I-e-tans or Cammanchees.

Should you find it necessary, you are to give orders to Mongrain, the resident interpreter at the Grand Osage, to attend you.

I beg you to take measures for the security and safe return of your boat from the Grand Osage to this place.

Doctor Robinson will accompany you as a volunteer. He will be furnished medicines, and for the accommodation which you give him he is bound to attend your sick.

Should you discover any unlicensed traders in your route, or any person from this Territory or from the United States, without a proper license or passport, you are to arrest such person or persons, and dispose of their property as the law directs.

My confidence in your caution and discretion has prevented my urging you to be vigilant in guarding against the stratagems and treachery of the Indians, holding yourself above alarm or surprise; the composition of your party, though it be small, will secure to you the respect of a host of untutored savages.

You are to communicate from the Grand Osage, and from every other practicable point, directly to the Secretary of War, transmitting your letters to this place under cover, to the commanding officer, or by any more convenient route.

I wish you health, and a successful and honorable enterprise, and am,

Yours, with friendship,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Lieut. Z. M. PIKE.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to General S. Smith, dated

FORT ADAMS, September 12, 1806.

At this moment thus stands the account between us and the Spaniards on the side of Texas: we dishonor the armies of Spain, and (as they allege) violate their territory, by forcing their advanced post, and compelling their officer to fall back many miles. (See General Dearborn's order to Porter.) In consequence, the Spaniard reinforces, advances, resumes his former ground, and braves us. We remonstrate and menace, but he keeps possession of the disputed tract. Is not the balance against us? It is, my friend, and I will restore what we have—I trust in Heaven without bloodshed; but at all events.

W.

GENERAL MORNING ORDERS.

HEAD-QUARTERS, CAMP LA PIEDRA,

26 miles from Natchitoches, October 28, 1806.

Parole.—C Sign.

The depending movement of the troops is not to seek an enemy, but to assert a right of sovereignty; this right is denied by the Spanish commander in our front, who has recently warned the general, that he considers his advance an act of hostility, which his orders compel him to resist. Whatever, then, may be the calculation or the result, the safety and honor of the corps and the national interests require that every individual attached to the expedition should move and act as if an engagement were certain and inevitable. We are obliged to wait the attack, and our opponents, being all mounted, may give or refuse themselves at their discretion; and, of consequence, will avail themselves of any advantage we may offer them.

The signal to prepare for action, when encamped, will be a gun from the left, on which every man who bears arms will take his place in the line, and the whole wait orders. The signal to form when under march, will be a gun from the front. The infantry, with their field pieces, will immediately form two lines with two hundred yards interval, and on the flanks of the road. Farrar's dragoons will retire by the road to the rear, and form column prepared to charge. Major Welch's mounted infantry will skirmish, and fall back on the right or left of the front line, as the ground and other circumstances may render most advantageous. The moment the signal is given, the rear guard, pioneers, and every man of the line are to join their corps, leaving their packs and teams in charge of Mr. Ragan and the engagees of the quartermaster's and contractor's departments. Should an attempt be made to turn our flanks, which is probable, the infantry will form the hollow square, and the artillery take post on the angles to enfilade the enemy with grape and canister. Major Welch's men to retire towards the rear, and endeavor to outflank our assailants; keeping up as quick and deadly a fire as possible. An officer to each division of the infantry will take post with the front rank; every other officer will be in the rear to see the men do not throw away their fire; and if one should be found so dastardly as to give back, to put him to instant death.

Under all circumstances, the artillery will receive orders when to fire; but the infantry, with shouldered arms, are to wait the approach of the enemy, until within forty yards, when the front rank is to present, level well, fire, and charge bayonet. If the enemy are not broken or staggered, the second rank are to take aim at their breasts, and when at fifteen yards are to pour in their fire, and, should they still come on, are to be received by both ranks with dauntless resolution on their bayonets. The dragoons are reserved for a critical effort, and will receive orders when and where to make it. The gentlemen will bear in mind that whatever may be the order of the charge, the instant they close with the enemy, the action will become pell-mell. They should be careful to level their blows at the neck, rather horizontally than perpendicularly, and in general to cut and pass from man to man.

The Spanish force is greatly superior, and all mounted, but is undisciplined. Their attack will be made in great disorder, and probably with velocity and an air of boldness; because they will depend more on noise and appearance than the solid shock. It will be our part to present a rampart of bayonets whenever attacked. Let the officers be attentive to their men, and the men be silent and obedient to their officers. Let each individual put confidence in his own strength and the co-operation of his flank files. Above all, let us avoid hurry, which always produces confusion; and superiority of numbers will serve but to augment our triumph and increase the honor of our arms.

X.

I arrived at Natchez about the 27th of October, from the Missouri, where I received a letter from General Wilkinson, dated Natchitoches, 23d October, 1806, directing me to despatch an express with a return of my detachment, and to fall down to Fort Adams, and take the command of that post. I arrived at Fort Adams about the 3d of November, and took command from Lieutenant Sevier; on my arrival, I found a Mr. Swartwout confined in the doctor's quarters, with a violent attack of the bilious fever. I was introduced to him, I think, by Dr. Davidson, who informed me that Mr. Swartwout had been to Natchitoches, and on his return to the mouth of Red River had been violently attacked and sent up to the garrison for medical aid; that he had gone down to see him, and found him in a dreadful humor, and had advised his embarking on board a barge which was ascending to the fort, where he could be more comfortably situated, and have his constant attendance. On the 12th I received letter No. 1, hereunto attached, dated Natchitoches, 6th of November; this was handed me by Lieutenant Graham, who informed me of the termination of the expedition to the Sabine, and that the troops were then on their return. Letter No. 2, hereunto attached, informed me of the return of the general to Natchez, which created some anxiety in my mind, in consequence of the orders exacting secrecy and ordering boats for the movement of all the military stores from Fort Adams. On the 15th, several of the officers arrived from Natchitoches and visited their families, who were all at a loss to account for the rapid movement of the troops from Natchitoches to New Orleans, and the embarkation of the military ordnance stores at Fort Adams confirmed us in the belief that danger was apprehended from some quarter, and that New Orleans must be the point of attack. We continued in this situation until the morning of the 18th, when the general arrived and requested me to walk with him to the battery, where he communicated to me the designs of Colonel Burr, informing me that he had received several letters from Colonel Burr, through one of his agents, (Mr. Swartwout,) and that Burr's principal attack would be upon New Orleans. I was never more astonished, not having heard that any suspicions were entertained against him; I informed the general the situation in which I found Mr. Swartwout on my arrival, and requested leave to arrest him. The general refused, saying that he expected to get much more out of him; that he had held out to Swartwout the idea of his not opposing Colonel Burr, and he should assemble his whole force at New Orleans, to enable him to defend that place and defeat the whole plan. I was directed to continue my civilities as before, for fear that Mr. Swartwout might get alarmed at the movement of the troops and military stores. On the 19th I received orders to proceed with my command to Natchez, with instructions to take the necessary measures to ascertain the approach of a body of armed men from the Ohio country, and to give the general the earliest information by express, of every movement from that quarter, either at Natchez, or by sending a confidential party up the river above the Yazoo, in the disguise of hunters; and I accordingly communicated regularly every information I could collect. About the last of December I saw two letters, one from the Postmaster of Nashville to Henry Turner of Natchez, dated the 13th of December, stating that Colonel Burr was then in Nashville, and that he meant to proceed on the 20th to the mouth of Cumberland, where, report said, he would have assembled from five to eight thousand men, and that it was generally believed that he intended a visit to Mexico. The other letter to a Mr. Wood from Nashville, spoke of Colonel Burr's being in Nashville; that two of his proselytes had left town that morning for New Orleans by land; from the best of my recollection the above statement of the letters to Turner and Wood is correct, and Colonel Burr's arrival very daily expected by all persons at Natchez. For my own part, I did not doubt it; and considering this information as all important to the general, I proceeded for New Orleans, arrived there on the 2d January, and communicated it to him. Soon after, this information was corroborated by the arrival of Bradford, the printer of the Gazette d'Orleans.

GEORGE PETER.

COUNTY OF WASHINGTON, scilicet.

On this 19th day of September, 1807, George Peter came before me, a justice of the peace for the county aforesaid, and made oath on the Holy Evangely of Almighty God, that the facts stated in the foregoing are true as stated.

Extract of a letter from Leonard Covington to General Wilkinson.

MAY 15, 1807.

You well know how much has been said and insinuated about the memorable ciphered letter, handed you by Swartwout, and of the means by which you unlocked the cipher; and although this circumstance has never been explained by yourself or the administration, and has been seized upon by your enemies as matter for crimination and ground for suspicion, yet I have never been at a loss, in my own mind, for the satisfactory explanation. You may not, perhaps, recollect, that in the year 1794, when I left the Western country, [army,] that you requested me to interchange with you a cipher for the purpose of corresponding thereby; and at the time you informed me that you had practised that method with many of your friends. This circumstance coming to my recollection, I have examined amongst my old papers, and found the cipher, which is at your service, if it, and the circumstances connected therewith, can in any way advantage you. Pray snatch one moment, if possible, and let your friends here know how you feel and are situated, &c. &c. Your favors by Mr. J. Johnson all came safely to hand, and have warmed the feelings of your friends in this quarter. I pray God to keep you in his holy protection, and that he may make thine enemies thy footstool; farewell.

L. COVINGTON.

Gen. JAMES WILKINSON.

Z.

DEAR SIR:

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1807.

I had intended yesterday to recommend to General Dearborn the writing to you weekly by post, to convey information of our western affairs as long as they are interesting; because it is possible, though not probable, you might sometimes get the information quicker this way than down the river; but the general received yesterday information of the death of his son in the East Indies, and, of course, cannot now attend to business. I therefore write you a hasty line for the present week, and send it in duplicate by the Athens and the Nashville routes.

The information in the enclosed paper as to proceedings in the State of Ohio is correct. Blannerhasset's flotilla of fifteen boats and two hundred barrels of provisions is seized, and there can be no doubt that Tyler's flotilla is also taken, because on the 17th December we know there was a sufficient force assembled at Cincinnati to intercept it there, and another party was in pursuit of it on the river above. We are assured that these two flotillas composed the whole of the boats provided. Blannerhasset and Tyler had fled down the river. I do not believe that the number of persons engaged for Burr has ever amounted to five hundred, though some have carried them to one thousand or thirteen hundred. A part of these were engaged as settlers of Bastrop's land, but the greater part were engaged under the express assurance that the projected enterprise was against Mexico, and secretly authorized by this Government. Many were expressly enlisted in the name of the United States. The proclamation which reached Pittsburg, December 2, and the other parts of the river successively, undeceived both these classes, and of course drew them off; and I have never seen any proof of their having assembled more than forty men in two boats from Beaver, fifty in Tyler's flotilla, and the boatmen of Blannerhasset's. I believe, therefore, that the enterprise may be considered as crushed; but we are not to relax in our attentions until we hear what has passed at Louisville. If every thing from that place upwards be successfully arrested, there is nothing from below that [is] to be feared. Be assured that Tennessee, and particularly General Jackson, are faithful. The orders lodged at Massac and the Chickasaw Bluffs will probably secure the interception of such fugitives from justice as may escape from Louisville, so that I think you will never see one of them. Still I would not wish, till we hear from Louisville, that this information should relax your preparations in the least, except so far as to dispense with the militia of Mississippi and Orleans leaving their homes, under our orders of November 25. Only let them consider themselves under requisition, and be in a state of readiness, should any force too great for your regulars, escape down the river. You will have been sensible, that those orders were given while we supposed you were on the Sabine, and the supposed crisis did not admit the formality of their being passed through you. We had considered Fort Adams as the place to make a stand, because it covered the mouth of Red River. You have preferred New Orleans on the apprehension of a fleet from the West Indies. Be assured there is not any foundation for such an expectation, but the lying exaggerations of these traitors to impose on others and swell their pretended means. The very man whom they represented to you as gone to Jamaica and to bring the fleet, has never been from home, and has regularly communicated to me every thing which passed between Burr and him. No such proposition was ever hazarded to him. France or Spain would not send a fleet to take Vera Cruz; and though one of the expeditions, now near arriving from England, is probably for Vera Cruz, and perhaps already there, yet the state of things between us renders it impossible they should countenance an enterprise unauthorized by us. Still I repeat that these grounds of security must not stop our proceedings or preparations, until they are further confirmed. Go on, therefore, with your works for the defence of New Orleans, because they will always be useful, only looking to what should be permanent, rather than means merely temporary. You may expect further information as we receive it; and though I expect it will be such as will place us at our ease, yet we must not place ourselves so, until we be certain, but act on the possibility that the resources of our enemy may be greater and deeper than we are yet informed of.

Your two confidential messengers delivered their charges safely. One arrived yesterday only, with your letter of November 12. The oral communications he made me are truly important. I beseech you to take the most special care of the two letters which he mentioned to me—the one in cipher, the other from another of the conspirators of high standing, and send them to me by the first conveyance you can trust. It is necessary that all important testimony should be brought to one centre, in order that the guilty may be convicted, and the innocent left untroubled. Accept my friendly salutations and assurances of great esteem and respect.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Evidence of Gabriel G. Van Horne.

THURSDAY, October 1.

Witness. I was at the Chickasaw Bluffs at the time of Colonel Burr's descent down the river. On the 4th day of January, 1807, Lieutenant Jacob Jackson came to the United States' factory at Fort Pickering, accompanied by a gentleman, whom he introduced to Thomas Peterkin, United States' factor, Peter Morgan and myself clerks to said factory, as Colonel Aaron Burr. After some conversation, Colonel Burr and Lieutenant Jackson left the factory, and went to the garrison. Shortly after, one of the soldiers of the garrison came to the factory with an order signed A. Burr, for thirty pounds' weight of lead; twenty-eight pounds were delivered to the soldier. In the space of about four hours the same soldier returned to the factory with a number of musket balls in his hat, saying he wanted to have them weighed, to know how much the original quantity had lost in running the balls. After his having them weighed, he took them away in his hat. In the course of the day, some boats came to the Bluffs, and the men came up to the factory. Colonel Burr requested Mr. Peterkin to let the men have goods, and he would pay for them. Colonel Burr was frequently at the factory in the course of the day, and often had conversations with Mr. Peterkin.

In the evening, Mr. Peterkin, Mr. Morgan, and myself went to the garrison, where we found Colonel Burr. I took notice that Colonel Burr was frequently called to the door by the men that had arrived in the boats, to have private conversation with them. Lieutenant Jackson asked Colonel Burr when Mr. Blannerhasset would be there? to which Colonel Burr replied, that he was then floating by, and could not land his boat. In the morning Colonel Burr came to the factory, and demanded a bill for the articles which his men had got the day before. The bill was made out, amounting to sixty or seventy dollars, which he paid. The only articles I can remember were the lead, three dozen tomahawks, and three bear skins. After paying the bill, Colonel Burr departed, and I saw him no more.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Burr. What kind of tomahawks were these; were they intended for war or for more peaceable purposes?
Answer. They were such as were generally used for shingling.

Mr. McRae. Would they do well for fighting? Answer. They would answer very well.

Evidence of George Poindexter, Esq.

Mr. Hay. Is this the original agreement entered into between Cowles Meade, acting Governor of the Mississippi Territory, and Aaron Burr?

Answer. Yes. If it is proper, sir, I will state the circumstances which led to the agreement, and Col. Burr's surrender to the civil authority of the Mississippi Territory.

Chief Justice. Proceed, sir.

Witness. On the day preceding the date of this agreement, I was appointed by the Hon. Cowles Meade, then the acting Governor of the Mississippi Territory, an honorary aid-de-camp, for the express purpose of visiting Colonel Burr at the boats near the mouth of Bayou Pierre, on the western margin of the river Mississippi; which I did in company with Major William B. Shields. The object of this visit was to gain correct information as to the situation of Burr; to ascertain his views so far as he would communicate them, and to procure his pacific surrender to the civil authority. We were accompanied by a Mr. Ralston, one of Burr's party, who had called on Judge Rodney to give his deposition. We arrived that night at Judge Bruin's, who resides near the mouth of Bayou Pierre. The next morning we proceeded down the river till we came opposite to Colonel Burr's boats, and Ralston gave a signal for a boat, which was immediately sent over for us. Before we embarked we were joined by Colonel Thomas Fitzpatrick. Several persons, then unknown to me, but whose names I have since understood, came on horseback to the bank of the river, and crossed with us. I supposed them to be agents, sent by Burr into the country, to collect information respecting the public sentiment concerning him, and to induce the citizens to believe his plans were laudable, and sanctioned by Government. When we reached the western bank of the river, we were met by Colonel Burr, to whom Major Shields handed a letter of which he was the bearer from Mr. Meade, acquainting Colonel Burr with the object of our visit. In the letter there was a sentence relating to the restoration of tranquillity in the Territory, which sentence Burr repeated once or twice with a sneer, adding, that "he had no intention to injure the citizens of the United States." Colonel Burr then expressed himself to this effect: "As to any projects or plans which may have been formed between General Wilkinson and myself heretofore, they are now completely frustrated by the perfidious conduct of Wilkinson, and the world must pronounce him a perfidious villain." Burr, also, in speaking of Wilkinson, said: "If I am sacrificed, my portfolio will prove him to be a villain." He further stated, that so far from having any designs hostile to the citizens of the United States, he had intended to have met Mr. Meade at Gibson Port on the day of a general muster, which happened at that place about the time of his arrival at Bayou Pierre, but was deterred from doing so, by a belief that he would be assassinated were he seen passing through the Territory. He then pointed to his boats, and asked if there was any thing military in their appearance. I told him it was true his men did not appear to be armed, but they were just such persons as I should expect to see about a camp; they did not seem to be in a situation to settle themselves on farms. I also remarked to Colonel Burr, that I had no hesitation in giving him the most perfect assurance of personal safety while in the Territory, until he should be disposed of according to the laws of his country; that the object of Mr. Meade in calling out the militia was to preserve inviolate the laws and constitution of the United States; that if that object could be secured without the employment of force, it would be preferable; but assured him that force would be used, if necessary, for which purpose the militia were then on their march to arrest his progress. Colonel Burr declared his willingness to submit to the civil authority, and proposed that an interview should take place between himself and the acting Governor on the next day, at some convenient place in the Territory; that we should guaranty his person from actual violence in the mean time, and restore him to his boats, if Mr. Meade should not accept his surrender to the civil authority; that his boats and people should keep the position they then occupied, until after the proposed interview took place; and that in the mean time, his people (as he called them) should commit no breach of the peace, nor violate any law of the United States or of the Mississippi Territory. The place designated at which Colonel Burr should meet the Executive was the house of Thomas Calvit, a respectable citizen of the Mississippi Territory, who resides near the mouth of Cole's creek, where the detachment of militia which had ascended the river were stationed. The substance of these propositions was committed to writing at the request of Colonel Burr, and copies interchanged. The copy given to Colonel Burr is in the hand-writing of Major Shields; and that which remained in our possession is in the hand-writing of Colonel Burr, subscribed by him in my presence, and also by the witness, Colonel Thomas Fitzpatrick. Colonel Burr, according to stipulation, descended the river on the 17th day of January last, (the day after the agreement was entered into,) as far as the mouth of Cole's creek, in company with Colonel Fitzpatrick, who directed him to be taken in charge by Captain Davidson's company of dragoons, and conducted to the house of Mr. Calvit. In a short time after Colonel Burr's arrival, Mr. Meade and himself commenced a conversation on the subject of his surrender to the civil authority of the Territory. I do not know every thing that passed between them, but understood the following terms were offered to Colonel Burr by Mr. Meade: 1. That the agreement entered into for the purpose of procuring that interview should be declared void. 2. That Burr should surrender himself unconditionally to the civil authority, and proceed directly to the town of Washington. 3. That his boats should be searched, and all military apparatus found on board of them to be disposed of as the Executive should think fit. To these terms Mr. Meade required Colonel Burr's unequivocal reply, as I understood, in fifteen minutes; and if not agreed to, Burr was to be instantly returned to his boats, and the militia ordered to seize the whole party by force. The terms were agreed to, and carried into effect. Colonel Burr declared himself unwilling to fall into the power of General Wilkinson, and requested, if any attempt should be made to seize him by a military force from New Orleans, that it might be opposed. I was myself of opinion that General Wilkinson would make no such attempt, as it would tend to subvert the laws and constitution of the United States, and also the municipal regulations of the Territory. Had such an effort been made while Mr. Meade was the acting Governor, I have reason to believe that he would have maintained the empire of the law and the rights of the civil authority by force, if necessary. Major Shields and myself attended Colonel Burr to the town of Washington, where he was delivered over to the custody of the law, and the examination of the witnesses immediately commenced before Judge Rodney. A committee of five gentlemen, as well as I recollect, was appointed to examine the boats, who proceeded up the river for that purpose, and, I believe, made their report to the Executive.

I was then called on in my official capacity as attorney general to give a written opinion as to the course which ought to be pursued with Colonel Burr. I did so, and that opinion, I believe, was filed in the office of the Secretary of the Mississippi Territory. My opinion was, that we had no evidence to convict Colonel Burr of any offence in the Mississippi Territory; that the supreme court of the Territory to which a jury was about to be summoned, had no original jurisdiction of any prosecution, and could only take cognizance of points of law reserved at the trial in the circuit court; that, therefore, Burr ought to be sent under a sufficient guard, directed to the city of Washington, where the Supreme Court of the United States would be in session, and the judges attending from every part of the Union could direct the accused to be tried in the district where from the evidence it might appear that an overt act of treason had been committed. But Judge Rodney thought differently, and a venire facias was issued, requiring the attendance of seventy-six jurors at an adjourned session of the supreme court of the Mississippi Territory held in February last. From the number of jurors attending, a grand jury of twenty-three persons was selected, who received a charge from Judge Rodney, and adjourned until the next day. At the meeting of the court the next morning, I moved to discharge the grand jury; 1st, Because the court did not possess original jurisdiction in any case; 2d, Because the depositions submitted to my inspection did not furnish sufficient evidence to convict Colonel Burr of the offences with which he was charged, so as to bring them within the Mississippi Territory; 3d, That a warrant might issue, transmitting the accused to a court having competent jurisdiction to try and punish him, if guilty of the crimes alleged against him. The court being divided on this motion, it was overruled. The grand jury then retired. I determined to prefer no indictment, and left the court. In the evening, while I was engaged in the Legislature, a message was sent me by the court requesting my attendance. I immediately repaired to the court-room, and was desired to look at the presentments of the grand jury. I perused them, and found that the grand jury had presented the acting Governor for calling out the militia—the manner in which Colonel Burr had surrendered to the civil authority—the proceedings at New Orleans; and I believe the General Government itself did not escape. I felt and declared my astonishment at such unwarrantable proceedings, and informed the court that I should take no further notice of the presentments, and retired. Judge Rodney, I believe, likewise censured the conduct of the grand jury. It may be proper to mention that a respectable proportion of the jury withheld their signatures from those presentments. Colonel Burr that evening went to the house of Colonel Osmun, and disappeared. I afterwards attended the court, and had a judgment nisi entered on the recognizance given by Colonel Burr and his securities, Lyman, Harding, and Benajah Osmun; a scire facias was issued and served on the securities, which is now depending before the supreme court of the Mississippi Territory. What happened after Colonel Burr withdrew I know not, except from hearsay.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Martin. Have you a copy of the recognizance said to have been entered into by Colonel Burr?

Answer. I have not, but have seen a copy in the hands of Mr. Hay.

Question. Were you present when it was executed? Answer. No.

Mr. Martin. You said that the judges ordered seventy-six jurors to be summoned. Who were the judges?

Answer. Bruin and Rodney.

Mr. Wickham. Do you know any thing of military men sent from New Orleans to seize Colonel Burr?

Answer. I understood that there were, and that a Dr. Carmichael, who resides in the Mississippi Territory, was one.

Question. Was there an expectation in that part of the country that General Wilkinson had sent men for that purpose, and that Colonel Burr would be seized?

Answer. It was talked of, and generally disapproved.

Question. Where was Colonel Burr at the time of his entering into the convention on the west side of the Mississippi?

Answer. He was in the Territory of Orleans, and, in pursuance of his agreement, came over to the Mississippi Territory.

Question. Did Colonel Burr seem to be apprehensive of military force?

Answer. He did not, except that he was particularly unwilling to fall into the hands of General Wilkinson. He inquired of Colonel Fitzpatrick, Major Shields, and myself, whether there was any pass or way above Natchez through which he could get to Washita, and wished to know whether there was any person who could be employed to pilot him. We gave him no satisfactory answer on the subject. My own impression was, that he wanted to establish himself on the Washita as a place of rendezvous, to which his men might rally.

Question. Have you understood that an officer of the army was sent by General Wilkinson to take Colonel Burr?

Answer. I heard a lieutenant of the army (but I had rather not mention his name) say that he was one of the persons employed for that purpose.

[Here Mr. Hay offered to read the recognizance entered into by Colonel Burr in the Mississippi Territory.]

Mr. Martin objected to its being read, and declared it to be a forgery. He said he was willing to answer the consequences to Judge Rodney, and to give it under his hand that it was a forgery.

Mr. Hay. Judge Rodney is so near, Mr. Martin, that you can answer for it with perfect safety.

Mr. Poindexter. Mr. Harding, one of the securities in the recognizance, said that the recognizance returned by Judge Rodney was not the one entered into by Colonel Burr, Mr. Osmun, and himself. But I do not think it was believed by one honest man in the Territory.

Mr. Hay. Did the paper, of which this is an authentic copy, bear any mark of erasure?

Answer. Not that I recollect. It was in the usual form in which Judge Rodney took other recognizances; that the person bound should attend from day to day, until discharged by the court. The recognizances of Blannerhas-set and others, taken on the same occasion, were in the same form. Judge Rodney informed me that Mr. Harding sat down to draw the recognizance, and, after beginning it, said it was useless to go through with it; that they would acknowledge themselves bound before him, and he might make out the recognizance in due form at his leisure.

Mr. Wickham. Then you understood Mr. Rodney to say that the recognizance was not reduced to writing until the departure of Colonel Burr from his presence?

Answer. I so understood him.

Question. Then it was no recognizance at all? Answer. That is a question of law.

Mr. Hay. As something has been said about Mr. Rodney, what is his general character?

Answer. One of the most honest men under heaven, and an old revolutionary patriot.

Mr. Hay. And this is the man who has been charged with forgery by Mr. Martin!

Mr. Martin. Let him be who he will, I charge him with having returned a different recognizance from that which was entered into before him.

FRIDAY, October 2.

Mr. Poindexter was again called, and further examined.

Colonel Burr. Do you recollect whether it was one of the stipulations between Mr. Meade and me that military authority should be laid aside?

Answer. You were not required to surrender yourself a prisoner of war, but you surrendered unconditionally to the civil authority.

Question. Did not Mr. Meade promise to disuse all military authority as to me?

Answer. I do not recollect to have heard Mr. Meade say any such thing.

Question. Did you not hear Mr. Meade felicitate me on my fortunate escape from a party who were armed with knives and tomahawks for the purpose of coming on board my boat and massacring me?

Answer. I was not present at any such felicitation.

Question. Had Mr. Meade in his possession any document which would authorize him to issue any civil process against me?

Answer. Mr. Meade was an executive officer, and could not issue a civil process in any case.

Question. Did not Mr. Meade declare to me that there was not any document in the Territory to authorize the issuing of civil process against me?

Answer. I do not recollect to have heard any such declaration.

Question. Had Judge Rodney any document before him that would authorize the issuing such process?

Answer. That is a matter of opinion. There were sundry depositions in his possession, some of which were given by persons belonging to your party; many of whom voluntarily came forward and had their own depositions taken, in order to induce a belief that they had forsaken you. That was the general impression, as it appeared to me, and I believe it to be the fact. In those depositions they stated nothing of importance against you.

Question. Were not some persons seized by military force, and brought before Judge Rodney?

Answer. Not after your surrender to the civil authority, until the discovery of a paper which was said to have been taken out of the cape of a negro boy's coat. There was then some seizures at Natchez, by order of the Executive; and the persons seized were detained under a guard a short time, but whether they were brought before Judge Rodney or not I do not know.

Here Mr. Poindexter observed: One circumstance I omitted to mention yesterday which took place at the time when I visited Burr's boats. A boat commanded by a Lieutenant Paterson of the militia, with between twenty and thirty armed men, landed about two hundred yards below, on the west side of the Mississippi, for the purpose of ambuscading the men of Burr's party who were separated from their boats, and were amusing themselves in the woods. A person whom I did not know at that time, but whom I have since found to be Davis Floyd, approached Col. Burr, and asked him what was to be done; saying that a boat had landed a short distance below on the same side of the river; that he was not afraid to attack the boat, provided such were his directions. Col. Burr immediately requested Col. Fitzpatrick to interfere to prevent any attack from the boat; which he immediately did, and directed the lieutenant to return with his men to the mouth of Cole's creek.

Colonel Burr. Did you not hear Mr. Meade say that if Wilkinson should attempt to arrest me by military force, he would join me with the militia to prevent it?

Answer. I never did; but I remember Mr. Meade said that he would not permit any military force to come into the Territory, and arrest you out of the hands of the civil authority, if he could prevent it. He kept some militia in readiness for the purpose of supporting the civil authority, and acting as circumstances might direct. We were of opinion that a majority of the people who were about the court-house at Washington at the time the grand jury made their presentments were the friends of Burr, consisted generally of persons who had come promiscuously into the Territory, and it was supposed would interfere to rescue him, if necessary. My own impression was, and I believe it was the general impression, that he wished the force immediately about himself to cut a diminutive figure, while a majority of his adherents were dispersed over the country for the purpose of making favorable impressions on the people concerning him.

Mr. Hay here produced the papers said to have been found in the cape of the negro boy's coat, which paper is in the following words: "If you are yet together, keep together, and I will join you to-morrow night. In the mean time, put all your arms in perfect order. Ask the bearer no questions, but tell him all you may think I wish to know. He does not know that this is from me, nor where I am." Directed to C. T. and D. F.

Mr. Hay asked Mr. Poindexter if that was the original paper said to have been found in the cape of the negro boy's coat. He answered yes.

Mr. Hay. Who were supposed to be meant by C. T. and D. F.?

Answer. Comfort Tyler and Davis Floyd.

Question. Is that paper in the hand-writing of Col. Burr? Answer. I believe it is.

Mr. Wickham. Where did you first see that paper? Answer. In the hands of Governor Williams.

Col. Burr. How long were the persons who were seized at Natchez, after that note was found, detained in custody?

Answer. I do not recollect how long, particularly; but one or two days, I believe. Many of the young men arrested at Natchez declared that if Burr's designs were against the Government of the United States, they would be the first men to turn against him, and cut his throat. There are a number of them now remaining in the Territory; for he has supplied us with schoolmasters, singingmasters, dancingmasters, and doctors in abundance.

Mr. Hay. Where was Colonel Burr at the time when this paper was found?

Answer. He had disappeared, and was generally supposed to be at a Doctor Cumming's, near Gibson Port.

The undersigned certifies that the foregoing is a true statement of his evidence, as given in open court in the examination, on a motion to commit Aaron Burr, on a charge of treason against the United States.

OCTOBER 13, 1807.

GEORGE POINDEXTER.

Evidence of Major James Bruff.

TUESDAY, October 6.

Mr. Martin. Had you any communications with General Wilkinson about the time of his return to St. Louis?

Mr. Hay requested that the object for which the witness was introduced should be stated.

Mr. Martin said it was to prove the same as Timothy Kibby; that General Wilkinson held out the same inducement to him to join in an expedition against the Spaniards.

Mr. Hay objected to the introduction of the testimony on principle; he said that no man could be presumed to come prepared to explain every particular act of his life; that the general reputation of a witness could alone be inquired into, in order to assail his character. This he held to be a sacred rule of law and of justice.

Mr. Martin contended that the evidence was pertinent. General Wilkinson had declared that he had no knowledge of Colonel Burr's views till he had received the ciphered letter; we will prove that he had. He did not mean to say that the views of Colonel Burr were criminal; on the contrary, they were perfectly innocent; nor would General Wilkinson have been guilty if he had joined in them; but now General Wilkinson, in order to obtain favor with the Government, had turned traitor to Colonel Burr.

Mr. Wickham argued that the testimony of Major Bruff was admissible, to show an inconsistency in that of General Wilkinson.

General Wilkinson. May I be permitted to make one observation? I am not in the smallest degree surprised at the language which has, upon this and several other occasions, been used by the counsel of Colonel Burr—men who are hired to misrepresent.

Mr. Wickham. I will not submit to such language from any man in court.

The Chief Justice declared the style of General Wilkinson to be improper, and that he had heard too much of such language in court.

[General Wilkinson apologized. He said that it was impossible he could offer any intentional disrespect to the court, but he could not remain silent when he heard himself called a traitor.]

General Wilkinson proceeded: I am astonished at the explanation of the objects for which this witness is called; had I known the purpose for which he volunteered his services, (for he was not summoned,) I should have been able to produce documents to show the long, the implacable hatred which he has borne towards me.

Mr. Wickham said that Major Bruff was under the protection of the court.

General Wilkinson. I pray that his testimony may be introduced.

Mr. Hay observed that he had no doubt of the law, as to the right to impeach the credibility of a witness by showing an inconsistency in his testimony; he admitted that, if Major Bruff's evidence were introduced for that purpose, it was proper; but if for any other purpose, it was improper. They had no right to interrogate him for the purpose avowed by Mr. Martin; to show that General Wilkinson entertained the same views as Colonel Burr. However, as General Wilkinson was content that Major Bruff should proceed, he would not object.

The Chief Justice declared that he would not hear the witness as to any particular allegations against General Wilkinson; but with respect to any inconsistency in his testimony he must hear him.

Major Bruff proceeded: My testimony will arise from a number of conversations with General Wilkinson.

In four of these conversations General Wilkinson took me aside; in three of which he locked me up in his room. The first hint I had of a connexion between General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr was drawn from two paragraphs in Kentucky newspapers, in the spring of 1805, before General Wilkinson reached St. Louis: the first alluded to the old plan to form a separate Government west of the Allegany, and ascribed it to General Wilkinson and associates, and doubting whether that scheme had yet been abandoned; the next was an extract of a letter from Fort Massac, published in the papers, which stated that Colonel Burr had been several days there with General Wilkinson, probably giving the general lessons on government, or digesting a new code or constitution for the Government of Louisiana. These hints, with information received from Captain Stoddard immediately from Fort Massac, and who assured me that Colonel Burr had been there several days, closely engaged with General Wilkinson, and that he had or was about to furnish him with a barge and crew, in which he was to descend the Mississippi to New Orleans—

Mr. Wirt. You have not said when.

Witness. In June, 1805. These circumstances put me on my guard, and determined me to watch the motions of General Wilkinson and Burr.

As the general approached St. Louis, ascending the Mississippi from Fort Massac, he despatched a light barge ahead, with directions for me to meet him six or eight miles below, as he had something to communicate to me. I obeyed. We met, landed, and ascended the bank; the general took me into the woods. As we walked on, the general observed that he had been informed the Territory was divided by parties, (I mean Upper Louisiana,) which he attributed to the Americans, and said he would crush party, or perish in the attempt; I observed that there had been some party business about the time of the French convention and the memorials to Congress, but none since, except the aversion which the French appeared to have to the expense, delay, and uncertainty of our laws, and the introduction of lawyers. He then asked me how I stood with the French inhabitants, for he had heard there was some misunderstanding or coolness between us, occasioned by my observations about antedated concessions and fraudulent grants; I observed that some uneasiness had been excited by a report which I had made to the Secretary of War respecting private surveys which took in public property, but I believed they were then satisfied I had merely done my duty; he observed that he had witnessed their many attempts in the lower country to defraud the public, (the Orleans or Mississippi Territory, I do not know which;) that he knew them and mankind generally, and, if I would place my dependence on him, he would manage them for me.

Mr. Hay. He would manage them for you?

Answer. Yes; it alluded to a difference between me and the French. About this time, some Frenchmen from St. Louis had found us out, and were rushing through the bushes on us; he damned them for their intrusion—[Mr. Hay. To their faces? Answer. No, to me]—said he had something of importance to communicate, and hoped to have an opportunity there; but that he would take the first opportunity, after he had got settled, of making an important communication. A day or two after his arrival at St. Louis, his orderly came to me; I attended. I was taken into his parlor, and he locked the door.

Mr. McRae. What time? Answer. About the last of June, or the first or second day of July.

Question. Can you name the day? Answer. I cannot.

General Wilkinson. Can you come within five days?

Answer. No, I cannot. We commenced walking. The general appeared to be ruminating, and, after two or three turns, he asked me what sort of Government would suit Louisiana. Without hesitation, I replied a representative republic would meet both the wishes and expectations of the people. He answered that he was surprised to hear me say so, for the French could not understand its principles, or be brought to attend elections; that the American inhabitants were a turbulent set, the mere emptyings of jails, or fugitives from justice, and did not deserve a free Government; that a military Government was best for these people, and no other was contemplated for them.

[Here Mr. Hay, observing that Major Bruff retired to a table on which several papers were laid, asked him when he had made the statement of his testimony which he was then giving. On being answered that it was recently done, and since his arrival here, Mr. Hay requested that he would not again look at it; Major Bruff said that his statement was drawn from a number of letters which he had written to his friends about the time of the transactions alluded to, and from an intended publication against the general.]

That the politics of the United States had undergone a great change; that the honest and wise had united to save the federal constitution, and prevent a division of property, which the democrats aimed at; that the democratic party in Congress had split and dwindled; and that John Randolph, Nicholson, and Leib had lost all their influence both in Congress and with the Executive. I observed that he attributed principles and motives to the republicans which they abhorred.

Mr. Hay. To which party do you belong? Answer. To the democratic.

Mr. Martin. Were you not then a democrat, and did not General Wilkinson know you to belong to that party?

Answer. Yes.

On this subject we had a good deal of conversation. I remarked on the folly to suppose John Randolph would consent to throw his property into the public stock, in order to have a scramble for a part of it. However, the general observed that the object of the democrats was to produce a state of anarchy and confusion; to seize on the property of the federalists, and divide it among themselves; and this, too, he told me with a very serious face. I will make one observation here: it is that these conversations, which I had with the general, were at different times, and it is possible that I may not have classed them precisely in point of time; but I am certain that they did happen, and nearly as I have stated; and, if the general will be candid, he will acknowledge it.

General Wilkinson. Indeed, I will not.

He said that Pennsylvania was convulsed by the democrats; yet they would not succeed in turning out McKean, or introducing their arbitration system. I think that this ended the conversation. We got warm; the general threw open the door, and I walked out.

After dinner his orderly came for me again. I attended; was taken into his room, and the door fastened. He assumed a milder manner; and assured me that the politics not only of the United States, but of the Executive, had changed; that the difference between the present and former administration was merely in name; that parties were kept alive by the cunning, in order to help them to office, or to keep them in; that the people mistook the character of Mr. Jefferson; that a want of energy was no part of it, but rather obstinacy. Here he observed that the French had not been enough attended to in the Territorial appointments; that they were the natives, and the Americans were ungrateful intruders, and now railed against a King and Government which had raised them from ashes.

Mr. Wirt. To whom did he allude?

Answer. I considered that he pointed his remarks to Mr. Austin particularly. It was the Spanish King and Government to which I alluded.

He then observed that Governor Claiborne (a miserable thing or tool) had distributed the appointments, in the lower country, among his American followers and dependants, and had neglected the French, for which he was execrated, despised, and forsaken by every person of talents and honor, except by a Dr. Watkins, who, no doubt, had some personal views. I observed that, in the lower country, the great body of the people were French; but that, in the upper country, there were more than two Americans for one Frenchman, and that the disproportion increased daily by emigration, and would soon entitle us to elections. He replied, God forbid that you should ever see an election in Louisiana; and then observed that it was the intention of the Government to depopulate that country, except the villages of St. Louis, St. Geneva, and St. Charles, and a small district of country around each, merely sufficient to support them; that land would be offered to the inhabitants on the east side of the Mississippi, which if they refused to move to, they would be pushed over at the point of the bayonet, and that I should be employed in that business. As I found that my replies only irritated the general, and kept back the important communications, I therefore determined, when I could not acquiesce in sentiment with the general, I would endeavor to be silent till I got the important secret; but I found I had already gone too far. The general appeared to be vexed and disappointed, threw open the door, and I walked out.

The next morning his orderly came for me again. I attended; and we had another parlor conversation with closed doors. He assumed a friendly manner, and begged me to recollect that it was some time since I had left the Atlantic States; and assured me that public opinion had undergone a great change in favor of energetic Governments and measures; that, if I persisted in exploded notions, they would injure me with my Government; that democratic notions produced licentiousness; and that the very existence of an army and democracy was incompatible; that republics were ungrateful; jealous of armies and military merit; and made no provision for the superannuated and worn out officers, but who were left to starve. In these latter opinions I agreed with him. The general seemed pleased that I should assent to any of his opinions. He was now silent. While we walked the floor one or two turns, with his eyes down on the floor, and seemed to be musing, he, observed that he was fertile in schemes, and had made fortunes for many who did not then thank him for it. I smiled. He said, perhaps you think I had better have made my own fortune; true, but I have now a grand scheme in contemplation, that will not only make my fortune, but the fortunes of all concerned. He paused, as if waiting for my answer. I was silent; had nothing to say; but wanted him to explain and go into the detail. After walking the floor several times, during which he appeared much agitated and vexed, he threw open the door and I walked out, with only this glimpse of the secret which he had so long been preparing for me.

As I attended daily for orders until the arrival of Colonel Cushing, the next morning I found the general rather distant and reserved. He observed that he had yet enemies in the army, and, among them, some from his own State; that he either hated or loved Marylanders more than others. Presuming this intended for me, I replied, I suppose you take me for a Marylander? Why, are you not? I answered, no. I was born in Jersey, but had the good luck to be brought young to Maryland, of which State my father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were natives. Born in Jersey! (replied the general,) a second cousin to a Yankee; a damned cunning fellow, I suspect. This was the first rude thing he had said to me; for before this I was treated with respect, and had received many friendly letters from him; I therefore attributed this to my declining to join him in his scheme to make fortunes. Some time after the troops removed to Cold Water, an officer informed me that they were encamped on a low, damp bottom, subject to be overflowed—

[Mr. Hay objected to the course of the testimony pursued by the witness.

Colonel Burr said that he did not know the whole extent of his testimony, but that he had been introduced to show palpable contradictions in the evidence of General Wilkinson.]—

The Missouri on the one side, and a marsh or bog on the other, and the whole cantonment commanded by a high second bank or hill in its rear. I observed the situation was not only unmilitary, but would become the grave of the troops if they were not removed. At that time I did not know that the general had contracted for the ground as private property, "a snug fixture where he might hang up his sword." The morning after this conversation I was sent for by the general, and severely and rudely reprimanded before two strangers, and forbidden to interfere with his plans and measures. I replied, it was my duty and inclination to obey his military arrangements; but should I discover any plans or measures which put to hazard the peace and safety of the United States, I would not keep silence, be the consequences what they might. He understood me; and from that moment I believe my ruin was determined on.

Colonel Burr arrived a little time after this at St. Louis. [Mr. Wirt. At what time? Answer. I believe in August, 1805.] A Judge Easton, who appeared to think very highly of Colonel Burr, and boasted of possessing a part of his confidence, informed me that Colonel Burr had inquired of him whether there was any officer of experience and enterprise who could be trusted with the command of an expedition to Santa Fé, and gave me a very inquisitive look. I demanded by what authority Colonel Burr made the inquiry, or in what light I was to view it. He replied that Colonel Burr at that time held no public office, but that he had powerful friends, and would probably be in a very exalted situation before long; that I had been well spoken of to Colonel Burr, (I suppose by himself,) and he advised me to make him my friend. I answered that the inquiry was a suspicious one; for if Government chose to employ me in that or any other way, it had a right to command my services; for I was in service at that time. We dropped the subject. [Mr. Martin. Was Easton at St. Louis? Answer. Yes. Question. Was he in habits of great intimacy with General Wilkinson? Answer. Yes, there appeared to be a good understanding between the three.] But as General Wilkinson, some time before had written me "that every information of the route to Santa Fé would be highly acceptable, and recently sounded my inclination towards energetic Governments and his grand scheme to make fortunes, I no longer doubted of their connexion.

Mr. Martin. How long was Colonel Burr at St. Louis? how was he treated by General Wilkinson? and how was he sent across the river?

Answer. When he arrived I was not in town, but understood that the general had rode out with him to the cantonment to view his troops; I saw the colonel on the evening he returned. The colonel strictured the situation, and laughed at the general's military notions.

Mr. Wirt. At Cold Water? Answer. Yes, at Cold Water, and christened afterwards Belle Fontaine.

Question. How far from St. Louis? Answer. Twelve or fourteen miles.

Mr. Martin. When Colonel Burr was there how was he treated?

Answer. The general made a dinner, it was understood, for Colonel Burr; I was invited; the colonel did not attend, but was said to be sick. When Colonel Burr was leaving St. Louis, I was about to cross the river to my plantation on the opposite side; his baggage was brought to the ferry-boat, when I saw the general's barge getting ready with colors and a complete crew in uniform. I afterwards saw the colonel pass my farm on his journey, in company with Doctor Browne only; Easton was not with him.

Some time after Colonel Burr left St. Louis, General Wilkinson and Mr. Easton fell out. Easton complained that the general persecuted him; and often talked in a dark, mysterious manner about a Western empire. Captain Stoddard also hinted to me, after his return from Fort Massac, that some great scheme was in agitation between Colonel Burr and General Wilkinson, but did not say what. Easton positively stated that there was a connexion between General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr. He complained that the general persecuted him. I observed that it was very strange that he should be the common friend of Colonel Burr and General Wilkinson, and yet they should misunderstand one another about him; that I rather suspected the general finding him unpopular with the French, and that he would not answer their purpose, had persuaded Colonel Burr to shake him off. Easton replied that Colonel Burr was in his power, and he dared not treat him in a deceitful manner. I replied, I did not know Colonel Burr; but that his enemies represented him as an artful intriguer. Some time afterwards, Mr. Easton came to me and observed that he believed my conjectures about Colonel Burr were true, and that he was to be made a sacrifice of; that he should go on to the seat of Government and try what he could do for himself. Easton was then a judge appointed by the President, but not confirmed by the Senate, and he was apprehensive he would not be; that General Wilkinson was using his influence to prevent the confirmation; but observed Colonel Burr was much in his power, for that he had made him proposals which made the hair rise upon his head, astonished and confounded him so that he was struck dumb. [General Wilkinson. Were these his very words? Answer. Yes.] That Colonel Burr observing this, would have retracted, but it was too late. I urged him to explain the nature of the proposals; he said he was under an obligation of secrecy; but no obligation should hold him if he found Colonel Burr false to him. I observed to him that he well knew that any obligation which led him to conceal or commit a crime, could not be binding. He observed, he was going on to the seat of Government and should see Colonel Burr, and then he should take his measures. I saw Easton after his return; I urged him to explain the business which he had mentioned before; but he pretended to have forgotten that such a conversation had ever passed between us. [Mr. Hay. Was his appointment confirmed? Answer. No; he lost his appointment, and had seen Colonel Burr.] About this time, a paper called the "Western World" made its appearance, one of which was, I believe, directed to the general weekly. [Mr. Hay. After the return of Easton? Answer. Yes.] It roundly accused General Wilkinson of the old plan, of being concerned with Miranda, and connected with Colonel Burr. I observed to Easton, that I believed I should get the whole story from the Western World, without being under any obligations to him; that if he had done his duty he might have served himself and his country, and perhaps prevented the effusion of blood. He observed, that he had once attempted to make a disclosure to Government, but instead of being countenanced he got a reprimand. I demanded the instance; he said that he had written to a Senator in Congress, either from Vermont or New York, that he could prove General Wilkinson to be the projector of Miranda's expedition. The gentleman acknowledged the receipt of his letter, but informed him he had burnt it, advised him to mind his own business, and take care how he meddled with men high in power and office.

Mr. Martin. Had General Wilkinson any conversation with you with respect to the appointment of a certain John Smith, of Louisiana?

Answer. I had a conversation with him about John Smith; I remember going into the general's office, when he handed me two letters, one from Major Hunt, the civil and military commandant; the other from Smith, who complained that the commandant had ordered him off the mineral lands. The general censured the order, and asked me if I knew who John Smith was. I replied no, but had been informed he was one of Cox's captains. So Major Hunt insidiously observes, replies the general; but that does not lessen him in my esteem. He added that Smith was brother-in-law to Mr. Early, a member of Congress, who had brought forward a resolution to reduce the army and dispense with his services as general; that there were many of his stamp in Congress; therefore, they must be attended and kept in good humor, or we shall be turned to the right about.

Mr. Martin. Did you appear before the Secretary of War in order to make a statement as to the conduct of General Wilkinson, which you considered endangered the United States, and what was his reply?

Mr. Hay objected to the question, as it had no relation to the subject.

Mr. Wickham said that General Wilkinson had been interrogated by them, and required to say whether his conduct was approved or disapproved by the Government; that the Government had taken the most active part in this prosecution, and it was right and proper that the sentiments of the Government should be known.

The Chief Justice said the difference was this: the evidence of General Wilkinson arose from communications officially made directly from the Government. This is a different case; the evidence here offered consists of conversations with the officers of the Government.

Mr. Martin said that the Secretary of War was applied to in his official character, and in his official character he had said that General Wilkinson must and would be supported; that he had stood low in the estimation of the Government before his energetic measures at New Orleans, but now he stood very high.

Mr. Hay was about to make some observations in opposition to the introduction of such evidence, when General Wilkinson consented that the witness should go on.

Witness. In March, 1807, a few days before the rising of Congress, I was in the city of Washington, and waited on the Secretary of War; and the subject which gave rise to this visit and conversation between the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and myself, was an appeal from the sentence of a general court-martial, whose proceedings I contended had been arbitrary and oppressive, and sentence illegal and unjust.

Mr. Wirt. Against whom?

Answer. Myself; and that I was not arrested until after General Wilkinson had sounded and found I would not answer his purpose; and, I believe, for fear I might penetrate his plans and be a spy on his actions, he determined to put me aside. The Secretary of War replied, that there had been a time when General Wilkinson did not stand well with the Executive; but his energetic measures at New Orleans had regained him his confidence, and he would support him.

Mr. Wirt. Who?

Answer. I mean the President. I asked if an inquiry into the conduct of General Wilkinson, his oppressions and illegal acts, and his connexion with Colonel Burr, might be expected? He answered, there might be an inquiry after the present bustle was over; but at present he must and would be supported. I then observed that, if an inquiry might be expected in a reasonable time, I would ask a furlough and wait; but, if not, I should resign immediately. He observed that I must not calculate on a speedy inquiry; but, if I was determined not to serve under General Wilkinson, my only resort was to resign immediately.

Mr. Martin. Who said so—General Dearborn?

Answer. Yes; General Dearborn. He, however, recommended me to draw up a short statement of facts for the President respecting my trial and sentence. I replied that, if I did, I should certainly charge General Wilkinson with having been connected with Colonel Burr, and with having made attempts to bring me over to his grand scheme of making fortunes. He replied, if these are your impressions, you will be correct in stating them. This was the first conversation I had with the Secretary of War.

I had a second conversation with the Secretary of War, in which I insisted that General Wilkinson was acquainted with Burr's plans; that I would produce proof that he had been concerned, and did not secede till he found that Colonel Burr had commenced the enterprise with a handful of men, that the country was alarmed, and that the project was a desperate one. I then had a conversation with the Attorney General, on the legality of restoring my pay and emoluments, which had been suspended by the sentence of the court-martial. I informed him that a connexion between General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr could certainly be proved. He observed that the general had been low with the President, but at that time stood high, and would be supported. He observed, however, that there was a great deal of mystery in the allusions of Colonel Burr's letter to General Wilkinson, as well as their making use of a cipher. He advised me not to resign, but to wait events; for the Secretary of War had informed him that I was the only republican field officer in the service, and that public opinion was very fluctuating and whimsical.

After this I had a conversation with the Secretary of War and the Attorney General, together. I think that Captain Clark, the companion of Lewis, was also present. The Secretary of War shut the doors. We had some previous conversation; as, after the Attorney General came in, the Secretary of War introduced it again by observing that he had been informed that Colonel Burr had accompanied General Wilkinson to the Western country, spent several days with him at Massac, and then furnished the colonel with a barge and men to descend the Mississippi to New Orleans. I replied that this was one among many reasons to suspect a good understanding, connexion, and co-operation between the general and colonel; that I imagined both of them were well informed of the old plan attributable to the general and his associates, to form a separate Government west of the Allegany under the auspices of Spain or England; of his famous memorial, which it is said procured him exclusive privileges from the Spanish Government; and the extraordinary visit Colonel Connelly, from Canada, paid him in Kentucky; but that there were recent events which were not without suspicion, such as his having spent the last winter of Colonel Burr's Vice-Presidency at Washington; their great intimacy; the interest made to get General Wilkinson appointed and confirmed Governor of Upper Louisiana, with Burr's brother-in-law Secretary to the Territory, and many of his friends to places of trust and influence; General Wilkinson's drawing several hundred troops into a cantonment near the mouth of the Missouri; his connexions with Colonel Burr, General Adair, John Brown, of Kentucky, John Smith, of Ohio, and several others, since implicated or suspected of being concerned with Colonel Burr, to procure a charter for cutting a canal on the Indiana side of Ohio, on which charter a bank was ingrafted, and would have produced those funds, the want of which seems first to have made the general to hesitate, (alluding to a paragraph in the ciphered letter.) I then stated Colonel Burr's visit to New Orleans, in a barge furnished by General Wilkinson; and that, after visiting the lower country, he came to St. Louis. I then stated the conversation with Judge Easton, as before mentioned, and the intimacy of those three persons; and that, when Colonel Burr was about leaving St. Louis, the general had a barge got ready, with much parade, to put him over the Mississippi; that, some time after Col. Burr's return to the Atlantic States, Miranda's expedition got ready and sailed, which a gentleman promised, if called on, to come forward and prove General Wilkinson to be the projector of; (that gentleman is Judge Easton.) I then observed that it was not easy to suppose that Colonel Burr, who knew Wilkinson's character, his former attempts, and desperate fortune, should spend so much time with him at Washington, where the scheme seems to have been first projected; pass through the country where Colonel Burr must commence his enterprise, where Wilkinson was well acquainted, and where Burr wanted agents (alluding to the Ohio) and partisans; yet never found him to make proposals, but wait till all was ready, and then make his first overtures by a letter; and, before he knew of the success of that letter in converting a patriot general into a traitor, should throw himself and his best friends, his choice spirits, into the power of a general he had so much insulted; that the general's measures in Upper Louisiana certainly had a tendency to disgust the people with the change of Government, and to prepare them for a revolt; that I did not know the general's attempts upon other officers, but he certainly had tried me; but if, on the contrary, Col. Burr did communicate his plans to the general, either at Washington, at Massac, or St. Louis, and the general did not immediately inform his Government, he has not only grossly imposed on them and the public at large, but has been guilty of misprision of treason and perjury. The Attorney General, after I had gone through my statement and information, in substance and order nearly as related, asked me what would be the result if all this should be proven? Why, just what the federalists and the enemies of the present administration wish—it would turn the indignation of the people from Burr on Wilkinson; Burr would escape, and Wilkinson take his place. I observed that it possibly might be the event; but justice and honor required that the whole truth should be known, let it operate as it might.

I then left the Attorney General and Secretary of War together, and, stepping down to the post office, found letters from St. Louis, detailing the operations of Colonel Burr, and of a party from St. Louis and St. Geneva, the common friends of General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr, who attempted to join him with twelve thousand weight of lead.

Mr. Wirt. From whom was the letter?

Answer. Samuel Hammond. That letter offered proof that the party sent by General Wilkinson to Santa Fé was connected with, and a part of Colonel Burr's plans. As that letter related to the subject which we had been talking on, I sent it to the Secretary of War and the Attorney General; and another letter, which came on with it, to the same point, from Judge Easton. They wrote that Major Wescot and Dr. Stell had left St. Louis and were joined by a Mr. Smith, Dodge, &c. from St. Geneva, who attempted to join Colonel Burr near the mouth of the Ohio: The Secretary of War returned the letters and thanked me; but I have been surprised after offering proof, and naming gentlemen who knew that a connexion existed between General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr, that none of them were summoned to the grand jury. Major Bruff was here asked who those gentlemen were; and he mentioned General Adair, Judge Easton, and Major Kibby, who would prove the object of the expedition to Santa Fé, also Mr. Provenchere. He then stated that he had seen a letter from General Wilkinson to General Adair, in which General Wilkinson urged him to come on; said that he could not go without him; and then asked if he was ashamed to serve under a Spanish conspirator.

General Wilkinson: When was that letter dated?

Answer. I do not recollect when. General Adair read it to me; he offered me a copy, which made me the less particular about its date.

Question. Where was the letter received? Was it at Washington in March last?

Answer. It was the letter which induced General Adair to go to New Orleans, as he said.

General Wilkinson pressed him to come on; said that thirty thousand troops would be sufficient to effect their purpose, as they would have little more to do than to take possession of the country; that they were to divide them into three columns, and General Adair was to have the command of one of them.

Mr. McRae. What country were they to take possession of?

Answer. I cannot say; but my impression was the Spanish country.

The general then chided him for the caution he used in writing; asked him if he was afraid to trust his friend, or ashamed to serve under a Spanish conspirator. At the bottom of the letter were these words: "We shall certainly have a Spanish war."

Chief Justice. Do you know the hand-writing of General Wilkinson?

Answer. I do very well; I sat by General Adair when he read the letter; and it appeared to be the hand-writing of General Wilkinson, but I did not take it up to compare it.

Mr. Martin. Do you remember the date?

Answer. I cannot tell the date or the place from which it was written.

Mr. Hay. Did it appear as if it was of ancient date, or modern?

Answer. Recent. General Adair complained bitterly; he said that this letter had induced him to go to New Orleans, where he was seized by General Wilkinson.

Mr. Wirt. Will you name all the witnesses who could give evidence of the connexion between Colonel Burr and General Wilkinson?

Answer. Judge Easton, to prove that General Wilkinson was the projector of Miranda's expedition; and to prove his connexion with Colonel Burr; Major Timothy Kibby, the person whose deposition has been circulated, and Pierre Provenchere, who could prove the connexion between General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr, and who was the common friend of both; Colonel Samuel Hammond, with whom General Wilkinson had a conversation nearly similar to the one he held with me and Samuel Hammond, Jun. I believe I did not mention Colonel Dupiester, to prove the designs of the party, as to the establishment of a Western empire. I think Colonel Dupiester was mentioned as the friend of Colonel Burr, and, as I am informed, came to St. Louis as his agent, and brought with him commissions and proclamations.

Mr. McRae. Did you see him at St. Louis?

Answer. Yes: a colonel's commission, it is said, was offered to Colonel Chotau, who attempted to throw it into the fire.

Mr. Hay. From whom did the proclamations and commissions come?

Answer. They were said to be from Colonel Burr.

Mr. Hay. Who was to have commanded the horse?

Answer. A Mr. Delony, who had been an officer of the horse in the French service, it was said, was offered a distinguished command in Colonel Burr's army. A Colonel Dupiester, it was said, brought on letters, one to Provenchere, and another to Timothy Kibby, a common friend of Colonel Burr and General Wilkinson.

Chief Justice. Did you see these letters?

Answer. We had a little democratic club intended to counteract those gentlemen. A Mr. Wherry, to whom Provenchere showed the letter, took a copy of it, and brought it down to us.

Mr. Wirt. What was in the letter?

Answer. Something to this purport: "He was ready; hoped they were ready; and that the expedition would begin to move about the 15th of November."

Mr. Martin. How long have you been in the American service?

Answer. I bore arms in 1775 against the tories; had a second lieutenant's place in 1776; and continued in service throughout the war.

Question. Have you been in the service ever since?

Answer. I entered the service again in 1794, under an expectation of bearing arms against the British; for I had been taken a prisoner during the war, and had not been well treated by them.

Question. What was your grade when you left the army?

Answer. Major of artillery.

Mr. Wickham. Did you see such a deposition as that of Timothy Kibby in the hands of the Attorney General or Secretary of War?

Answer. No; I gave them the letter already spoken of; I expected that all the gentlemen whose names I mentioned would have been summoned. It has been said that I came on here as a volunteer. I certainly should have come on in any event; but I was surprised that those gentlemen should not have been summoned, and that the inquiry should be on one side only.

Mr. Wirt. Is the Samuel Hammond you have mentioned the same person who had a commission in the time of Genet? Answer. The very same.

Mr. Hay. I think you said it was in June, 1805, that General Wilkinson disclosed to you this important secret? Answer. Not in June; some time in the summer; I think in July.

Question. What was the impression on your mind at the time; did you suppose it was some project hostile to the United States?

Answer. I did suspect that he had some grand project in view. I expected that he would have made the disclosure without my saying that I wished him to make my fortune. I did not intend to come under any obligation, or to commit myself.

Question. When was the first time that you made any communications to the Government, or any of its officers, with respect to these projects?

Answer. I have a letter here dated January 8, 1806, in which I say: "I have no confidence in the patriotism of General Wilkinson; and, as a man, I think of him with horror."

Mr. Wirt. To whom was that letter addressed? Answer. To the Secretary of War.

General Wilkinson. Were you under arrest at that time?

Answer. No; I was not; (looking at his papers.) It does not appear, from this letter, that I was under arrest at that time.

Mr. Hay. I want to know the fact whether you were under arrest or not? Answer. I was not.

Question. What was the interval between your arrest and the trial by the court-martial?

Answer. I believe eight or ten days, but I am not certain.

Mr. McRae. Had you not been in expectation of an arrest?

Answer. I had expected it for some time. In a conversation with the general, about my saying that he would not be in service six months, he got very warm, and said, "this is sedition." I replied, then "arrest me."

Mr. Hay. At what time did this conversation take place about Cold Water when you stated, in your evidence, your ruin was decided on?

Answer. I think in September, 1805. Then commenced a system of persecution which terminated in my arrest. I was charged, among other things, with contempt of the general; that I never denied. I was found not guilty of all the other charges, except that one. Major Bruff then said that the sentence of the court-martial had been disannulled by the President of the United States; and his pay and emoluments, which had been suspended by the sentence, restored. [General Wilkinson. I understood that was by stipulation. What is the date of the President's reversal? Answer. I believe it was on the 12th of March last; and my pay and emoluments being restored, is equivalent to a reversal.] Major Bruff proceeded: The Secretary of War observed that the President was disposed to do me justice; but it was a delicate point; and there was no precedent where a sentence had been confirmed by the commander-in-chief, and afterwards reversed by the President. I answered, that I thought it was not very delicate in General Wilkinson to approve a sentence when it was a mere personal thing between us. I understood that it was about the 15th of November, when the expedition was to have commenced, and the Mexican standard (an emblem of the sun) to have been raised. This delayed my departure from St. Louis. I expected to have seen Knights of the Sun and Lords of Mexico among the chiefs of those chosen spirits.

Mr. Martin. Whose property is the place called Cold Water?

Answer. I understand the greater part belongs to General Wilkinson; about four acres of which is deeded to the United States for a factory. He wrote on for me to purchase such a place. It was about this place that General Wilkinson made the rude attack upon me which I have before mentioned; but, I believe, the true source was, that I had said to an officer, in the confidence of General Wilkinson, that he would not be in office six months. I knew that Congress was about to meet, and that it was contrary to the genius of our Government that he should hold the two offices of general and Governor of Louisiana.

Gen. Wilkinson. When did you receive the first intimation of my intention to retire from service?

Answer. This is intimated in a letter from the general, dated April 5, 1805. [Here Major Bruff read a letter from General Wilkinson to him. See reference A.]

Question. Did I not reiterate this intention after I came to St. Louis? Answer. I believe you did.

Question. Do you recollect at what period after I got to St. Louis, whether late or early?

Answer. I cannot recollect. You often mentioned the subject.

Question. Were you subpoenaed to attend this place?

Answer. I was. I saw a subpoena in the hands of a gentleman for me; and Mr. Martin had told me in Baltimore that there was one ordered; and, therefore, I considered myself as subpoenaed from Queen Anne's county in Maryland.

Question. Then you had a conference with Mr. Martin. Answer. I had.

Question. Do you recollect to have said that you were very reluctant to come, but Mr. Martin had promised to lash me into tortures?

Answer. I have said that, from a conversation with Mr. Martin, I had reason to believe that your letter to Colonel Burr, "post marked 13th of May," would be produced; but that I should have come, in any event. [Here a certificate of Colonel Meigs was read; for which see note B.] The first intimation I had of this letter was from a letter written by a gentleman of the grand jury to a friend of mine, stricturing the testimony of General Wilkinson, given before that body; that part of the letter was confidentially read to me.

Major Bruff was about to state a conversation with Mr. Martin, when he was interrupted by Colonel Burr, who said that he could not consent to a narration of the conversations which might have been held with his counsel.

General Wilkinson. Did you not say that you believed Burr was guilty; but that I had done you a serious injury, and you thought this a good time to seek redress?

Answer. I have said that I believed Colonel Burr concerned in that expedition with you. I have said so, and I think so still.

Mr. McRae. Will you state the character of Judge Easton?

Answer. I have accused him of an endeavor to swindle me out of half the land we purchased, in common, on which an arbitration is now depending.

General Wilkinson. Had you no land speculations with Easton?

Answer. No. I had no speculations; but we made a purchase of a single tract of land together. Perhaps you call that land speculations.

Question. You said that when Colonel Burr arrived at St. Louis, Easton and myself were intimate?

Answer. I thought so.

Question. Did you not know, that about that time, I did not suffer him to come into my house?

Answer. I heard him say, after Colonel Burr had left St. Louis some little time, that you were persecuting him.

Commodore Shaw was called by the prosecution.

Mr. Hay. Did you travel in the stage with Major Bruff, as he was coming to this place? Answer. I did.

Question. Will you state the conversation which passed in the stage?

Answer. The conversation was lengthy, and not particularly addressed to me. I understood, as Major Bruff stated, that a conspiracy had been organized in the Western country; at the head of which was Burr; and that Gen. Wilkinson, and several others, were implicated; that he had kept a watchful eye on them; had been on the alert; and that he had a just right to know that such a conspiracy existed. He said that General Wilkinson had done him a serious injury; and that he had come on, from some information Mr. Martin had given him, to tell a long story.

Question. What was the drift of the conversation; that he intended to injure General Wilkinson?

Answer. The impression on my mind was, that General Wilkinson had done him a serious injury, and he was coming to retaliate; but I cannot recollect the very words.

The Chief Justice declared that impressions were not evidence. Witnesses must always depose to facts.

Mr. McRae (to Major Bruff.) I understand you to say that you were summoned from Queen Anne county, in Maryland. Did you ever see the subpoena there? Answer. No.

Question. What induced you, then, to think that you were summoned there?

Answer. I own property in Queen Anne county, where I had been making arrangements for my return from the Western country. I went to Baltimore to transact some business, where I met with Mr. Martin. He told me that if I had not come to Baltimore he should have gone to see me. I asked him if the letter "post marked 13th of May," would be produced. He said he believed it would; and informed me that I might consider myself summoned, for that he should order a subpoena for me."

Captain Daniel Bissel, called by the prosecution.

General Wilkinson. Were you a member of the court-martial which sat on the trial of Major Bruff?

Answer. I was.

Question. By whom was Major Bruff arrested?

Answer. By Captain Richmond. He preferred the charges, and solicited the arrest.

Question. How many members composed the court; their names and rank?

Answer. Colonel Thomas Hunt, president; Colonels Cushing and Kingsbury, Captains Lockwood, Bissel, Strong, and Many; Lieutenants Peters, Mulford, Carson, Whitlock, Richardson, and Kimball.

Question. Was the court unanimous in their sentence?

Some doubt arose about the propriety of answering this question, consistently with the articles of war. It was waived for the present.

Mr. Martin. Was it not some short time before the court-martial, that an address to the President was handed about, which was signed by most of the officers? Answer. I believe it was.

Question. Did Major Bruff sign it? Answer. I do not know that he did. I did not see his name to it.

Question. Did not the officers impugn the honor of any man who refused to sign it?

Answer. It has been more than two years since the address was circulated; and I cannot recollect what were the impressions of the moment. Major Bruff said he had seen a mutilated copy of the address published in the papers. The address was to the President; the object of which was, to continue General Wilkinson in the office of commander-in-chief while he was Governor of Louisiana. It says a great many handsome things about his services from Canada to Florida, and the sufferings he had undergone in the cause of his country. (Refer to note C.)

(CONFIDENTIAL.)

APRIL 5, 1807.

I am desirous, like yourself, to make a snug fixture, and hang up my sword. Our soil, we may thank God, is not favorable to military pursuits, and the profession of arms has become disreputable in our free and peaceful country. Will you look out for a handsome spot for me, five or six miles from St. Louis, of one thousand acres, more or less, rich, well timbered, and lying well for cultivation, with excellent water, and a mill-seat. I shall want such a spot. Will you have the goodness to look for one without speaking; and if a bargain presents, you may make, in your own name, a provisional contract, to be off or on in six months. Pardon the freedom I take with and the trouble I offer you.

With esteem and respect, your obedient servant,

Major BRUFF.

JAMES WILKINSON.

Colonel Meigs's certificate.

RICHMOND, September 23, 1807.

I certify that at Richmond, during the trial of Colonel Burr, for treason, Major James Bruff informed me that he was attending as a witness for Colonel Burr, for which he was sorry; that L. Martin had promised him, if he would attend as a witness, he, Martin, would expose the character of General Wilkinson, by introducing into court a certain letter written by General Wilkinson to Aaron Burr, which letter Colonel Burr had declined submitting to the grand jury; and that Mr. Martin declared that he would lash General Wilkinson into tortures; and upon these promises he came.

R. J. MEIGS, JUN.

SIR:

It does not comport with the pride of a soldier tacitly to behold his general assailed by unmerited slanders; or to suffer the veteran, with whom we have run a long course of hardships and perils, to fall a victim to undeserved calumnies. The spirit of a soldier revolts against such apathy, and every man of sensibility would condemn such cold-heartedness.

We mean not to offend by this offering of a just tribute to merit; nor to derogate from the worth of the living or the dead, by those expressions of our sentiments.

We have seen with horror, and have felt with indignation, the various attempts which have been made to blast the character of General James Wilkinson. Some of us have served under his command twelve years, and have followed him from Canada to Florida; and all have been habituated to his command for many years, during which period we have seen him encountering almost every vicissitude to which active military life is incident. Generous, benevolent, and humane; his heart, his hand, and his purse are ever open, and ready to succor distress and relieve misfortune; hardy, enterprising, daring, and brave, he encounters obstacles with alacrity, and is most exalted when pressed by difficulties. The ice, snow, and wintry blasts of the north; the arid sands and burning sun of the south; wild mountains and morasses, present no impediments to his course, where duty calls. Ready to take the lead in every extremity, he never exacts from others what he is not willing himself to perform. Daring, yet vigilant and cautious, he is provident in warding dangers, and resourceful in mastering them.

Let him be judged by his orders and arrangements, and military men will honor his principles and practices; rigid in his discipline, exact in his police, and indefatigable in every branch of service. He delights to comfort and cherish the sick soldier, and pays a sacred respect to the laws of his country, and the rights of his fellow-citizens, of which numerous instances could be quoted.

With him for a leader, we shall neither fear danger nor foresee difficulties, but shall march to battle with the assurance of victory.

The subscribers, composing the whole of the officers present at the cantonment and St. Louis, would suffer martyrdom sooner than profess what they do not believe, or proffer homage where it is not due; and with these sentiments, they hesitate not to declare, that they have offered the opinions of every man of honor who carries the sword of the United States.

To His Excellency THOMAS JEFFERSON, President of the United States.

WEDNESDAY, October 7.

Mr. McRae requested that, on account of the extreme indisposition of one of Mr. Wirt's children, which prevented him from attending, the court might be adjourned till to-morrow. Independently of this circumstance, General Wilkinson, whose feelings had been severely wounded by the testimony of a witness yesterday, was in the course of preparation to remove those unjust imputations. He hoped that no objection would be made to the adjournment.

Mr. Hay said, that by an arrangement of the counsel of the United States, the principal part of the reply would devolve upon Mr. Wirt. It was, therefore, important that he should be present, to know what ground had been occupied by the counsel who preceded him. He did not expect any inconvenience would result from the proposed adjournment; and hoped it would not be opposed.

The adjournment was opposed by Colonel Burr, who stated that one of his counsel had been placed in the same situation as Mr. Wirt, and no indulgence was asked of the court on that account. He also mentioned that the court had, at its own request, proceeded with the examination when he was too much indisposed to attend.

The Chief Justice, after hearing an explanation from Major Bruff, about that part of his testimony respecting his daily attendance for orders, and going through the examination of John Brockenbrough and Joseph C. Cabell, Esquires, two of the members of the grand jury, adjourned till to-morrow.

Major Bruff begged leave to correct an error in part of his evidence given yesterday, in a point not material. This respected his attendance at the office of General Wilkinson every day. After his remark about Cold Water, and his saying that should he discover plans and measures which put to hazard the peace and safety of the United States, he would not keep silence, be the consequence what it might, General Wilkinson was not visible to him for several days. Other officers attended, said Major Bruff; but I was not admitted to his presence. I wrote to the general, and I received an answer, which I have not here. It, however, stated that I should receive such attention as my conduct and rank entitle me to.

General Wilkinson, in explanation of Major Bruff's testimony.

THURSDAY, October 8.

Mr. Hay said he was ready to go on with the argument of the cause, but would not do it unless directed by the court. An attack had been made on General Wilkinson by Major Bruff, which it was the right and the duty of General Wilkinson to explain. Not a word in the long and labored narrative of Major Bruff was testimony applicable to the case before the court. But, having made such serious charges against General Wilkinson, justice requires that the general should be heard in explanation.

General Wilkinson. I have several matters to submit to the court, which have been brought to my recollection by the occurrences of yesterday and the day before.

Grand jurors have been brought forward to contrast my evidence before that body with what I have said here. In the wide range of testimony which has been permitted, a witness may be readily misconceived by others, or misunderstand himself. In the case of Mr. Tazewell, your honors' sense of his testimony was in direct opposition to that of Mr. Burr's counsel; and in the case of Mr. Cabell, one of the most correct men in the world, he had misconceived or did not understand me respecting the mode in which Swartwout delivered Mr. Burr's letter to me. It is with deep regret I trespass on the time of the court; but when every art is employed, and witnesses are raked and scraped from every quarter to rip up the remotest transactions of my life, to affect my credibility, to wound my fame and rob me of my reputation,—

Here Mr. Wickham interrupted General Wilkinson, and said he must object to the course which he was about to pursue. General Wilkinson stands here on the same ground as any other witness. Let his explanations apply to his evidence, but not let him go into other subjects.

Mr. McRae hoped that the same indulgence which had been extended to others, would be granted to General Wilkinson. It will be recollected with what patience their witness, Major Bruff, had been heard for six hours, while he was merely indulging himself in the carnage of General Wilkinson's reputation. General Wilkinson, who had been listening with most exemplary patience, now comes forward to explain; and, in the midst of a very short and respectful exordium, he is interrupted by the counsel on the other side.

The Chief Justice said there could be no doubt of the disposition of the court to hear as full an explanation as General Wilkinson might please to make; but he being merely in the character of a witness, would confine himself to a narrative of facts, and resort to argument as little as possible.

Mr. Hay hoped that something of argument would be permitted. General Wilkinson had been assailed vitally, intentionally, and deliberately by Major Bruff; and his explanations could not be so well understood unless he should, in some instances, resort to argument.

The general resumed: When I was first brought before the court, it was my intention to have commenced with Mr. Burr at Washington and traced him step by step from his passage of the mountains until his return; but I was confined to such facts as were deemed immediately relevant to the question before the court; and, therefore, I commenced with the reception of his letter at Natchitoches.

I now, sir, find myself obliged to adopt this course in order to explain certain observations which have come from the grand jurors, and also the innuendoes and insinuations of the witness, Major Bruff; who, having charged me with a sinister connexion with Mr. Burr, has travelled from Washington to St. Louis to find matter for justification of the imputation. He has laid some stress on the interest which he says was made (by Mr. Burr and his friends) to procure me the government of Louisiana. I am under no obligation to explain how I procured that government; if I were, I could say it had been tendered to me by the President, two months before they had any idea of the circumstance.

I am charged with having invited Colonel Burr to the Western country. Herein I have been misunderstood, for the thing is not so. A few days after Colonel Burr descended from the vice presidential chair, an inquiry was made by me, as to the course he intended to pursue; he told me he intended to visit New Orleans, and I remember his very words were, "I have a few thousand dollars left, and I will not go to work until they are spent." I was solicitous to see him reinstated in the councils of his country; and speaking to the Hon. John Fowler, then a member of Congress, on the subject, he informed me that Mr. Lyon had suggested the idea of Burr's going to Tennessee, to procure his election to a seat in Congress, as residence was not a necessary qualification to election in that State, and requested me to speak to Burr on the subject; I did so, and I think he said it was a luminous idea, appeared to be delighted with the plan, and in concert with Mr. Fowler and Mr. Lyon, I then understood, and have since been assured by the former, who is now in town, the plan was digested without my presence or participation at any interview.

Mr. Burr soon after proceeded to Philadelphia; he wrote me on the 26th of March, requesting a letter of introduction to General Adair, and informing me he should set out for the Western country about the 10th of April. The next letter I received from him was at Pittsburg, dated the 30th of April, in which he tells me he should sail that day for the Lower country, and is sorry he could not see me. At Louisville I received a third letter from him, dated the 19th May, in which he deeply regrets he could not see me there, and begs me to forward the letters of introduction I had promised him for New Orleans, after him, to that city. He proceeded from Louisville to Frankfort; and, I am authorized to say, did there apply to John Brown, Esq., to aid him in his proposed election in Tennessee, and to that end requested letters from Mr. Brown to his friends there. He then proceeded to Nashville, where, it appears, he remained beyond his calculation. I fell down the river to Massac, where Colonel Burr arrived on the 8th of June; and instead of spending several days in giving me lessons on government, and preparing a new code or constitution for Louisiana, he the next day prosecuted his voyage for New Orleans, in company with several officers of the army, who had been ordered to that city on a general court-martial; and it will be proven that I furnished him neither barge nor crew.

I heard no more of Mr. Burr until the 30th July, when I received a letter from him at the crossings of the Tennessee river, in which he informed me he was on his way to Lexington, and hoped to be with me at St. Louis about the 1st of September. He arrived at St. Louis on the 11th of that month, in the evening; expressed a wish to visit St. Charles, and I accompanied him in his route to the cantonment of the troops, about eleven miles distance, from whence he proceeded without me, crossed the Missouri to St. Charles, from thence passed over Portage des Sioux to the Mississippi, and descended that river in a canoe to St. Louis. I think it was in our ride to the cantonment that Mr. Burr, speaking of the imbecility of the Government, said it would moulder to pieces, die a natural death, or words to that effect, adding that the people of the Western country were ready for revolt. To this I recollect replying, that, if he had not profited more by his journey in other respects, he had better have remained at Washington or Philadelphia; for surely, said I, my friend, no person was ever more mistaken! The Western people disaffected to the Government! They are bigoted to Jefferson and democracy. And the conversation dropped. Mr. Burr, I think, on the same ride, spoke to me of purchasing an estate in that country, observing he had received advice of a sum of money which he should receive on his return to the eastward, and asked me if I would resign my Government to him, in the course of the winter, if he should desire it. This I rejected on account of the emolument, which was $2,000 per annum, (for I was disgusted with the Government,) and he offered to indemnify me.

Nothing particular passed between us, after this, until the afternoon before his departure, which was on the 19th of September in the morning. He informed me that he wished to have some conversation with me, and I invited him to my house for the purpose. In the course of this interview he asked me "whether I could be content to vegetate or moulder in that damned Government," meaning the Government of Louisiana. I expressed my satisfaction with the situation, observing that "I was making arrangements to retire to private life; that I was tired of the erratic life I had long led, and that the delicate situation of my wife, to whom I owed more than I could render, made it necessary." After some pause, he asked me if my energies and enterprise were lost or dead; to which I replied, that my energies and enterprise had profited me through life little else than to expose me to perils and hardships. He then observed, but suppose some grand enterprise should present which would lead direct to fame and fortune. To this I replied, with indifference at first, remarking that I had been so long looking in vain for something of the kind, that I had given up the expectation; but added, after a short pause, that, if the Government should think proper to direct any thing of the kind, he would not find that my energies or enterprise were lost. Surely, replied he, under the authority of the Government, and naming a minister, asked me if an order from him would satisfy me; to which I answered, that an order from any minister was obligatory on me, as they were all organs of the Presidential will. Will! said he, such a measure has been thought of, but it is unnecessary to go into the details of a project which may never be carried into effect; and I replied, that I had no curiosity to hear; and here you have as much of his designs as I possessed.

It has been observed that I have said I had no idea of any project of Colonel Burr before the receipt of his letter by Swartwout. This I deny. I have said I had no idea of any illicit design, such as would subject him to legal penalty or legal obstruction. Between the period of Mr. Burr's leaving St. Louis, and May, 1806, I received six letters from him; I have said that those letters blended matters political with matters personal. I have considered those letters confidential; they were so received, and I will not expose them, but in the last extremity, without Colonel Burr's permission; but if I have that permission, I will do it now; I have asked it, and do again ask it. Those letters were of an ambiguous aspect, speaking of some enterprise without designating any, and were calculated to inculcate me, should they be exposed. I have said I made a communication to a public minister, the Secretary of the Navy, to the following effect: "Burr is about something, but whether internal or external I cannot discover." It has been made a question how I could, feeling the friendship I professed for Colonel Burr, make such a communication when unapprized of any criminal intention; and I reply, that I justify it from a sense of public duty, paramount to all other obligations; from the consciousness that, if Mr. Burr intended no harm, the communication could do him none, as it was confidential; and on the ground of self-security against events.

I had formed several opinions of Mr. Burr's views; sometimes I thought them chimerical; and the most definite idea I had ever attached to them was that he had formed some connexion with the British Government; that he was to operate with an expedition by the Gulf against the Mexican provinces; and that the United States were, in case of a war, which was every where expected, to co-operate by the Mississippi. I recollect well this impression, from the circumstance of my having mentioned to several persons, that if they would show me the embarkation of an army in England, equipped for a southern climate, I would tell them we would have a war with the Spanish provinces; and from this impression my idea respecting Miranda's taking the bread out of his mouth must have sprung. I beg it may be remembered at this time, that Colonel Burr descended from the vice presidential chair with great eclat, and I did believe he was not only reascending in the public confidence, but in the confidence of the Executive; and, for these reasons, his step-son, Judge Prevost, had been appointed district judge to the Territory of Orleans. The republican body of the Senate had addressed Governor Bloomfield to enter a nolle prosequi on his behalf, in a case of great hardship and delicacy. The Senate had addressed him in the most flattering terms; and Dr. Browne, the gentleman who had married his wife's sister, had been appointed (solely on the recommendation of Colonel Burr) Secretary to the Territory of which I had been appointed Governor.

Frequent reference has been made to the letter said to be post-marked 13th of May. I have said I do not recollect whether I wrote Colonel Burr such a letter or not, and, of course, I can have no recollection of the contents; but I have said I believed I had written him three letters after he had left St. Louis, and this was my idea; but I recollect no particulars except the expression relating to Miranda, though I recollect perfectly the motives with which I did write him. I now find, from his letter of the 16th of April, that he had received no letter from me after October or November, 1805; and, therefore, I conclude I wrote him but two letters from the period he left me at St. Louis to the present day. I again required that the letter imputed to me, "post-marked 13th of May," should be produced. I think it was in the letter I wrote in October or November, 1805, that I make mention of Miranda; and I now believe it was after the receipt of a letter from him, of the 24th of December, 1805, that I warned the Secretary of the Navy against him. It has been said by one of the grand jury, that I declared I had employed language in my notes or letters to draw from Colonel Burr his real objects, that I might, in case they were commendable, partake of them; and if otherwise, report him to the Government. I acknowledge the first motive, but I do not recollect the alternative. If his plans had been vicious, I should have done my duty; if they had been innocent, I should not have reported him. I find, by reference to my correspondence, that I received no orders to leave St. Louis until the 11th of June, 1806; the troops had sailed the 8th of May, and I was left to exercise the functions of civil Governor, God knows without an idea of leaving the country, until the order arrived; and the much talked-of letter bears "post-mark 13th May," a month before I received my orders.

Mr. Hay. Will you state what passed between yourself and Major Bruff, when he descended the river to meet you on your approach to St. Louis?

Answer. I will. But I can state before you, sir, (addressing the judge,) and before God, (turning up his eyes to Heaven, and placing his hands on his heart,) that his whole narrative is either a vile fabrication, or a distortion of facts; and I will show why this man, above all others in the world, should not be in my confidence. On my arrival at Fort Massac, I met a number of officers under orders to attend a general court-martial at New Orleans, among whom was Capt. Stoddart, who had taken possession of Louisiana on the part of the United States, and preceded Major Bruff in the command of St. Louis, and had acted as civil commandant of the country, until he had been superseded by the appointment of Governor Harrison, who had acted as Governor of Indiana, and also of Louisiana, until I was appointed to that Territory. In the course of my inquiries of Capt. Stoddart, relative to the state of the Territory, he informed me that Major Bruff had, by his conduct, made himself very unpopular with the inhabitants. In ascending the Mississippi, I halted at Kaskaskias, where I received a letter from Governor Harrison, by the hands of a Mr. Wallace, or a Captain Prince, who were in company; of which letter I hold an extract in my hand. [The reading of this extract was opposed by the counsel of Col. Burr. The Chief Justice declared that General Wilkinson might either read the extract, or state its contents. General Wilkinson read the extract.*] The letter is dated the 7th of June, 1805, and was received the 29th or 30th of the same month, and I met Major Bruff on the 3d of July. At the same place I received by a despatch boat an invitation to dine on the day of my arrival at St. Louis, with Mr. Augustus Chouteau, who, I understood, was the senior magistrate of the district, and as good a man as there is in that or any other country. As I approached St. Louis, I sent a light barge ahead, and requested Major Bruff to meet me, for he also had invited me to dine with him on the day of my *Extract of a letter from Gov. William Harrison to Gen. James Wilkinson.

"VINCENNES, June 7, 1805.

"Receive, I pray you, no impressions relative to the people of St. Louis, from Major Bruff, for reasons that I will hereafter explain. The bare idea of his being in your confidence would frighten some of them out of their senses."

arrival. Knowing the jealousy of his disposition, and being desirous to conciliate and prevent exception, I wished to explain to him my motives for giving a preference to Mr. Chouteau's invitation; which I did when we met, by stating to him that, approaching the Territory in my capacity of Governor, the first respect was due to the civil magistrate; that I gave Mr. Chouteau the preference on this ground, and hoped he would excuse it. I met Major Bruff on the beach, under a steep bank. I did not take him into the woods, nor had I any conversation with him of the import he has stated. We ascended the river about a mile, and were hailed from the shore. The boats landed, and I was met, I think, by three gentlemen—Mr. Augustus Chouteau, Mr. Anthony Soulard, and Mr. Charles Gratiot, who were introduced to me on board my barge, and invited me to land and take horse to St. Louis, to which I consented; and, debarking, I was received by a troop consisting of fifty or sixty dragoons, commanded by Capt. P. Chouteau, the brother of Mr. A. Chouteau. These, I presume, were the Frenchmen who hunted us up in the woods. I mounted a horse which had been provided for me, and was escorted to St. Louis. These are the facts, so far as they relate to the interview with Major Bruff. I dined with Mr. Chouteau, but found that Major Bruff had anticipated Mr. Chouteau, and had engaged every officer to dine with him. I was left alone.

Mr. Hay. Had you those other conversations mentioned by Major Bruff, in which he states you to have been ruminating about a grand project, which was to make the fortunes of all concerned?

Answer. It is impossible for me to say what conversations I had with the officers of the garrison, especially the one whom I found in command; but from the circumstances already stated, it is impossible I could have had those conversations with Major Bruff, mentioned by him. The major, in order to substantiate his tale, has affected an air of mystery, and his imagination has furnished the scenery; for this purpose, he takes me into the woods, has us hunted up by Frenchmen, then locks a door where there was no lock, it being fastened by hooks and staples; nor was it necessary to shut it at all, as the ordinary guard at head-quarters gave two sentinels for its protection. This locking of the door betrayed some concert; for I well remember that, a few days ago, one of the counsel of Col. Burr, (Mr. Martin,) demanded of me, emphatically, whether I did not recollect being locked up in a room with a gentleman, and having a long conversation with him.

Question. Did you ever select Major Bruff for the purpose of making confidential communications, or state to him any thing about the prospect of making fortunes?

Answer. No, never.

Col. Burr. Are you acquainted with a Mr. Bon Ami, a magistrate of New Orleans?

Answer. I have no recollection of any person of that name.

Mr. Wickham called for the production of the original letter of Governor Harrison to General Wilkinson, from which an extract had been read. The counsel of Colonel Burr contended, that as an extract had been read from it, they had a right to the whole letter, as the best evidence. They were answered by the counsel for the United States, that there was not a word in the letter which had any relation to Major Bruff, except the paragraph which had been read; and that the letter was entirely private and confidential.

After some further debate, the Chief Justice declared, that he felt great repugnance at the idea of producing the letter, as it was entirely private and confidential, and he was certain that neither the letter nor the extract could be evidence in the cause; but it was a rule of law, that when an extract was read, the whole paper must be read if demanded. In the present case, the whole letter must be produced, or the extract be withdrawn.

Mr. Hay remarked that General Wilkinson had been drawn into the production of the extract by the opinion of the court.

General Wilkinson addressed the judge, and declared that he had produced the extract by his permission, and that without that permission he would not have produced it; that he held the letter sacredly confidential, and would go to jail rather than produce it.

The Chief Justice directed that the extract should be withdrawn, and requested all those who took notes of the proceedings would erase every thing which had been said about the letter or the extract.

Mr. Martin hoped they would erase the impression from the public mind.

Mr. Wickham. You have said something about dining; did you not write to Major Bruff, from Kaskaskias, excusing yourself for not dining with him?

Answer. I cannot recollect.

Mr. Wickham. Are you certain that the door had no lock?

Answer. I have my clerk here, who can prove that it had no lock; it was fastened with hooks and bolts, after the French manner.

Mr. Wickham. Do you recollect what gentlemen went down in the barge with Major Bruff?

Answer. I cannot.

Mr. Wickham. Do you recollect whether Mr. Gratiot came with him?

Answer. I have said that Mr. Gratiot, Mr. Chouteau, and Mr. Soulard, met me; but whether they came with Major Bruff, I cannot say.

Mr. Wickham. Will you say whether you first met Mr. Chouteau and Mr. Soulard in the woods?

Answer. I have already stated the circumstance of their going out of the boat with me, and accompanying me to St. Louis.

Major Bruff was called in and cross-examined by the prosecution.

Mr. Hay. I think you said that you had taken up some impressions of General Wilkinson's connexion with Colonel Burr, previous to his arrival at St. Louis?

Answer. I had.

Question. Do you recollect having any conversation with an officer, stating that your reasons for writing General Wilkinson to dine with you, were on account of the injuries which had been done to his character?

Answer. No, but I have argued that the cropping order was perfectly a military one, and that he had a right to issue it; but I said nothing of his moral character. Nor have I justified his prosecution of Colonel Butler. I have also said that he had some good military notions, though I do not know how, or in what service he acquired them.

Question. Do you recollect having any conversation with General Wilkinson in presence of Colonel Cushing?

Witness. What conversation do you allude to?

Mr. Hay. Had there been a coldness between you long anterior to the arrival of General Wilkinson?

Answer. Yes, I had long been persecuted by the general, but wished to bury the hatchet. I had been confined to a garrison without the liberty of going out of it, except by the permission of a superior officer, who was posted three hundred miles distant. Here is a postscript to a letter which proves an order to that effect from General Wilkinson. (See note D.)

Mr. Martin. Where did this superior officer live?

Answer. At Norfolk, and I was stationed about thirty miles from Wilmington, in North Carolina.

Mr. McRae. What was your construction of that order; is it possible that you could take it literally, and suppose that you were to be constantly confined within the walls of the garrison?

Answer. The order shows the intention; but the place had no walls; it was therefore nugatory; yet I considered the intention to confine me to the spot, nor did I leave it till I had permission. General Wilkinson ought to have known the situation, but it appeared he did not. I wrote to the Secretary of War, or Colonel Burbeck, from whom I received orders that admitted of my occasionally leaving the works and place.

Mr. Hay. Will you state whether General Wilkinson wrote to you to purchase some land?

Answer. I have a letter here, of the 5th April, 1805, which speaks of that subject. (See letter A. page 577.)

Question. When did General Wilkinson speak to you about his intention to quit the army and retire to private life?

Answer. I have had a number of conversations with General Wilkinson, and, in my evidence, I have endeavored to throw them into as much order as possible; but it is difficult to state any precise time when he mentioned to me that subject.

Question. Was it at St. Louis?

Answer. Yes, but the letter before mentioned gives a full explanation of his intention.

Question. Did he continue in this style of conversation after his arrival at St. Louis?

Answer. He did.

Question. But your suspicions still continued of his connexions with Colonel Burr?

Answer. I have stated that my suspicions arose from two paragraphs in two separate Kentucky papers.

Mr. Hay. You stated in your evidence the other day that you made a communication to the Secretary of War, and said to him that you could prove General Wilkinson's connexion with Colonel Burr. Will you state why you said so?

Answer. In one of my conversations I named witnesses who, I believed, could prove it, and insisted it was susceptible of proof. I not only thought so then, but think so still; and shall make it my duty to collect and exhibit proofs.

Mr. McRae. Did you say that General Wilkinson's having dined with Mr. Chouteau filled you with indignation?

Answer. I have said that I thought it an indignity offered me, and it was so thought by the officers. But let me here say, that General Wilkinson having denied our interviews in the woods and rooms are incorrect, and I can completely prove it on my return to St. Louis.

Question. Did you not recommend Cold Water as a suitable spot for a cantonment?

Answer. While General Wilkinson was at Washington I received several letters from him, in one of which he stated that a cantonment was wanting for five hundred men. He directed me to select a spot near Cahokia. He described the kind of position he wished. I reported several situations answering his instructions, but I do not recollect that I mentioned Cold Water among them; although I had viewed it, and thought it offered a good military position, (but not in the bottom;) which the general fixed on; nor did I conceive it was contemplated to have a cantonment in the midst of the settlements.

Mr. McRae. Were you not in treaty for it yourself?

Answer. I was. I wanted it for a farm and mill-seat, and not for a military post.

Question. Do you know whether that place is occupied as a military post, or used merely for the convenience of the soldiers while stationed there?

Answer. I think it a very unmilitary position. The troops were posted in a thick wood, which they had to cut down, dig up the roots, and grub up the bushes, for a parade. It may hereafter make a good meadow or field, when they are ordered on.

Question. Is there a factory there? Answer. Yes.

Question. Good water?

Answer. There is a good spring and a handsome marsh next to the second bank. There is also a commanding situation for a cantonment within the purchase, but not at that spot.

Question. Are you certain that there was a good understanding between General Wilkinson, Colonel Burr, and Judge Easton?

Answer. I believe there was. Easton often visited him, and endeavored to reconcile us after we fell out; and the general has sometimes read to me paragraphs from letters he had received from Colonel Burr, about the probability of a war with Spain, and a change of politics in the United States. He also read others from Dayton, and John Smith of Ohio, &c.

Question. Have you any reason to believe there was an intimacy between General Wilkinson and Judge Easton?

Answer. I have said I believed there was; Easton has told me so.

Question. Have you any other reason?

Answer. Easton was almost every day with the general.

Question. At what period?

Answer. On General Wilkinson's arrival, previous to the 4th of July, and for some time after, Easton was frequently in the general's office, and spoke of him in the highest terms.

Question. Was there any intimacy previous to the general's arrival?

Answer. I never saw them together previous to the general's arrival.

Question. Did Major Kibby reside on the frontiers previous to the arrival of General Wilkinson?

Answer. I believe he did. I have seen him, and understood he lived near St. Charles; I esteemed him as a man of honor, whose word and oath would be taken where, perhaps, General Wilkinson's would be shaken.

Question. When Major Kibby made the deposition which has been mentioned, was it not reported and believed that Lieutenant Pike and his party had been destroyed?

Answer. I cannot tell when he made the deposition.

Question. When you first heard of the deposition, was it not reported that Pike and his party were killed?

Answer. On recollection, I think I have seen an account in some newspapers of their having been destroyed; but the only report which I deemed correct was, that they were taken by the Spaniards, and conducted to Santa Fé.

Question. Did not Major Kibby quit our Government, and become a subject of the King of Spain?

Answer. That is my presumption. I found him in that Territory when I arrived there; but as I did not review the possession, it is mere conjecture.

Question. When Judge Easton mentioned to you that Colonel Burr had made him certain proposals, did he speak of any particular newspaper?

Answer. Not that I recollect.

Question. You have said there once seemed to be a good understanding between General Wilkinson and Burr; why would Burr apply through Easton for a man of enterprise, and not immediately to General Wilkinson himself?

Answer. The colonel can best answer this question; but if I may be allowed to conjecture, it was because the general had tried me before, and found I was too much of a democrat to be made a traitor of.

Question. But will you say how Burr came to apply to Easton?

Answer. You had better ask Colonel Burr that question; he may answer it.

Question. Were you and General Wilkinson about that time at variance?

Answer. Yes. He had before reprimanded me about the freedom with which I spoke of his military position at Cold Water, measures and plans.

Question. Did Easton know it?

Answer. I presume he did.

Question. You said that you had informed some of the heads of Departments that Judge Easton could prove General Wilkinson to be the projector of Miranda's expedition; will you state when you gave that information?

Answer. In March last.

Question. When did you first obtain it?

Answer. Just before I left St. Louis, in November last.

Mr. McRae. Then you received it in November, and communicated it in March?

Major Bruff. I left St. Louis in November for the seat of the General Government, but was detained on the way, so that I did not arrive till about the last of February.

Mr. McRae. Did I understand you that in August, 1805, you suspected an improper connexion between Burr and Wilkinson?

Answer. I have said that the first hint I had was from two paragraphs in two separate newspapers. This was afterwards strengthened by the information of Captain Stoddart, of Burr's being at Fort Massac, and the attempt of General Wilkinson to sound me.

Question. I speak of the time when the impressions were formed. Did that suspicion exist in August, 1805?

Answer. Yes, that they were connected in some plan.

Question. Believing as you did, why did you not communicate your suspicions to some of the officers of the Government?

Answer. I do not always communicate my suspicions; I was waiting for acts; my letters will show the nature of the communications I made. I have a copy of one with me.

Question. When is the first letter dated which communicates those hints?

Answer. The one I have with me is dated the 8th of January, 1806.

Mr. McRae. Did you state in that letter all the various circumstances you have mentioned; such as General Wilkinson's taking you into the bushes, your being surprised by a party of Frenchmen, and his having mentioned to you the plan of a grand project, by which all concerned were to make their fortunes?

Major Bruff. What will be the consequence if I read a part of that letter; will the letter itself be demanded?

Chief Justice. Certainly; but you may state from recollection.

Mr. Hay. You said that it was your intention to state facts; and I wish to know whether these facts were stated. Now here are important facts.

Major Bruff. Hints were thrown out in the letter of the 8th of January, 1806; but nothing communicated till March, 1807, that can be regarded as a statement of facts. I however think I had given hints before, but have not the letters with me to refresh my memory, nor can I read what I intended as hints, from the one I have with me.

Mr. Hay. I assure you that I shall not call for it if you say it is a confidential letter.

Major Bruff. Then I will say, generally, that I did give hints about which I expected the Secretary of War would have called for explanations, and demanded proofs. I also made a communication to Captain Lewis immediately after his return, and related to him the conversations which had passed between Judge Easton and myself.

Question. What Captain Lewis; the one who explored the waters of the Missouri and Columbia rivers, and the western part of the continent, as far as the Pacific Ocean? Answer. The same.

Mr. Hay. But did you tell him of the conversations which had passed between General Wilkinson and yourself? did you inform him that General Wilkinson had mentioned to you the grand expedition?

Answer. I believe that I hinted something of that nature.

Mr. McRae. Will you say whether you made a disclosure to the Secretary of War before the 8th of January, 1806?

Answer. I have said, over and over, that I believe I had hinted suspicions of Wilkinson's measures in previous letters, but have not those letters with me. I did think that Wilkinson and Burr were connected and acting in concert; and under this impression remained in that country till 15th November, 1806, in order to counteract and oppose their attempts, and pull down their standard.

Mr. McRae. Did you write prior to the 8th January, 1806?

Answer. I was in the habit of writing to Joseph H. Nicholson and other public characters.

Question. Had you written letters to them injuriously to General Wilkinson before the 8th of January, 1806?

Answer. My letters detailed Wilkinson's measures, which I considered suspicious and hostile to the interests of the United States and of Louisiana. I also stated that General Wilkinson appeared to consider me as a spy on his conduct, and had deprived me of all command and intercourse with the troops, and had prejudiced the officers against me.

Question. But had you written to any of the heads of Departments prior to the 8th January, 1806?

Answer. How often will you ask me this question? I have repeated, over and over, that I have not the correspondence with me; what do you wish me to say? I will repeat that my impressions are, that I gave the Government hints before that time that General Wilkinson's conduct was suspicious.

Mr. Hay. Did you think it was incumbent on you to state to the Secretary of War your suspicions of the patriotism of General Wilkinson, if they had been well founded, and your ideas of the views of Colonel Burr?

Answer. I was waiting for something unequivocal; I expected it to happen every day.

Mr. McRae. Did you say the other day that the Secretary of War had declared that General Wilkinson would be supported by the Government?

Answer. I did; the Secretary of War appeared angry, and frowned when I denounced Wilkinson, and said he must and would be supported.

Question. At what time did Judge Easton leave the Territory for the seat of Government?

Answer. I think in November, 1805.

Mr. McRae. Did you not give Easton special letters of introduction to your friends?

Answer. I believe I did; or, if I did not, I ought to have done so. He was then denouncing Burr and Wilkinson.

Question. Was that after you suspected him of treasonable designs?

Answer. It was after he mentioned the treasonable designs of Burr and Wilkinson.

Question. Did you not write to your friends particularly recommending Easton?

Answer. I wrote to Mr. Robert Wright and General Samuel Smith, as to the state of the Territory; and that Judge Easton was persecuted by Wilkinson, and was united with us to penetrate and defeat their designs.

Question. As far back as November, 1805, was there a public denunciation?

Answer. I gave the conversations with Judge Easton the day before yesterday.

Question. When did Judge Easton swindle you?

Answer. My information was long since that conversation.

Question. Are you on terms of intimacy with him now?

Answer. No; at variance. We have an arbitration depending.

Evidence of Captain Edward Pendleton Gaines.

Mr. McRae. We wish Captain Gaines to state the conversations of Major Bruff as he came on to this place in the stage.

Captain Gaines. Some time in the beginning of August, I passed in the mail stage from Alexandria to this place; and a little after daylight of the first morning after we had left Alexandria, I found Major Bruff and Lieutenant Swearingen were passengers. They got into conversation about Burr's trial. I paid very little attention to it; for, indeed, I did not calculate on its ever being noticed again; but my curiosity was at length excited by his saying that he was informed by Luther Martin, of Baltimore, that a subpoena was out for him; and, hearing of it, he had come on voluntarily for the purpose of giving evidence against General Wilkinson. I remarked to him that as he had volunteered his services, it was presumable he had something of importance to communicate, and inquired what it was. He mentioned several things which he has already stated to the court; and, among others, a communication from Judge Easton, in which he (Easton) observed that he had written a letter to a member of Congress, offering to prove General Wilkinson to be the projector of Miranda's expedition. This appearing to be the principal evidence which he had to offer against General Wilkinson, I expressed my surprise that he should come for that purpose, as it could not be considered legal evidence. It appeared to me, from the whole tenor of his conversation, that he considered himself injured by General Wilkinson, and spoke particularly of his arrest. He stated that General Wilkinson had done him a considerable injury; and that the communications which he had now to make would bear very heavily on the general, or would do him as great an injury.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect any particular expressions?

Answer. The substance of the conversation was, as I have already detailed it, that General Wilkinson had done him a serious injury in the case before the court-martial, and now he would have it in his power to give evidence which would bear hard upon the general, or do him as serious an injury.

Evidence of Captain Daniel Bissel.

Mr. McRae. It will be recollected that Captain Bissel was a member of the court-martial which sat on the trial of Major Bruff, and has been partly examined. We wish now to ask some further information from him.

Mr. McRae (to Captain Bissel.) Was the court unanimous in the sentence passed upon Major Bruff?

Answer. There was a legal majority in favor of the sentence; some were for one more severe, but none for a milder one.

Question. What was the character of Major Bruff among his brother officers and the people at large?

Answer. I have been but little acquainted with Major Bruff. I had received letters from him and written in answer on public business, before I became personally acquainted with him. On my return to St. Louis in 1805, I found Major Bruff in great disrepute among his brother officers. He had been charged with being a partisan, and with having excited jealousies among the officers. He did not visit General Wilkinson; and a great many things were said of him, but I did not inquire into the particulars. I had never spoken to General Wilkinson about him, but made inquiries of Captain Richmond and many others, and found that they united in an opinion very unfavorable to the major.

Question. What is your opinion of the cantonment of Cold Water, as to the healthiness and the convenience of wood and water?

Answer. There is a great abundance of wood, and the best water in that part of the country. The cantonment is on the first bank, in a sandy and dry situation. It is not a commanding situation, because a hill runs parallel with the river, about half a mile distant from the cantonment. I was informed by my brother, Captain Russel Bissel, who was for some time stationed there, that the troops were very healthy. They were very healthy when I was there on the court-martial, and have been reputed to be very healthy ever since.

Question. Was that situation chosen for a place of rendezvous, or a permanent position?

Answer. I cannot say what was the object of the station; it is very convenient as a place of rendezvous, and also for the collection and transportation of provisions and military stores.

Question. What is the general character of Judge Easton?

Answer. I have generally understood he bore an infamous character.

Question. Did Major Bruff give Judge Easton a room in the quarters furnished by the public to Major Bruff?

Answer. That I know nothing of.

Mr. Martin. Is that the Judge Easton who was commissioned by Mr. Jefferson?

Answer. I suppose so.

Mr. McRae. Did General Wilkinson furnish a barge to Colonel Burr when he left St. Louis?

Answer. The barge and men which Colonel Burr had were furnished by myself; I received no orders from General Wilkinson on the subject. It was my own private barge, and the men belonged to my company, who were going down the river on public duty about the same time. It was an accommodation to Colonel Burr, and no injury to myself. General Wilkinson never gave me either verbal or written orders, to my recollection, to furnish a barge and men to Colonel Burr.

Mr. Randolph. I am requested to ask you, whether, on the court-martial for the trial of Major Bruff, General Wilkinson was not a witness against him? and whether Major Bruff did not put a question to him about the conversation in the woods below Carondelet?

Answer. I have no recollection of any such question; the affair lasted very long, and a number of questions were asked which I cannot possibly recollect.

Question. During the court-martial, did not the officers invite Major Bruff to dine with them?

Answer. I recollect having dined with him at two places; perhaps more.

Question. Do you recollect General Wilkinson saying, in answer to some question, that he did not keep a memorandum of small conversations?

Answer. I recollect such an answer of General Wilkinson, but I do not recollect the question.

Major Bruff. As my character has been brought in question, I beg leave to submit extracts of several letters from the general himself, who ought to know more of me than any other officer present. [Here Major Bruff read the extracts marked E, F, G, and H.] The proceedings of the court-martial have been furnished me, and, among the documents, is note of 3d of October, 1805, which he read.

Mr. McRae. Did you return an answer to that note?

Answer. I had an interview with the general. [Major Bruff here read an extract of a letter from General Wilkinson of the 4th of August, 1797, (G,) and another, shortly after the death of General Wayne, stricturing the character of that officer, dated June 18, 1797.

Evidence of Lieutenant Clarence Mulford.

Mr. McRae. Are you well acquainted with Major Bruff?

Answer. I served under him.

Question. What was his general character?

Answer. That is a very delicate question. Unfortunately for Major Bruff he had not many friends either among the citizens or officers.

Chief Justice. What was the character of Major Bruff as a man of truth?

Answer. I never heard it called in question.

Mr. McRae. What was his general character, before the arrival of General Wilkinson, as a man of integrity and truth? I say his general character, for I never will inquire as to every particular act of a man's life.

Answer. I cannot say. I do not know how he was esteemed as a man of integrity and truth; I never heard it impeached, but think the general had more friends than he. I know that he was not liked as the commandant of the post.

Question. What kind of a position is Cold Water? is it a desirable one?

Answer. I thought it the most desirable one I ever saw, as to healthiness, wood, water, and the convenience with which provisions and military stores might be collected.

Question. Were you placed there for the accommodation of the troops, as for any military operations?

Answer. That place was selected for a cantonment, and for that purpose it is the most eligible I ever saw.

Question. What is Judge Easton's general character?

Answer. It is not good.

Question. Did Major Bruff accommodate Judge Easton with quarters in the garrison, which had been furnished to the major by the public?

Answer. He did. When I speak of Major Bruff as not a good commandant of a post, I mean as to his not agreeing with the officers. As to his military skill, I say naught.

Colonel HENRY GAITHER was called in and interrogated as to the character and conduct of Major Bruff during the revolutionary war.

Colonel Gaither. As to Major Bruff's standing in the continental service, he was very young when he entered into it; he was a very active, brave, enterprising officer; he was sundry times badly wounded, and, as soon as he was able, always returned to duty; he stood very high among the officers.

Mr. Martin. Was his reputation high among the officers?

Answer. He stood high with the officers of the higher grades, particularly with General Otho H. Williams, Colonel Smith, and the rest of the field officers.

Question. As to his character in private life?

Answer. I frequently met with him in the Society of Cincinnati, and have long known him in private life, and never heard any thing illegal against him. His character, as far as I have ever known or heard, has always stood fair.

Major Bruff. I was never arrested nor even reprimanded during the whole course of the revolutionary war, and services since; but, on the contrary, have had many flattering things said to and of me throughout my military life, till General Wilkinson differed with me. Captain Richmond, the officer who signed the charges and solicited my arrest, I considered as my friend; he was at my house almost every day before the troops moved to Cold Water, and on terms of intimacy, until the moment of my arrest. As to any disagreement with the officers of the garrison at St. Louis, I had none, except about duty. When I arrived, the garrison was in the most wretched order; not an officer understood the manual of artillery exercise; they did not even know how to post the men to the pieces, or the priming and loading motions. I, therefore, kept the officers to close duty, and it was for that cause, if any, that they complained and were dissatisfied; the inhabitants noticed and applauded the difference in the police and appearance of the men. Respecting the French, I had no personal difference with any one of them, or did I even injure any in their person or property; if I was unpopular with them, it must have arisen from loose observations I may have made about antedated concessions and surveys that took in the public fraudulent grants works. The judges, military commandants, and lawyers, except Donaldson, were opposed to the general's measures, and friendly to me; and the bar volunteered their services in my court-martial, and the principal part of the Americans were on my side of the question; but I did not visit the cantonment, and, on being upbraided with my unsocial disposition on that account, I observed that they did not want democrats there, alluding to General Wilkinson's arrangements to keep me from it, and mixing with the officers.

Lieutenant Mulford, being asked whether the majority of the people were friends to Major Bruff or General Wilkinson, observed: I fully believe that by far the greater part of the people, both French and Americans, were the friends of General Wilkinson.

Major Bruff replied that the President of the United States was the best judge of that. The only instance in which we tried our strength was in a petition respecting the removal of General Wilkinson from that Government, and the appointment of his successor.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson, dated

HEAD-QUARTERS, WASHINGTON CITY, October 15, 1806.

Your residence will necessarily be within the walls of the place, and you will not absent yourself from it, without permission from your superior officer, who, under such indulgence, must be responsible for consequences.

Extract of a letter from General James Wilkinson, dated

DETROIT, August 4, 1797.

Your ideas touching the association of talents and duty are familiar to me, and will always have influence on my conduct; and, from the specimens of your intelligence which have fallen under my observation, it is but justice for me to declare that I take pride in such an officer, and that I shall feel pleasure in serving and obliging the man.

With much consideration, I am, respectfully, sir,
Your most obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Captain BRUFF.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson, dated

HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT WAYNE, June 18, 1797.

The neglects of which you complain, and which I make no doubt are well-founded, are by no means partial. The condition of that part of the army, stationed in this quarter, is truly deplorable, and, at this moment, presents a frightful picture to the scientific soldier; ignorance and licentiousness have been fostered, while intelligence and virtue have been persecuted and exiled; the consequences were that factions have been generated to sanction enormity, and it followed that all ideas of system, economy, order, subordination, and discipline were banished, and that disorder, vice, absurdity, and abuse infected every member of the corps militaire. To clear this Augean stable of anarchy and confusion; to extract order from chaos; to incorporate the shattered parts of companies and of regiments, and to attach responsibility to its proper subjects, have employed my days and my nights for two months, and my work is not yet half finished; though, with the zealous co-operation of the intelligent and honorable part of my officers, I despair not of the final result.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Captain BRUFF.

G.

Your request for personal accommodation, so far as it depends on me, shall be strictly respected; for I find no pleasure in life equal to that of serving an old meritorious soldier of the revolution.

H.

It is necessary that you should descend the river, and take the temporary command of Fort Adams, on special service, which has strong claims to your skill and experience.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 18, 1807.

Your letter of the 17th instant has been received. It is with regret that I find myself compelled, by the principles established in this Department, as well as by a sense of official duty, to accept your resignation; and it is hereby accordingly accepted, to take effect on the 30th of June next; in the mean time, you are at liberty to attend to your private affairs. That the remainder of your life, a great part of which you have spent in the service of your country, may be as happy as the lot of humanity admits, is my sincere wish.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

Major JAMES BRUFF.

EVIDENCE FURNISHED BY THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

Witnesses on behalf of the accused.

FRIDAY, October 2.

LITTLETON W. TAZEWELL was called to be sworn as a witness on the part of the accused.

I wish, before I am sworn, that the point should be determined by the court, whether, as a grand juror, I am bound to give evidence of what passed in the grand jury room. I do not wish that the community or the grand jury should lose any right they may have, by any acquiescence of mine, if by law a grand jurymen ought not to be called upon to state what happened before the grand jury. I submit myself to the court, and will act according to its judgment.

Chief Justice. There is no doubt but it would be improper for a grand juror to be examined to establish facts as founded on the evidence given before a grand jury, because the statements sworn to before them are only ex parte: but as to what a witness now called upon did say before the grand jury, evidence may be given by any grand jurymen to prove the consistency or inconsistency of the witness. As an individual, I cannot say but I approve of the original policy of the law, which prescribed in the oath of grand jurymen a clause of secrecy; but when the Legislature of my country have changed that law, and struck out of the oath what relates to secrecy, it proves to me that the Legislature think differently.

Mr. Hay. This circumstance has weight: I thought that we could not come to this question to-day, but it involves the most serious consequences. The grand jurymen is called to establish some change between the statement of General Wilkinson before the grand jury, and his statement made known in court. The court ought to hesitate before they admit such testimony. I have been told that the reason which induced the Legislature to make the alteration in the oath of grand jurymen was this: all presentments were to be made on the knowledge of two of their own body, (or on other legal evidence,) and as their oath required that they should keep secrecy, it was often impossible for the attorneys who prosecuted for the commonwealth to prosecute with effect, as they could not know the names of the witnesses, and to remove this obstacle to public justice, the clause of secrecy was stricken out. If the opinion of the court be not decisively made up, I should wish to have an opportunity of reflecting on the subject, and showing that this evidence ought not to be admitted.

Mr. Wickham observed, that the Legislature had no doubt well weighed the policy of the clause requiring secrecy, and had determined against it; that there was no reason why they could and should not adhere to this legislative alteration; and that, as to a witness, any thing he had said any where might be given in evidence against him, to show his inconsistency.

Mr. Martin. A grand jurymen can, like any other man, prove facts known to himself, independently of what the witnesses proved before the grand jury.

Mr. Hay said that Mr. Martin did not understand him; and explained further that Mr. Henning had informed him that the Legislature were induced to make the alteration in the oath for the reasons already stated.

Mr. Martin observed, that the only reason that justified the grand jury's oath of secrecy was to prevent offenders against the laws from getting information of inquiries made against them and escaping; that this held no longer after the grand jury had been discharged; that while the grand jury were deliberating, it was proper to keep these proceedings secret; and that those against whom presentments were to be made should not have notice to make their escape; but that to prevent grand jurors from giving evidence after they are dispersed, was to lay the foundation for the most atrocious and most infamous perjuries; that any man might go before the grand jury and charge another who was innocent with the most intriguous and enormous crimes in the world, and have him arrested and confined, and yet remain perfectly safe and secure from any punishment for his perjury.

Chief Justice. The question as to the policy or motive of the Legislature in changing the oath is different from the question before the court, which is, what is the legal effect of the change? The original policy required the oath; but as the Legislature have changed it, I cannot see how the inference can be avoided, that their opinion of the policy is altered.

Mr. Wirt. If it should be discovered that in the original institution secrecy was necessary, independently of the oath, the court would not then receive the testimony without the consent of both parties.

After some few desultory remarks relative to reserving their objection to Mr. Tazewell's testimony,

Mr. Burr said that gentlemen might submit to his testimony with a protestando.

The Chief Justice again stated that the original policy of the institution which presented the oath of secrecy being changed, the testimony, he supposed, must be heard; and

Mr. Tazewell was sworn.

Mr. Burr. Can you state the questions you put to General Wilkinson in the grand jury, and his answers?

Mr. Tazewell. It would be perfectly impossible to state them all, from the length of time he was under examination; but I have notes of the facts stated by him, from which and my memory I may be able to answer any questions which gentlemen may be pleased to ask.

Mr. Burr. State what you recollect about the formation of the cipher.

Mr. Tazewell. There are three kinds of ciphers. The original cipher was produced before the grand jury, in order to enable them to decipher the letter received from yourself, (addressing himself to Colonel Burr.) It is the alphabetical cipher, formed from an edition of Entick's Pocket Dictionary, now before the court; but as proper names occurred, the dictionary would not answer the purpose, and arbitrary marks were invented to represent them. The hieroglyphics were stated by General Wilkinson himself, without any interrogatory put to him, to have been devised by Captain Campbell Smith, in the year 1794; the dictionary, and arbitrary alphabet, and arbitrary signs for units, were designed in 1799 or 1800.

Colonel Burr. Were there any objections made as to these dates?

Answer. There were objections as to these dates in my own mind. The cipher was formed in 1794. On the face of the cipher these words occur, "Canada, Louisiana, and New Orleans." It seemed to me a circumstance somewhat singular, that as early as the year 1794 ciphers relative to those countries should have been adopted, when probably no individual in this country had the acquisition of Louisiana in contemplation, as it was not purchased till some years afterwards. I asked him why he thought of a cipher expressive of that country at that time? He said that he could not explain the reason then, but that he would examine his papers and would tell us. The next day General Wilkinson, of his own accord, told us that the treaty with Spain about the free navigation of the Mississippi was formed about the year 1794. But he had correspondence on that subject, which was of great moment to the Western country; that in the year 1794 he was an officer in the army which marched near Canada against the Indians; and thus, therefore, part of the cipher had relation to Canada. He said that the cipher might have been formed in the year 1794, 1795, or 1796; but he believed in the year 1794. He was asked whether he could be more explicit as to the time, and he gave the same answers as he gave to-day in court.

Question. Did he assign any other reason why the cipher had relation to this country?

Answer. I do not recollect that he did, or whether we asked any further questions on that subject.

Mr. Burr. Did General Wilkinson say any thing about this letter to me?

Answer. It was a subject of great interest with the grand jury to understand the cipher and the contents of the ciphered letter; after deciphering it, it excited a strong wish in them to see the letter post-marked the 13th of May, referred to in it, as having been received from General Wilkinson, by you, in the course of the correspondence between you. That wish was strengthened by the testimony of Mr. Swartwout, who said that he had seen a letter from General Wilkinson to yourself; that it was partly in common writing, and partly in writing in cipher; and that the letter contained these words: "I am ready."

Questions were then put to General Wilkinson, whether he had written such a letter. He answered that his impression was, that he had written one, perhaps two or three letters; that he was not sure, but that his impression was, that he had written some letters. He was then interrogated as to the contents of those letters. He said he could not recollect them, but there was one expression which he wrote on that occasion which he did recollect; and his object in writing it was, to discover Mr. Burr's real designs; that expression was, "I fancy Miranda has taken the bread out of your mouth; and I shall be ready for the grand expedition before you are."

Mr. Burr. What motive did he assign for saying that Miranda would take the bread out of my mouth, and that he would be ready for the grand expedition before I would?

Answer. He said he had had an interview with you at St. Louis; in which you stated, that you had some great project in contemplation; but whether it was authorized by the Government or not, he did not explain, nor did you then inquire. He said that this was all the information he was possessed of, at that time, of your designs; that he was satisfied you had some great project in view; but had not expressed what that project was; that he was therefore anxious to extract from you your real designs; that the object of the correspondence was to develop those designs.

Mr. Burr. Did he assign any reasons for wishing to develop my designs?

Answer. I do not recollect that he did, or did not; but the avowed object was to communicate them to the Government.

Mr. Wickham, (holding in his hand a key to one of the ciphers.) Has there been any addition or alteration in this paper, since you saw it before the grand jury?

Answer. I will state my impressions, sir. I well recollect that this endorsement suggested one doubt to the grand jury: "I solemnly swear, that the numbers and hieroglyphics within, excepting those which denote the alphabet and the units, 'Burr' and 'Wilkinson,' were written by the late Captain Campbell Smith, in the year 1804, '5, or '6, then acting as my aid-de-camp." Mr. Randolph and myself had been both acquainted with Captain C. Smith, and supposed there was some mistake in this date. I recollect putting this question to General Wilkinson: "Do you think that this cipher could have been formed in 1804, '5, or '6, as Captain C. Smith must have been dead before that time?" The general, after some consideration, suggested that there must be a mistake in the date, and that "1794" was intended instead of 1804. I think, also, that the figures 1801, on the face of this paper, have been added since it was laid before the grand jury; I suppose that General Wilkinson's memory has become refreshed and more correct since his examination.

Mr. Hay. General Wilkinson was not interrogated here about this alteration.

Mr. Tazewell. General Wilkinson was asked whether this was an affidavit which he intended to swear to? He answered that there was a mistake specified in the endorsement, and that it ought to have been 1794, '5, and '6, as it is now put, instead of 1804, '5 and '6, (as it was then written.)

Mr. Hay. This endorsement is not in General Wilkinson's hand-writing.

General Wilkinson. It is in the hand of my clerk, Mr. Naw, who is here.

Mr. Hay. If Mr. Tazewell is here introduced merely to show these variations, why was not General Wilkinson himself interrogated about them? He could have himself explained them.

Mr. Burr. We have not heard of these variations before.

Question. Was not the year 1793 first mentioned as the date of the cipher?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Mr. Baker. Do you recollect, when it was represented to him that it was impossible a certain date could be correct, that he immediately changed it?

Answer. I am not certain.

Mr. Burr. Did you not understand that the motive of his holding a correspondence with me was to draw from me my views?

Answer. I am not certain that this was his language.

Question. Did you understand him to say that his object was to communicate my views to the Government?

Answer. Such, sir, is my impression. Indeed, this inference from his answers was so palpable, that I did not think it necessary to ask the question.

General Wilkinson. Do you recollect sir, of any stipulation or acknowledgment, before the grand jury, that what passed there was in confidence?

Answer. I have lately conversed with another grand jurymen, and I have now reason to believe that something of the kind did pass. You had the letter of the 12th November<sup>3</sup> in your hand. You read a part, and paused; you observed, that perhaps it was not proper to read the whole. Mr. Barbour then said, that certainly it should be received in confidence.

Mr. Martin. You ought not to have entered into any such engagement.

Mr. Tazewell. I beg you to understand, Mr. Martin, that I did not; but when I heard the letter, I thought it improper to mention it, and as a gentlemen, sir, I will not. And although I have frequently spoken of General Wilkinson's testimony, I have never mentioned the contents of that letter.

General Wilkinson. Did you not understand me to say that my expressions, calculated to draw forth the views of Colonel Burr, particularly related to my letters in the spring of 1806?

Answer. The only letters which General Wilkinson spoke of were subsequent to Mr. Burr's visit to St. Louis. General Wilkinson thought, it probable that he had written the letter post-marked the 13th of May; but he did not positively recollect.

Several other questions were put to and answered by Mr. T., which the rapidity of his manner made it impossible for us to take down.

SATURDAY, October 3.

Mr. Tazewell was again called by Colonel Burr, and asked whether he had observed any inconsistency in the evidence of General Wilkinson?

Mr. Tazewell said it was not for him to state what his impressions were, arising from the whole tenor of General Wilkinson's evidence. Indeed, it was impossible for him to answer a question put in that way; if he were asked whether in any particular part of General Wilkinson's testimony he had observed a variance, he would answer the question. He was then asked, whether he had observed any inconsistency or contradiction in the evidence delivered by General Wilkinson before the judge, and that given to the grand jury? His answer was, none at all. But, said Mr. Tazewell, as I have gone so far in speaking of my impressions, it may be proper for me to state what opinion I had formed. I must say, that I saw no good reason for General Wilkinson to invite Colonel Burr to the Western country.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect whether the testimony of Swartwout coincided with that of General Wilkinson?

Answer. They could not be said to oppose each other in their testimony. Mr. Swartwout was examined first, and many of the circumstances to which he deposed were unknown to General Wilkinson.

Mr. Hay. I speak as to the conversations between Mr. Swartwout and General Wilkinson.

Mr. Tazewell. Perhaps there was this difference: General Wilkinson stated, that in the absence of Colonel Cushing, which was spoken of by both of them, Mr. Swartwout slipped into his hands the ciphered letter from Colonel Burr. Mr. Swartwout, who discovered the utmost frankness and candor in his evidence, stated the transaction in a different manner. He declared that the letter was delivered openly, without any effort to conceal it.

Mr. Hay. But they both stated the fact to be the same, that it was delivered in the absence of Colonel Cushing?

Answer. Yes. They both stated that fact in the same way. I would not be willing to be understood that I doubted any thing Mr. Swartwout said. Although he appeared before the grand jury under very unfavorable circumstances, and my impressions were very strong against him; yet the very frank and candid manner in which he gave his testimony, I must confess, raised him very high in my estimation, and induced me to form a very different opinion of him from that which I had before entertained.

Answer. No; I never conversed with any but Colonel Burr, and then only to make a bargain.

Question. Were you to have waited at Natchez till the arrival of Colonel Burr?

Answer. Yes; I got to Natchez on the 5th of January. The trial of Col. Burr was in February.

Question. What did you wait so long for? Answer. I had business with Mr. Ponsonby.

Question. Did that business detain you so long?

Answer. No, I chose to remain. It was partly curiosity and partly business that detained me; I might have finished my business in a day or so.

Question. Did you get payment for the articles in the boat?

Answer. No; I never have for any of them.

Question. Did you deliver any of them? I did, some of them.

Mr. McRae. Were you summoned here? Answer. Yes; Mr. Ashley sent me word to be here.

Question. Had Mr. Ashley been down the river? Answer. No; Mr. Ashley was in the back part of the country.

Question. What reason had you to believe that Mr. Ashley had the power to summon you?

Answer. I was told that he was summoning others, and he sent me a verbal message to come, but I don't know by whom; I understood, too, from Captain Floyd that I should be wanted.

Question. When did you receive a subpoena? Answer. Not before I came here.

Deposition of Captain Bissel.

Mr. Burr. You have heard the testimony of Dunbaugh; I wish you to state every thing that came within your personal knowledge; how he came off; whether on my application, or by your direction. Did you receive any message from me by Mr. Hopkins?

Answer. None further than a billet you sent me on the morning of the 26th. It was delivered at my quarters at Fort Massac, by Mr. Hopkins. He was introduced to me by Mr. Fort, who had been previously introduced to me by a merchant of New Haven. Mr. Fort walked up with him, and took breakfast with me. I had then heard of Colonel Burr's acquittal in Kentucky, and I supposed he was peaceably descending the river.

Mr. Wickham read the billet in the following terms:

I.

DEAR SIR:

MOUTH OF CUMBERLAND, December 25.

I avail myself of the opportunity of Mr. Hopkins to offer you salutations and the compliments of the season. Having proposed to descend the river in a few days, I shall have the pleasure of paying my respects to you on my way, and of receiving your commands for the South.

I am, dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. BURR.

Capt. BISSEL, Commanding at Massac. (per Mr. Hopkins.)

Mr. Burr. Did you receive any other letter from me besides that?

Answer. None; I had a little conversation with Mr. Hopkins; none about Colonel Burr's passing the garrison. On the evening of the 29th was the next information I received. Mr. Tyler arrived with his barge; they took supper with me. After supper some one of the gentlemen said they must return to Colonel Burr, who would stay in the bend, above, all night. I invited some of the gentlemen to take a pallet with me, which they agreed to. Col. Burr's boats nevertheless came down in the night; I had retired to bed when my sentry hailed aloud; I arose, and, undressed, repaired to the fort. Some one said that Colonel Burr's boats were passing. I thought this a singular thing, after I had been told that Colonel Burr would stay in the bend, above; his boats went down to the bend or bayou, a mile below the fort. When I returned to the house, I found that Tyler had gone to the boats.

Mr. Burr. Is not the lower bend a good harbor? Answer. It is.

Question. Is not the river just opposite to the garrison a bad one?

Answer. It is. I have seen boats sometimes staved on the rocks in that part of the river.

I rose soon in the morning to pay my respects to Colonel Burr; I went down in my boat, and was introduced into his room; I invited him to breakfast, which he declined; I invited him to dinner, but he declined all my civilities. He asked me if I had received any news from below. I replied that I had not. He then informed me that General Wilkinson had made a compromise with the Spaniards. He said he was sorry for it, and that General Wilkinson ought to have fought them. I observed, that I supposed General Wilkinson had acted by orders.

Mr. Burr. How came Dunbaugh to go?

Answer. After breakfast, while I was at my ice house, Dunbaugh came and asked for a furlough for twenty days. He had previously asked me for a furlough to go down the river to do business. After a short time I agreed that he should go; this happened while on parade, and not at the back of the fort, as his testimony states. It is proper to mention that a boy had come up with two billets, one for Dunbaugh and the other for me. Here is mine. When I was in Colonel Burr's boat, he had asked me if I knew of any opportunity to send to St. Louis by the way of the lead mines, and whether he could procure an express. I told him that I had reviewed my garrison, and that I had thought of sending a messenger, and Dunbaugh to be that messenger, as he had a good horse; that if he would bear his expenses, Dunbaugh might go.

Mr. Burr. Is it not impossible to get an express in that part of the country?

Answer. It is. There is no population in the neighborhood of the garrison. The Indian title is just extinguished. They are just surveying the land, but it is at present a mere military post.

[Here Mr. Wickham read the letter in the following terms:]

2.

SIR:

JANUARY 30.

If you will give Sergeant Dunbaugh a furlough for twenty days, I engage that he shall conform to the terms of it. In this case, he will not go to the lead mines.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. BURR.

Mr. Burr. Was Dunbaugh inspected? Answer. He was, and mustered too.

Question. Did he show his clothes? Answer. He did.

Question. Did you tell him to borrow any clothes in which he was to appear on parade?

Answer. I did not. His own clothes were then there, and are now in his own box at Fort Massac. He wanted to carry his clothes, but I forbade him. I gave him this furlough, with a pointed order to return at the end of twenty days.

3.

FORT MASSAC, December 31, 1806.

Sergeant Jacob Dunbaugh, of my company, has leave of absence for twenty days from date, at which time he is to return to this garrison.

D. BISSEL, Captain 1st Regt. U. S. infantry, comm'g.

Endorsement.

BRUNSBURG, January 23.

Sergeant Jacob Dunbaugh having expressed a wish to return to his company at Fort Massac; and there being no regular officer at this place, I have, from a respect to the public service, on his application, to request that he may be permitted to join his company.

BENJAMIN BRUIN.

Endorsed: "on hour way to Pety Gulph directed to Joseph Calverts too miles from the gulph."

When I handed him this furlough, I also delivered him a small billet for Gen. Wilkinson, informing him of what I had done: here is a copy of that letter.

4.

SIR:

FORT MASSAC, December 31, 1806.

Sergeant Jacob Dunbaugh, of my company, having solicited the indulgence of a furlough for twenty days, and Col. Burr pledging himself that Dunbaugh should conform to the terms of it, I have thought proper to grant the indulgence, and hope it may meet your approbation.

Col. Burr will inform you how I am and how situated. Mrs. Bissel is still confined to the house, but I think recovering.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANL. BISSEL, Captain.

Gen. WILKINSON. (per Col. BURR.)

Mr. Burr. Do you remember sending me any message by Dunbaugh, to the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. I remember well that I sent him to buy a beef; and told him, if he saw Col. Burr, he was to present my compliments to him; but I did not tell him to proffer my services to Col. Burr, nor to any one else; I am an officer of the United States only; that part of his evidence is false.

Mr. Burr. Did you receive a letter from Dunbaugh while he was at Baton Rouge?

Answer. Yes. On the 11th of June I received a letter which he wrote me from Baton Rouge. There is no date to it; the post-mark is Washington, Miss. Ter. I received it with other letters from New Orleans.—Captain Bissel then read the following letter:

5.

HONORED SIR:

With sorrow I take Pen in hand to inform you that I had to tell the officers that you sent me as a Spy against Col. Burr and had to make out of what I new againg him I wrote that you sent me on that Purpes the thought My Capt. was interestred I told them that he did not know what Burr's mening was to take some men down the River with him. My Capt. thought as I had been down with him before that I cold find out what his intention was. Lieut. Roney took me up as a Diseerter and put me on board of the Schooner Revenge to send me to New Orleans but I did not go he tuck my furlow from me I told Him if He would give me my furlow that I would go to the General but he would not.

I should be thankful if my Capt. would send me some money if their is any for me and my Boots if my Detes air paid. I wishd more than A thousand times I had staid at Fort Massac I have nothing more But still remain your humble Serv't

J., DUNBAUGH Sergt.

(In the margin.) John Preehard is in due me 3 Dollars.

DAN'L BISSEL Capt. Commanding.

I am at Baton Rouge and will Remain untill I Get a pardon.

Mr. Burr. Had J. Dunbaugh been discharged from service the year before?

Answer. Dunbaugh had been a faithful sergeant, but I represented to General Wilkinson the propriety of permitting him to find a substitute, who could do more service, as he had lost the use of one of his fingers. This defect is mentioned in the advertisement of him as a deserter.

Mr. Burr. Has he been tried yet for desertion?

Answer. No: I have not yet preferred a charge against him.

Question. Is he liable to a prosecution? Answer. Yes, I suppose so.

Question. Did you ever make him a present of a breastplate?

Answer. I did, but not at the time he has stated. It was one day when I lost a son. Mr. Owens was about leaving the garrison at that time, and presented me with a very handsome breastplate. I gave my old one to my sergeant. This was about the last of October, or the beginning of November.

Question. Did you make a report to the Government, which has been published?

Answer. I think a letter of mine to the Secretary of War has been published, with a letter of General Jackson's.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Hay. Is this the furlough that you gave?

Answer. It is; but there is some endorsement on it, of which I know nothing.

Mr. Hay. Ay, that is some writing of Judge Bruin's.

Mr. Burr. Have magistrates a right to enlarge furloughs?

Answer. I know of no such thing in the articles of war.

Mr. Hay. Had you any previous acquaintance with Colonel Burr?

Answer. Yes. I had seen him at Fort Massac, in General Wilkinson's quarters.

Question. Did you know that Dunbaugh was going down the river?

Answer. Yes; I gave him permission; and such had been my confidence in Col. Burr, and such my ignorance of the movements in the Western country, that had he asked me for a sergeant and six men, I should have indulged him.

Question. When you gave him his furlough, how far down the river did you expect him to go?

Answer. I supposed not farther than Madrid. However, I do not recollect that I gave him any particular injunction as to that point, because he was to return any time within twenty days.

Mr. Hay. You say that he was your confidential sergeant?

Answer. He was. I had raised him from a first corporal. He was illiterate, and I had requested him to learn to write. Perhaps I had set copies for him myself.

Question. You had a good opinion of him, then, till lately? Answer. I had.

Mr. Wirt. You said that Col. Burr wanted a messenger to go to St. Louis? Answer. I did.

Question. Do the lead mines lie on a land route to St. Louis? Answer. They do.

Mr. Wirt. I see, in Burr's letter, that Dunbaugh was not to go by the lead mines. Did you understand that he was going by them?

Answer. Oh! no; I supposed that he was going down the river to New Madrid; perhaps to bring back letters. I knew nothing of Col. Burr's movements.

Question. Did you conceive that Col. Burr guaranteed his return?

Answer. I had but a short conversation with Col. Burr, for I was at that time busy. Dunbaugh applied to me for a furlough, but he had before applied to me for one to go to New Madrid.

Question. Then I understand you did not rely on Burr's guaranty?

Answer. I cannot say. When this billet was put into my hands, I was engaged on parade; and I believe I told Dunbaugh that I would see about it.

Mr. McRae. I think you said, that you knew nothing of this expedition?

Answer. I had heard that Col. Burr had been tried and acquitted in Kentucky, and I had heard it from traveling, ignorant people, who could not give me much information.

Question. Then you had received no such information as induced you to question the propriety of his movements?

Answer. None. I was acquainted with his standing, when he left the Senate of the United States. I respected him as a former Vice President of the United States, and I felt disposed to treat him with all the civility which was due to his rank.

Question. When you granted this furlough to Dunbaugh, did you not advert to his engaging in Burr's service, and exhort him to obey his orders?

Answer. I did not. I only granted him a furlough for twenty days.

Question. Did you speak at all with Dunbaugh when he applied for the furlough?

Answer. I recollect to have told him that Colonel B. had also applied for him to go. I always speak to my men when they go on furlough, to enjoin on them propriety of conduct. I did not call him to my room and give him any private instructions, as his testimony states. I might have called him before me, and told him to treat Col. B. with politeness. I so felt towards him both at that time and in 1805.

Mr. Burr. Have you the advertisement of desertion?

Answer. Yes; it is filed in court. It was read.

No. 6.

TEN DOLLARS REWARD.

Fort Massac, January 19, 1807.

Deserted, on the 19th of January, 1807, when on the indulgence of a furlough, Jacob Dunbaugh, sergeant in Captain D. Bissel's company, 1st United States' regiment of infantry. He is of a Dutch descent, and is about twenty-eight years of age, five feet one and a half inches high, brown hair, blue eyes, fair complexion. He is by trade a hatter. He has lost the use of one of his fingers on the left hand, which stands crooked inward. Whoever will take up said deserter, and deliver him up to any military officer in the United States, shall receive the above reward and reasonable expenses.

DANIEL BISSEL, Capt. com.

[Endorsement.]

I do hereby certify that the within advertisement, among several others of the same tenor and date, was handed to me by Captain Daniel Bissel on the morning of my departure from Fort Massac, 1st of February last; which advertisements I distributed in the Territories of Mississippi and Orleans. I do further certify, that Captain Bissel requested me to make use of every exertion in my power to have the within mentioned deserter apprehended.

Given under my hand, this twenty-eighth day of July, at Nashville, in the year 1807.

THOS. A. CLAIBORNE.

When Dunbaugh overstayed his time, I wrote to some of my friends, among the rest to Lieutenant Hughes, requesting him to report to General Wilkinson the desertion of Dunbaugh; I expressed the great confidence I had in him, my anxiety lest he should have been deluded away by the followers of Colonel Burr, or lest he should be sick. If he was sick, I requested Mr. Claiborne to furnish him with some money; if he was not, to advertise him as a deserter.

Mr. Hay. Have you any objection to produce that letter?

Answer. I will look at it, and then determine.

I presume it would be unnecessary to state the civilities which have passed to and from Colonel Burr. On Butler's trial I was frequently with him in the morning. He had been acquainted with Mrs. Bissel from a child. He had sent her a barrel of apples from the mouth of Cumberland; and she had returned some little thing or other, such as preserves.

Examination of Judge Todd.

SATURDAY, October 3.

Colonel Burr. Did Colonel Lynch submit to you, for your opinion, the title-papers of Bastrop's grant?

Answer. Colonel Lynch showed me the title-papers on which he said the grant was founded.

Question. Did you say any thing about my having acquired an interest in it? Answer. No.

Question. Did you give any opinion as to the title?

Answer. I was not sufficiently informed of the laws of the Territory to give any decided opinion. I discovered the grant was founded on a condition which it was said had not been complied with, and I was rather inclined to doubt its validity.

Question. Were you in Kentucky during the summer of the last year? Answer. I was.

Question. Was there a good deal of alarm among the people? Answer. There was.

Question. Was that owing to any acts which I had done?

Answer. I saw publications in the prints stating that preparations were making of boats and provisions in the State of Ohio; a publication also appeared in the "Western World," under the signature of "Observer," which excited a good deal of alarm.

Question. How many years have you been a resident of Kentucky?

Answer. Ever since 1786.

Question. Can you state what has been the general reputation of General Wilkinson for the last four or five years?

Answer. For the last four or five years I have not seen General Wilkinson.

Mr. Wirt. His reputation, as to what?

Colonel Burr. As to integrity and truth.

Answer. I never heard that questioned. For the last twelve months there has been an unfavorable opinion against him, owing to his official and public conduct; but I never heard of any thing further against him but what related to his official and public conduct. There have been publications and republications circulated injurious to him; but whether true or false, I cannot say.

Mr. Wirt. Do you recollect what kind of an instrument Bastrop's grant is?

Answer. Not of the kind I have usually seen. The instrument is from the Governor of New Orleans to Bastrop, granting him so much land on condition that he would settle so many families upon it: the Government of Spain to furnish them with provisions for such a length of time. I understood, from Colonel Lynch, that the Government had not complied with the condition on its part.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect whether the time for the performance of the condition had elapsed?

Answer. Yes; it had elapsed.

Question. Did Lynch show you any thing deducing his title from Bastrop?

Answer. No, but he said his title was regularly deduced from Bastrop.

Question. Was it the original, or a copy of the grant you saw?

Answer. It was the original, in the Spanish language.

Mr. McRae. Was the only evidence of Lynch's title his own declarations? - Was there no other evidence of title to him?

Answer. No other evinced deducing a title from Bastrop.

Evidence of Colonel McKee.

Mr. Burr. Did you see any person seized in the Mississippi Territory?

Answer. At Natchez I saw upwards of twenty of your party seized.

Question. When was this? Answer. About the 18th of February.

Question. Was it before or after my trial? Answer. It was after the trial.

Question. Did you see Mr. Graham there?

Answer. I saw the Governor, Colonel Claiborne, and Mr. Graham.

Question. Had you any conversation with either of those gentlemen about seizing me by military authority?

Answer. I did converse with Mr. Graham on that subject. I expressed my regret at seeing you seized. He told me that I should soon perceive the cause of it.

Question. Did you know of any measures for seizing me by martial law?

Answer. I heard that some had been taken, and these reports were still further confirmed by a letter which I received from General Wilkinson.

Question. What was in the letter?

Answer. The postscript stated that if I wished to make myself acceptable to the Government, I must seize Burr, Blannerhasset, Smith, Tyler, Floyd, or Ralston.

Question. Who conveyed this letter to you? Answer. Commodore Shaw.

Question. "If you wished to make yourself acceptable to the Government?"

Answer. If you wished to tax the Government beyond denial, or some such expression.*

Question. Was any proposition made to you by General Wilkinson relative to the Spanish colonies?

Answer. There was.

Question. Was there any invitation to you in relation to these colonies?

Answer. In 1805, about Christmas, I received a letter from General Wilkinson, asking me whether I could not raise a number of cavalry to follow his fortunes on a crusade to Mexico.

Question. Have you that letter?

Answer. I have it not here, but on the Mississippi. I do not particularly recollect its date.

Question. What number of cavalry was mentioned?

Answer. I know not.

Mr. Blannerhasset. At the time General Wilkinson wrote to desire you to seize me, was I in the hands of the civil authority?

Answer. So I understood.

Cross-examined.

Mr. McRae. You held an office under the General Government?

Answer. I have not been in one for four years.

Question. What office was it?

Answer. I was agent for Indian affairs to the Choctaw nation.

Question. And when did your office cease?

Answer. I was removed by the President in 1802.

Question. Did you not receive a letter from Colonel Burr through the hand of Lieutenant Jackson?

Answer. I did.

Question. Where is that letter? Answer. It is destroyed.

* Copy of a postscript to a letter of General James Wilkinson to John McKee, dated

"NEW ORLEANS, February 8, 1807.

"If you want to distinguish yourself, and tax the Government beyond denial, go alone and seize Burr, or Blannerhasset, Tyler, or Ralston, or Floyd, or all of them, and deliver them to the flotilla."

Mr. McRae. State its principal contents.

Answer. It was written on the 6th of January, 1807, and invited me to meet him at Bayou Pierre on the 13th.

Question. Do you recollect whether there was nothing more in this letter, besides the invitation?

Answer. I recollect nothing more. The letter itself I burnt.

Mr. Hay. Was no particular object stated in this letter? Answer. No.

Question. And why, sir, did you burn that letter?

Answer. Because I saw men arrested for much less matter than carrying such a letter, and I put it out of my possession.

Question. You say there was a postscript to a letter which you received from General Wilkinson; what did you understand was the purport of that letter?

Answer. I did suppose that we should go to war with the Spaniards.

Question. Did he state that the expedition was unauthorized by Government?

Answer. He did not.

Mr. Wirt. He gave you, then, no impressions of an illicit object?

Answer. He did not at that time.

Question. You answered it? Answer. Yes.

Question. Where is your answer? Answer. This is my answer.

Here Mr. Hay read the following letter:

DEAR GENERAL:

CHICKASAWS, February 26, 1807.

Your kind remembrancer of the 3d of December I received, and had written to you immediately after at the Bluffs, but a French-Indian countryman, who promised to call on me for it, went off without doing so. I had written a great deal about recruiting in Tennessee, about cutting and slashing, and packing dollars, and enjoying otium cum dignitate. But "all our differences amicably settled with Spain" knocks all these Utopia to the devil, and I am again awake to the painful anxiety attendant on a state of suspense. I have requested my friend Moore to press the Secretary to decide, and I expect his answer in less than a month. Whatever my fate may be, I must always feel myself deeply your debtor for the solicitude you have manifested for me.

Has any news reached your capital from Captains Lewis and Clark? it is rumored here that they have been killed; I hope, sincerely, there is nothing in it.

I have the honor to be, with esteem and affection, your friend,

JOHN McKEE.

His Excellency GENERAL WILKINSON.

Mr. Hay. Is that also your writing, dated as late as February last? Answer. It is.

Mr. Wirt. At the time of this correspondence, and before, did you consider General Wilkinson as your friend, whose agency you were willing to employ with the Secretary of War?

Answer. I expected much less, sir, from his interest than his disposition to serve me.

Question. You considered him, then, as a friend, whom you would be willing to trust? Answer. I did.

Question. Is this your writing? Answer. It is.

Here Mr. Wirt read the following letter:

DEAR SIR:

CHICKASAWS, August 1, 1805.

Your friendly talk from Pittsburg, 13th May, I had the pleasure to receive, at this place, a few days ago. I thank you sincerely for your letter to the Secretary of War. I hope it will have the effect at least of relieving me from the most painful suspense I have ever experienced. I had addressed him myself from Tennessee just before I set out, and am now beginning to look for his answer. I would have written you sooner on the subject of my expectations, but I thought them so well founded as not to require even mentioning to the Secretary; they were founded on a direct and unsolicited promise from himself to me that I should be provided for in Louisiana as soon as the Government should be organized. This was confirmed to me afterwards through Colonel Moore and General Trigg, and last winter he repeated to several of my friends his continued disposition to serve me; but I remain as ignorant as I was two years ago in what way. I hope it may be in your quarter, and soon, for a state of suspense is a penance worse by far than fasting. I trust, like a good Catholic, that I am in a fair way for heaven, even if I should have to pass through a jail.

I think I understood from Mr. Dinsmore that he had written to you at large on the late successful negotiation with this nation; he has to-day started to Natchez, from thence to the Choctaws, where, about the beginning of October, the commissioners are to meet that nation at Mount Dexter, and make another attempt to treat for land. I have had some talk with both the White and Red Mingoës, about securing a tract of land to a Choctaw boy that has contrived to prattle himself into my affection; this is my business here; my prospects of success are not very flattering, as I find the business must be clogged with other negotiations.

On the 28th ultimo Colonel Burr passed this on his return from New Orleans to Nashville, and I understand he intended to visit your Government.

If I am disappointed in the hope of going up the Mississippi when I leave this, I will inform you of my course and prospects.

With sincere respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

JOHN McKEE.

His Excellency General WILKINSON.

Mr. McRae then also read the three following letters:

DEAR GENERAL:

CHICKASAWS, October 19, 1805.

Your friendly letter of the 8th ultimo I received by post on the 15th instant, and from some cause or other it was the most acceptable I ever received; it found me here alone, far gone in the blue devils, doubting whether I had not better expatriate myself, and try my fortune amidst the storm now gathering in Europe. You cannot think it strange that I feel extremely mortified when I tell you that I have, a year past since May last, been waiting in daily expectation of receiving orders to repair in a public capacity to some part of your Government; this expectation was excited by the unsolicited promises of the Secretary of War. It is true he has still held out to my friends the idea that he intended to provide for me, and it must be admitted he has taken time enough to do it well. In the mean time, however, I am suffering the most painful anxiety, and my cash is exhausted to a small sum.

I have always suspected Claiborne of injuring me with the Government, though he declared, with uplifted hands, to the contrary. I was informed that he had in 1801 made some representations to you and Colonel Hawkins, founded on a report made to him by Colonel Joslyn, that I had abused him and the President, in a conversation at Mr. McIntosh's, in this nation, in very severe and improper language. I have since seen Colonel Joslyn, who gave me a certificate, of which the enclosed is a copy; for what I said of Mr. Claiborne, a candidate for an office in the State of which I am a citizen, I certainly can be accountable only to him, not to the Government that has since clothed him with the mantle of its power. If I had learned ornate et politè dicere to a man whose head and heart were neither of them formed to my taste on the scale of great Mingo's, perhaps I might have been fitted with an office ere this; however, nil desperandum, Teucro duce. I'll remain here till X'mas. The Choctaw treaty, I fear, will fall through this season, and that will not be among my least disappointments, for I had some expectation of procuring at it a tract of land for my young Choctaw. It is reported here from Cumberland that the Secretary of War has written that, if the Choctaws wish to sell land, they must send deputies to Washington.

Cressite, &c. is very catholic; but when I proceeded farther to "bleach high" I blushed to the finger's ends; but why, I would not tell you for all my hopes in the Government—on paper, I mean.

With sincere respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

JOHN McKEE.

His Excellency General WILKINSON.

The irregularity of the mail-carriers occasioned this to be a mail later than I expected. I am now informed by a letter from Mr. Dinsmore, that the commissioners will meet the Choctaws about 1st November; and this morning I set out with your friend General W. Colbert to Mount Dexter, to attend the treaty.

J. McK.

DEAR GENERAL:

CHICKASAW BLUFFS, December 26, 1806.

So many opportunities present themselves here for conveying a letter towards Orleans, that I would be ungrateful to leave this without at least offering you the compliments of the season, and my hearty prayers for the success of your bark on this tempestuous sea of liberty; for, with all my confidence in her staunchness, I cannot help feeling some anxiety on account of sunken rocks and the cursed pirates that infest her track.

I set out to-morrow morning for the Chickasaws; and if you should have leisure to inform me of your health by post, I will remain there long enough to receive it, and I hope not much longer.

I have the honor to be, with very sincere respect and esteem, dear general, your obedient servant,

JOHN McKEE.

His Excellency General WILKINSON.

DEAR GENERAL:

NATCHEZ, January 25, 1807.

I wrote you a note from the Chickasaw Bluffs about X'mas. Soon after I set out for this place, where I have been for ten days, and will yet remain, perhaps, two weeks longer, just to laugh at the ridiculous scenes that are passing before us. Here is a wide field for conjecture, and every man takes his own direction. The Little Mingo here has assumed a military attitude to defend the altar and the throne, as well against Colonel Burr as the encroachments of the army.

I have little doubt that ere this you will have set me down as a Burrite, and as little that you will believe me when I assure you that as yet I am not; and I must know the object and the means better than I do before I can be. It is true that, having nothing to do, and hearing that some great enterprise was on foot, patronised by many great men, and winked at by the Government, I came here to profit of any opportunity that might offer of bettering my situation by honorable enterprise. As yet, I see no way open but in the face of my country's laws; and, desperate as my fortune is, I will never deliberately do an act that will prevent me from returning to the spot where I was born.

I have lately received a letter from Mr. Simpson, saying "your friend General W. wishes you were here, as he has it now in his power to serve you." This, to me, just now, is very interesting information; and by return of the mail will be glad to hear from you.

Need I tell you that considerable pains are taken and taking here to render your name unpopular; and by persons, too, I am informed, who speak much of the laws and constituted authorities of the country.

Your friends Dinsmore, Freeman, and McKee occupy a room here, and laugh at this puddle in a storm.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your excellency's obedient servant,

JOHN McKEE.

His Excellency General WILKINSON.

DEAR GENERAL:

HUNSTON, February 16, 1807.

I received a few days since at Natchez, your favor of the 5th instant, and nothing could have given me more pleasure; for the strange distant reserve of some of my friends in this quarter, and an observation from Doctor Carmichael that my note from the Bluffs had excited some suspicions of me in a bosom that shall never be justified in harboring any, had mortified me sorely; read that note again, and if it does not speak the language of a heart that loves you, I must have been very unfortunate in expressing myself.

I never was a Burrite, nor can I ever give myself up to schemes of lawless plunder; it is certain that in my present situation I might have engaged in any honorable enterprise, however hazardous, but the late one, such as it has been represented is such as I hope no friend of mine will ever suspect me of favoring.

I have not the means, and, if I had, I have not at this moment the time, to give you much information on the state of things in this country.

May your purse keep pace with your heart, and may you live a thousand years.

Your affectionate friend,

JOHN McKEE.

His Excellency General WILKINSON.

Mr. Burr. Did you make any reply to that postscript?

Answer. I did not. I answered the letter itself.

Mr. Hay complimented Colonel McKee's letters; declaring them to be excellent models of the epistolary style.

Mr. Burr here observed that a number of witnesses whom he had summoned had gone away during his indisposition; and that he had but one more witness to produce, except to establish certain circumstances against General Eaton.

Mr. Blannerhasset then requested that a Mr. Gates might be called in on his behalf.

Testimony of Mr. Gates.

Mr. Blannerhasset. Will you state what you know about the seizing of the boats and provisions near Marietta?

Answer. I was present at the time of seizing the boats. There were a few barrels of kiln-dried corn meal on board, and a few barrels of apples belonging to Mr. Putnam.

Question. Did you see any officers on duty?

Answer. I saw militia officers; General Buell and his aid-de-camp, Major Clark.

Question. Were you a militia man?

Answer. I told them they had no right to call upon me in that character, during my present capacity.

Question. You had been used only to carry a fife, and not a musket? Answer. Yes.

Question. Did they accept of your apology for not acting?

Answer. They said that if I would attend at 12 o'clock, with my musket, I should be immediately discharged.

Question. Did you see any authority under which General Buell acted?

Answer. Yes. He showed me a paper, which he said was his authority from Governor Tiffin.

Question. Did you see the boat that was built for my family? What has become of it?

Answer. The last time I saw it, it lay in a very uneasy posture near Marietta.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Wirt. As far as I understand you, you were called on to attack the boats? Answer. Yes.

Question. And you were called on to carry a musket? Answer. Yes.

Question. And you were unwilling to do it? Answer. I was.

Question. That is, you were willing to whistle, and not to fight? Answer. Yes.

The following deposition of Charles Fenton Mercer was then offered on the part of the accused, and read:

STATE OF VIRGINIA, City of Richmond.

Personally appeared before me, Edward Carrington, one of the magistrates of the city of Richmond aforesaid, Charles Fenton Mercer, of the county of Loudoun and State aforesaid, a witness summoned to attend the trial of Aaron Burr, who being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposed as followeth, viz: That having been called to the neighborhood of Point Pleasant, at the mouth of the Great Kenhawa, between the 20th of September and the 6th December, 1806, to transact some business relative to an estate which he has in the county of Mason, he became acquainted with Mr. Harman Blannerhasset, through the introduction of Mr. J. Alston, of South Carolina, once a fellow-student of the deponent's in the college of New Jersey. This acquaintance commenced about the first of November, near an open boat on the Ohio, in which Mr. Alston, attended by his family with a carriage and pair of horses, and accompanied by Mr. Blannerhasset, was descending the river as far as Kentucky, from whence he expected to prosecute his journey home by land. The reputation which Mr. Blannerhasset had acquired for talents, learning, and taste, and an eccentric, and somewhat a romantic mode of life, rendered this unexpected interview one of the most interesting events which occurred to this deponent during his residence on the Ohio; and he accepted with much pleasure an invitation from Mr. Blannerhasset to visit his then beautiful and once much-celebrated island. It is true, that about that period, and for several weeks before, reports were in circulation, that Mr. Blannerhasset was engaged with Colonel Burr in some common enterprise, to which many persons imputed a highly criminal design. But those reports, and especially the injurious suspicions often connected with them, seemed to have arisen from pre-existing prejudices against Colonel Burr, which it was not difficult to trace to an origin very remote from the designs now ascribed to him. As the reports were believed and propagated by those who spoke of them with a conviction and a zeal proportioned to their ignorance or malignity, and as they were in themselves most improbable, absurd, and ridiculous, the deponent considered them entitled to no serious consideration. About the middle of November the deponent again saw Mr. Blannerhasset, at the house of Col. Andrew Lewis, on the Ohio, three miles above Point Pleasant, where he alighted from his horse for an hour or two, in his journey from Kentucky. In a conversation which then occurred, he adverted with much sensibility to the reports above mentioned, which had then become more current, and to which every day was adding some new exaggeration, and declared them to be utterly false. He was the last man in the world, he said, who would be disposed to disturb the peace or impair the prosperity of the United States. Weary of political agitations in his native country, he had sought, he added, and found, an asylum in America, the tranquillity of which he could never violate. He had, indeed, he admitted, united with Colonel Burr (whom public rumor had injured as much as himself,) in the plan of colonizing and improving a large tract of country on the Red River, originally granted by the King of Spain to one Baron Bastrop, and lately purchased by Colonel Burr of a gentleman of Kentucky. The tract contains eight hundred thousand acres, and the consideration which Colonel Burr and himself were to pay for it was $40,000; but by distributing a part of it in hundred acre farms among a number of emigrants whom such an inducement, they expected, would invite to join them, they had no doubt, on the most moderate estimate, of being able to raise the value of the remainder to more than $1,000,000. Mr. Blannerhasset declined the pressing invitation of Colonel Lewis to make a longer suspension of his journey, alleging as his reason for prosecuting it with the greater rapidity, that the servant who accompanied him had been sent to him in Kentucky by Mrs. Blannerhasset, to urge his immediate return home for the protection of his house from the fury of a mob who had threatened to burn it down. He added, also, that he expected to leave the island in ten or twelve days after his return, as it was his intention to remove his family down the river before the severity of the approaching winter set in; and renewing his former invitation to the deponent, politely hoped that he would commence his journey to the interior of Virginia within that period.

Some time after this conversation, on Saturday evening, the sixth day of December, the deponent arrived in the course of his journey home, at the shore of Ohio opposite to the island of Mr. Blannerhasset; and having first learned with some surprise that Mr. Blannerhasset was yet on the island, crossed over to his house in a violent storm of wind and rain. That evening and the following day he spent at the most elegant seat in Virginia, and in the society of Mr. Blannerhasset and his lovely and accomplished lady. He saw no other persons on the island, except their two infant children, their servants, Mr. Neale, the clerk of the court of Wood county, a Mr. Putnam, who had come from the Ohio side of the river to rent the island of the proprietor who was soon to abandon it, some young ladies who visited Mrs. Blannerhasset on Sunday morning, and two or three of the inhabitants of the Virginia shore, who came to inquire of the deponent the price of some lands which he had advertised in the adjoining county of Mason. The deponent having expressed a desire, which he had felt on visiting this country the year before, to become the purchaser of Mr. Blannerhasset's farm, he had the goodness to show him the plan and arrangement of his house. Every room within it was opened to his inspection. As he walked through its different apartments, the proprietor frequently apologized for the confusion into which its furniture was thrown by his preparation for his leaving it; and observed that the greater part of his furniture, his musical instruments, and his library, containing several thousand volumes of books, were packed up for his immediate removal. His children were also habited in their travelling dresses. Nothing, he added, delayed his departure, except the unfinished condition of the boats which were to take him down the river. Finding that Mr. Blannerhasset estimated his farm, containing one hundred and eighty acres of land, with its improvements, at $50,000, which, he remarked, was ten thousand dollars less than they had cost him, the deponent abandoned all idea of becoming their purchaser; and the rest of the time which he spent at this beautiful seat was employed in conversation with its proprietor and his family. It turned upon his removal to the Washita, the name of his new purchase. He pressed the deponent to become a participant in it, suggesting how much it would augment his fortune, and enforcing the inducement which he offered to his interest, by an assurance that the society which he invited the deponent to join would soon become the most select and agreeable in America. He spoke of Colonel Burr as the moral head of it, and when the deponent expressed a doubt of the permanency and happiness of a union formed under such auspices, and dwelt on such traits of the general character of Colonel Burr as he deemed exceptionable, Mr. Blannerhasset vindicated him with the enthusiasm of an ardent admirer and friend, and furnished the deponent with facts of which he had never before heard, and which he treasured in his memory as the foundation of further inquiry into the character of that gentleman. They related entirely to occurrences of ancient date, and on this side of the Allegany.

Mr. Blannerhasset having intended, before the deponent reached his house, to visit Marietta on Sunday evening, the deponent availed himself of a double motive to quit this attractive spot. He did not leave it, however, without regretting that the engagements of its proprietor and his own dreary journey, but just begun in the commencement of winter, forbade him to prolong a visit which, although so transient, had afforded him so much pleasure. It is but a tribute of merited gratitude to add, that he left it in perfect good-will to all its inhabitants. All that he had seen, heard, or felt, corresponded so little with the criminal designs imputed to Mr. Blannerhasset, that if he could have visited him with unfavorable sentiments, they would have vanished before the light of a species of evidence which, if not reducible to the strict rules of legal testimony, hath, nevertheless, a potent influence over all sensitive hearts, and which, though it possess not the formal sanction, hath often more truth than oaths or affirmations. What! will a man who, weary of the agitations of the world, of its noise and vanity, has unambitiously retired to a solitary island in the heart of a desert, and created there a terrestrial paradise, the very flowers and shrubs and vines of which he has planted, nurtured, and reared with his own hands; a man whose soul is accustomed to toil in the depths of science, and to repose beneath the bowers of literature, whose ear is formed to the harmony of sound, and whose touch and breath daily awaken it from a variety of melodious instruments—will such a man start up in the decline of life from the pleasing dream of seven years' slumber, to carry fire and sword to the peaceful habitations of men who have never done him wrong? Are his musical instruments and his library to be the equipage of a camp? Will he expose a lovely and accomplished woman and two little children, to whom he seems so tenderly attached, to the guilt of treason and the horrors of war? A treason so desperate! A war so unequal! Were not all his preparations better adapted to the innocent and useful purpose which he avowed, rather than to the criminal and hazardous enterprise which was imputed to him? Whence arose those imputations? From his union with Colonel Burr. But it is evident that he has been led to this union from his admiration of the genius and his confidence in the virtue and honor of the person with whom it has connected him. That which with a harsh-judging world is the foundation of a belief of his guilt, when thoroughly and candidly examined, carries on its face, therefore, the stamp of his innocence. Such were the sentiments with which the deponent left the island of Mr. Blannerhasset. He has only to add, that he reached Marietta after a ride of fourteen miles, in company with that gentleman, at nine o'clock at night; that he slept at the same house with him, and parted from him with much regret on Monday morning at the house of Judge Woodbridge. Mr. Blannerhasset on that day went up the Muskingum to visit his boats, and the deponent prosecuted his journey home.

Given under my hand, this 21st September, 1807.

E. CARRINGTON.

SATURDAY, October 17.

Mr. LEMUEL HENRY, of the Mississippi Territory, (who heretofore gave in his testimony) was again called, at the instance of Colonel Burr, and examined.

Mr. Burr. Mr. Henry, were you at the town of Washington when I came there? Answer. Yes.

Question. Was there a guard established in the street and about the house in which I lodged? What message did I send to Cowles Mead concerning it? And what was his answer?

Answer. There was a guard stationed as you mentioned, but Mr. Mead said it was intended as much for the protection of your person as for the public safety.

Question. Did I desire you to remonstrate with Mr. Mead against the establishment of that guard as a violation of our treaty or agreement?

Answer. You desired me to remonstrate with him about it, and I understood you to complain of it as a violation of his agreement with you. I mentioned this to him, and he said that the guard was necessary for your protection as well as for the public safety.

Mr. McRae. Do you know any thing about that armistice? Answer. Only from report.

Question. Any thing from Cowles Mead? Answer. Not at all.

SATURDAY, October 3.

ELIJAH JONES was called on the part of Mr. Blannerhasset.

Mr. Wickham. Will you relate the conversations and transactions that passed between Mr. Blannerhasset and yourself?

The counsel for the prosecution objected to this question. Could the declarations of Mr. Blannerhasset be considered as evidence?

Mr. Wickham inquired whether the declarations previous to the act alleged as an offence might not be received as evidence.

Mr. Blannerhasset observed, that his declarations had been frequently quoted and urged against him, particularly in relation to the Mr. Hendersons. Had he not the same right to quote his own declarations when they were brought forward for his vindication?

Chief Justice. Any person who accompanied Mr. Blannerhasset may be considered as a competent witness.

Mr. Hay. Did you then go down the river? Answer. I did not.

Question. Did you agree to go with Mr. Blannerhasset?

Answer. There were no articles of agreement between us, though I agreed to go. There was, however, nothing binding, and I did not go.

Mr. Hay. How easy would it have been for Mr. Blannerhasset to have made certain propositions to this gentleman, for the express purpose of keeping his real objects out of view!

Chief Justice. What prevented your going?

Answer. Because Mr. Blannerhasset went off before the time that was appointed. If he had remained, if the boats had been finished and not stopped, I certainly should have gone.

Chief Justice. Proceed with your evidence.

Witness. In the fall of 1806, I called on Mr. Blannerhasset at Marietta, to know on what terms I could go down the river with him. I informed him that if we could agree on terms, I would go with him. He said that I should be furnished with liquors and provisions when going down the river, and that at the end of the journey I should receive one hundred acres of land: yet still the engagement was to be no ways binding upon me, and I might leave him whenever I was dissatisfied. I mentioned there was a rumor in circulation that there was something else in view besides the settlement of the Washita, and that his designs were hostile to the United States; if so, he had better inform me at once, for if he took me with him under such circumstances, he would take an enemy. He said they were not hostile to the United States. I asked him, if they were obstructed by a party in descending the river, whether they would defend themselves. He replied that he would not resist the constituted authority, or persons lawfully authorized to stop him; but if they were not lawfully authorized, the laws of the United States would bear him out in resisting. He observed, that those who went on the first to settle lands would have the most, as he would do the most to help them.

Mr. Wickham. Then your agreement was, to leave Mr. Blannerhasset whenever you pleased.

Answer. It was.

Question. Was the President's proclamation received before their departure?

Answer. I think it was not till afterwards, though I am not positive.

Chief Justice. Mr. Woodbridge said that it was not received till Friday afterwards.

Cross-examined.

Question. At what time did he say that he should leave the island?

Answer. Different times were stated. He intended to have started earlier than he did, but Colonel Barker did not finish the boats in time. He then said that he should start as soon as they were finished.

Question. Did he positively deny that he had any hostile designs against the United States?

Answer. He did deny it. I told him if he had any designs hostile to the United States, he had better tell me at once, and not to take me in; for if he did, he would take an enemy. He lifted up his hands to heaven, and said he had not.

Mr. McRae. Did he say that you should receive information of the object of the expedition at the mouth of Cumberland?

Answer. Yes; that I should get such satisfactory information at the mouth of Cumberland as would confirm me in my resolution to go on. I asked him if Colonel Burr was to meet him down the river. He said it was probable, but he did not say where; but he seemed to speak of the mouth of Cumberland as being the place where he was to meet him.

Mr. Blannerhasset. Did I not observe that information would also be given to you at Limestone or at the Falls, and at other places down the river?

Answer. Yes. You said that I should get better information than I had received at Marietta.

Question. Did you not understand that the further you went down the river, and the nearer you got to the Washita land, the better information you would receive about that land?

Answer. I understood from you that I would receive such satisfactory information down the river as would determine me to go on.

Evidence of Thomas Bodley.

Mr. Burr. Do you know of my purchases of land of Colonel Lynch?

Answer. I do. I think in the month of September, 1806, while Colonel Burr was in Kentucky, he and Colonel Lynch came to my office. I was clerk of the circuit court in Kentucky, and mine was an office of records. They stated to me that they were making a contract for land, and asked me to draught a deed for them. I was at that time much engaged myself; I made a memorandum of the terms which they explained to me, and directed one of the young men in the office to draught a deed. That deed did not please them, and another was draughted, which was recorded in the office of William Todd, notary public. After the deed was draughted, they showed me the plot of land, and Colonel Lynch told me that he had sold his interest or part of his interest in the Washita grant; that Colonel Burr had settled a part of the purchase money with Mr. E. Livingston, and had received the balance in Kentucky bank bills and drafts on New York. A part of the bills I myself received from Colonel Lynch in payment of a debt.

Mr. Burr. About that time was there not a great deal of conversation about a Spanish war?

Answer. There was a great deal.

Question. Were not expeditions against the Spanish Territories a very common topic?

Answer. The Spanish was frequently mentioned at musters. War was considered as inevitable; and it was said to be so stated in letters from the commander-in-chief on the Sabine.

Question. Was there not a general ardor on the subject, especially among the younger part of the community?

Answer. There was. There was a great zeal in some parts of the country. A great many expressed a willingness to join in the war. There are many young men in Kentucky at any time ready to engage in a war that is authorized by the Government, and particularly in one with Spain.

Cross-examined.

Mr. Hay. Is it customary in that country to have deeds recorded in a notarial office?

Answer. It is when the deed is to go to a different State.

Mr. Hay asked Mr. Wickham if there was any copy of that paper in court.

Mr. Wickham replied that there was not.

Mr. Hay. As the paper has been mentioned, it is better to produce it in court.

Mr. Burr. As gentlemen had said that my purchase of Washita land was all pretence, I wished to show that money had been paid on that transaction. I did not come here with my deed to establish a title.

Mr. McRae (to Mr. Bodley.) Did you see the deed?

Answer. I saw the original. It is now on record, and I recollect its contents.

Question. How much land was this deed for?

Answer. I am not certain about the number of acres; but the impression on my mind is, that it was for three hundred thousand acres.

Mr. Hay. Did you not understand from the parties that the period had expired for complying with the conditions of Bastrop's grant?

Answer. I understood that it had been so from a default of the Government, but that it had afterwards renewed the grant.

Question. Was this transaction with you before or after Judge Todd was consulted?

Answer. It was one or two years after the consultation.

Mr. Wirt. Did you see the original Spanish grant?

Answer. I am not certain. I saw many papers recorded in my office, but I am not certain whether that was among them. I saw a copy in the hands of Colonel Lynch.

Mr. Hay. Did Colonel Lynch ever show any grant transferring Bastrop's title to him?

Answer. I do not think he did.

Mr. Wirt. On whom were the drafts on New York drawn? Answer. On George M. Ogden.

Mr. Burr. Had we any conversations about a Mexican expedition?

Answer. Yes, frequently; and frequently he spoke about a Spanish war. He spoke several times on this subject to me and others. He thought, if there was any war with Spain, that it was the interest of the United States to carry an expedition into Mexico. He said that he himself would willingly engage, and asked me whether men could be got in Kentucky to embark in it. I told him I thought they could.

Mr. Hay. Did you make any contract with Colonel Burr for flour?

Answer. He said that he expected to settle the Washita land, and in the event of a war he would stipulate with his men to go against the Spaniards; and that he would take from me any quantity of flour, not exceeding two boat loads.

Evidence of Colonel Charles Lynch.

Mr. Burr. Will you relate whether I purchased any land of you, and how much?

Answer. Yes. You purchased my interest in Bastrop's grant, wherein were about three hundred and fifty thousand acres.

Question. Did I pay you any money? Answer. Yes; about four or five thousand dollars.

Question. Did you suppose the three hundred and fifty thousand acres was exclusive of Livingston's claim?

Answer. I will explain. I claimed under Morehouse, and also purchased a mortgage of Stephen Wartz. I found that Edward Livingston had also purchased the same mortgage. I commenced a writ against Morehouse, and was about to commence one against Livingston, but I purchased him out. Under that compromise I was entitled to about seven hundred thousand acres. The survey was made, and marked upon the grant. I was entitled to six-tenths, and he to four-tenths of the whole grant of twelve hundred thousand acres.

Question. Was it a separate or joint interest of mine? Answer. A joint interest.

Question. Was I to settle what you owed to Livingston? Answer. That was my object in selling.

Mr. Hay. Had you a suit with Livingston?

Answer. No. I was about to commence a suit, but we compromised. I agreed to give him thirty thousand dollars for his interest. Then I sued Morehouse. Colonel Burr was to pay Livingston the amount of my purchase of him; he also paid me four or five thousand dollars in money, and was to take up certain paper which I valued at thirty thousand dollars more.

Mr. McRae. Did you receive any drafts from Colonel Burr? Answer. Yes.

Question. On whom were they drawn? Answer. On Mr. Ogden, of New York.

Question. Had you any grant conveying an absolute title?

Answer. In 1796, the petition was presented by Bastrop; in 1797, Bastrop was to furnish five hundred families, the Government to find them in provisions for six months; but it being inconvenient to the Government to furnish the provisions, a letter of office was given to Bastrop, by the Baron de Carondelet, to dispense with the necessity of introducing the families.

Question. Will you state the various proceedings which have taken place on this grant?

Answer. First, there was the petition, then the survey upon that, the patent, and then the letter of office.

Mr. Burr. Did you get the opinion of James Brown as to the validity of Bastrop's grant?

Answer. Yes; and of Mr. Gurley too. They both said that the title was good.

Mr. McRae. Do you suppose there is no necessity to carry families there now for the purpose of saving the title? Answer. No; not now.

Colonel Burr. Have you an account of the nature of the soil and value of the land included in the grant?

Answer. I have been on the land, and spent several days in exploring it. I have a certificate with me signed by several respectable gentlemen, stating it to be very valuable. [Here Colonel Lynch produced the certificate.]

Mr. Hay. What is your own opinion of its value? Answer. I think it very valuable.

Question. How far is it situated up the Red river from its mouth?

Answer. About two hundred miles. It lies on the Washita river, and extends towards the Mississippi; from which, in a direct line, it is not more than twenty or thirty-five miles.

Mr. Burr. Was your contract with me in consideration of money only, or upon condition of settlements?

Answer. I considered the condition of settlement the principal consideration.

Mr. McRae. What is the date of your contract with Colonel Burr?

Answer. Last fall. The first thing I did was to contract with Colonel Burr, after his arrival in Kentucky.

Colonel Burr. Was there any thing said about corn which you were to furnish me with?

Answer. Yes. I was to furnish you with a quantity of corn. I received a letter from Colonel Burr about it, when he was at the mouth of Cumberland. He wrote from the mouth of Cumberland that he should want more corn than I had agreed to furnish him with. He stated that he was then going on with a few friends to the land on the Washita, and wished me to send him some more corn, and some utensils.

Question. What kind of utensils?

Answer. To clear two roads from the Mississippi. By cutting a road twenty-five miles, three hundred may be saved.

Question. What proportion of the land is prairie?

Answer. I do not know precisely; but I suppose about one hundred thousand acres.

Question. What is the character of that kind of land?

Answer. It is esteemed among the French and Spaniards the most valuable; because it is fit for immediate cultivation.

Mr. Hay. You spoke of a letter from Baron de Carondelet, dispensing with the settlement of the land; was that before the cession to the United States?

Answer. Yes; in 1797. All the transactions about it were in 1797. I have got letters stating that the commissioners appointed to adjust the claims to lands in that Territory thought it as good a title as any in Kentucky.

Mr. Wirt. Have you got a copy of your deed? Answer. No.

Question. Did it contain a general or a special warranty?

Answer. In every conveyance of the kind, there is always a clause providing in case of an interference by Congress.

Evidence of Silas Dinsmore.

MONDAY, October 5.

Mr. Hay. Were you in New Orleans when General Wilkinson arrived there in November last?

Answer. I was.

Question. Did he make any communications to you?

Answer. He made a very full and general statement of the situation of the country, and of his apprehensions of approaching danger.

Question. How soon after his arrival?

Answer. I think on the 26th or 27th of November. He arrived there on the evening of the 25th, and made his communications to me very shortly after his arrival.

Question. Were these communications made under any injunctions of secrecy? Answer. They were.

Question. Were you acquainted with the state of the public mind at New Orleans at the time of the arrival of General Wilkinson? Answer. I discovered nothing unusual about that time.

Question. What was the state of the public mind after the approach of Burr was announced? Did there appear to be a considerable party disposed to favor the views of Colonel Burr?

Answer. A considerable party appeared to be in favor of Colonel Burr, and were much opposed to the measures of General Wilkinson.

Question. What appeared to be the general impression on the minds of the citizens? And what was their conduct before and after General Wilkinson exposed the plans of Colonel Burr?

Answer. Before the disclosure of those plans, it was a general subject of inquiry as to the conduct of General Wilkinson in taking post at New Orleans; and many censured the measure. About that time several numbers of the Western World appeared, in which many severe strictures were cast on General Wilkinson and others; which, after the disclosure made by General Wilkinson, at the Government house, occasioned very considerable commotions among the citizens. It became a general topic of conversation in the coffee-house, the hotels, and even in the streets. I will repeat further, that there appeared to be a large proportion of the mercantile interest in favor of General Wilkinson's conduct; some censured and some doubted. General Wilkinson condescended to ask my opinion, having previously made a full disclosure of the dangers apprehended, and of the measures which he had adopted. I did give my advice in favor of seizing every man whom he found opposed to his measures. This was after a development of the state of affairs by General Wilkinson. [Mr. Martin. And that not to be depended upon. Mr. Wirt. That will be a subject of discussion hereafter. Mr. Martin. I know that. Mr. Wirt. (in a lower tone of voice, to Mr. Martin.) You know a good deal of those things.]

Mr. Hay. Did you see Colonel Burr at Washington, in the Mississippi Territory?

Answer. Yes. I received a verbal message from him, by an unknown person, and returned an apology for not waiting on him that day, but went to see him the next day. I met him in company, but he solicited no private interview, and I had none with him.

Question. Was there any circumstance which particularly attracted your notice?

Answer. No. I never saw him till he was in the hands of the civil authority.

Question. Do you recollect whether in New Orleans, and while General Wilkinson was there, intelligence frequently came down the river stating the approach of Colonel Burr and his party?

[Mr. Wickham objected to the witness speaking of mere reports, as being nothing better than hearsay evidence; Mr. Wirt contended it was admissible evidence; and that it was proper to show the state of the public mind, arising from those rumors which were generally circulated to justify the strong measures which were taken. The Chief Justice said that neither hearsay nor rumors could be regarded as legal evidence; but if there be the slightest shade of difference in the testimony, that of rumor, in such a case as the present, was the most tolerable.]

Answer. There were frequent reports to that effect. Among other rumors, Mr. John Clay, a respectable merchant of New Orleans, came to General Wilkinson's quarters, on the morning of the 8th or 9th of December, and asked to see the general; when shown to him, he observed, in my presence, I feel it my duty, general, to inform you that I have received a letter from Kentucky informing me that Colonel Burr has seized on the arsenal in Kentucky, (I think near the mouth of Kentucky river,) and has availed himself of all the arms and ordnance stores there deposited. A few minutes after, Governor Claiborne came in, and said, general, I have received correct information, on which I can depend, that a squadron of the British fleet is cruising off the Balize.

Question. Have you ever been on service with General Wilkinson?

Answer. Not in a military character.

Question. Have you ever in a civil? Answer. Yes.

Question. What was his general reputation as to integrity?

Answer. I never knew any thing as to his integrity, but what was purity itself. So far as his conduct came within my own knowledge, it always appeared to me to be perfectly correct.

Question. How long have you known General Wilkinson?

Answer. It is a little more than five years since I first knew him. I have been in some service with him for months together in the forest, while we were engaged in running the national boundary line.

Question. Have you ever discovered any thing which betrayed a want of patriotism in General Wilkinson?

Answer. No. His patriotism was of the most ardent kind; such as I wish to possess myself, and could wish every other citizen to possess.

Question. Did he ever write to you about raising a military corps?

Answer. Yes. But that was predicated on the idea of a rupture with Spain.

Mr. Randolph. Have you got the letter?

Answer. I do not know. I have several letters from General Wilkinson, which I have on file; but I have not examined whether this particular one is among them or not.

Question. What is the date of the letter? Answer. 1805.

Question. What induced you to suppose that there was a probability of a war with Spain at that time?

Answer. From interviews with the general, in the year 1803, and subsequent correspondence with him till 1805. The first was occasioned by the doubtful state of our negotiations with Spain; the second from the detention of a part of the ceded territory. From many circumstances, it was supposed a rupture was inevitable.

Question. What was the space of territory in dispute?

Answer. From the parallel of latitude of thirty-one degrees north, to the Gulf of Florida, and from the Mississippi to the river Perdido.

Colonel Burr. Did General Wilkinson offer you a reward for apprehending me?

Answer. I think four or five thousand dollars were offered in behalf of the Government.

Question. When was that offer made? Answer. Some time in December last.

Question. Did you undertake to effect it? Answer. I did, as far as was practicable and expedient.

Question. Was that offer predicated on an order of the Government, or was it the fiat of the general?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. Did he satisfy you that he had authority for making the offer? Answer. I think he did.

Question. When did you leave New Orleans?

Answer. On the morning of the 9th or 10th of December.

Mr. Baker. When was the offer made? Answer. Just about that time.

Colonel Burr. Did you send an order to the Choctaws to take me?

Answer. I carried myself the proclamation of Governor Williams to the Upper Choctaws, and employed runners to carry proclamations, with instructions to intersect the paths in every direction; and wrote to the agent in the Chickasaw nation to the same effect.

Mr. Wirt. What do you mean by saying that you undertook to arrest Colonel Burr, as far as was expedient?

Answer. I meant that if I should have found him at large, I should have taken him; but not out of the hands of the civil authority.

Question. Were there not officers sent up to take him?

Answer. Yes; and I was instructed to co-operate with them; but he being, exactly where General Wilkinson wished him, in the hands of the civil authority, I advised the officers to return, and they separated.

Colonel Burr. Were you to seize me privately? Answer. Yes; if practicable.

Question. Was I not reputed to be at the head of an army, by General Wilkinson?

Answer. Yes; and by others too.

Question. How, then, were these men to take me? When were those officers sent?

Answer. I can inform you when I first saw them, which was on the 1st of February.

Question. Of the orders of the officers you know nothing?

Answer. Only what I saw; an order from Commodore Shaw to Lieutenant Jones to receive you.

Question. You said the officers returned on your advice; did you see them retire; or do you know when they left that part of the country? Had they separated before I left the town of Washington?

Answer. I cannot tell when you left there; but the last time I saw them was on the 5th of February, at Natchez.

Colonel Burr to Commodore Shaw. I understood that you received orders from General Wilkinson; were these orders from the Government?

Answer. I think they were the result of an arrangement between Governor Claiborne and General Wilkinson. I did not know, at that time, that I was subject to the orders of General Wilkinson; but always understood that I was to co-operate with him. I considered that as Governor Claiborne took the responsibility, I was to co-operate, and that the orders were given conjointly with General Wilkinson.

Colonel Burr to Mr. Dinsmore. Did General Wilkinson express any doubt of the militia?

Answer. He expressed no doubts of the Creoles; but he doubted the incongruous group which constituted the citizens of New Orleans.

Question. Did he doubt the civil authorities? Answer. He did entertain doubts of the Judges.

Mr. Martin. Did he express any doubts of Governor Claiborne?

Answer. He had no doubt of the integrity of Governor Claiborne, and of his attachment to the Government. He said that they had, at one time, been on such terms as not to act together, but he was in hopes they would unite.

Question. Did he doubt Governor Mead?

Answer. Yes; because he did not co-operate with the general, and refused to furnish his quota of men.

Mr. Hay. Did General Wilkinson doubt the patriotism of Governor Claiborne?

Answer. He was far from doubting his patriotism, but said he wanted firmness.

Mr. Martin. Did he doubt James Brown? [Mr. Wirt objected to such a course of interrogation, as indelicate and improper. Mr. Martin defended it, on the ground that, from the conduct of General Wilkinson, it would seem that men, even high in authority, could not be trusted.]

The following affidavit contains the substance of the testimony delivered by the witness in court, on Monday, the 5th of October, except that he was not interrogated as to the paper found in the cape of the boy's coat, in the handwriting of Colonel Burr; that fact having been previously established, as far as Mr. Henry's knowledge extended, by the evidence of Mr. Poindexter.

The evidence of Lemuel Henry, a resident of Washington county, in the Mississippi Territory.

The said Henry being at the town of Washington, in the Mississippi Territory, attending his duty as a member of the Legislative Council, was introduced to Colonel Burr, by Colonel McKee, on the first evening of the arrival of Colonel Burr at that place, after his submission to the civil power.

Colonel Burr, Colonel McKee, James Callier, and the said Henry, were alone present, when, in the course of conversation, it was mentioned by the said Callier or Henry, that if he (Col. Burr) had gone over to Washington county, on the Mobile, and impressed upon the minds of the people there that his enterprise was a secret one against the Spaniards, and with the sanction of our Government, he might have procured men enough to have taken Mobile; at which place he would have got a sufficiency of arms and ammunition, and armed vessels to convey his troops to whatever place he pleased. Colonel Burr then began to inquire into the situation of the Mobile, and of Washington county. In the course of the conversation, the difficulties to which the people of Washington county were subjected from the exactions of the Spaniards, and their unfriendly disposition towards us, were mentioned. Col. Burr observed that he had seen with regret the memorials of those people treated with contempt or neglect in Congress; that, while they were reading, the members would be scraping their feet, and would pay no attention to them; and that they were no sooner read than the House passed on to some other subject. He was surprised, he said, that the people of that country had not made some exertion to release themselves from the difficulties under which they labored; that the Government having neglected them, it was a natural right, and engrafted in the constitution, for a people, when the Government does not secure to them those rights to which, by their situation, they are entitled, either to erect a new Government for themselves, or to take protection under such other Government as would promise them a happier situation. The expression that the right was engrafted in the constitution, was used with a considerable degree of emphasis by Colonel Burr, and, I confess, excited in my mind no small share of astonishment, considering his situation; nor could I account for his addressing these observations to us, unless it was that both Mr. Callier and myself represented that part of the Territory which was particularly exposed to the exactions of the Spanish Government.

On the Sunday before Colonel Burr finally left the town of Washington, and after the boats which descended the river with him had been searched for arms, and a report made, as I understood, that there were none of any consequence found, a certain Robert A. New, who appeared to be in habits of the strictest intimacy with Colonel Burr, and lodged in the same room with him, offered to sell me a parcel of arms. The said New and myself were for several days in a treaty for a quantity of provisions, which was brought down in the boats called Colonel Burr's boats. He said that the provisions were not his private property, but that he was agent for the owners, between whom some matters were to adjust respecting them. On the day last mentioned, (viz: the Sunday before Colonel Burr left the town of Washington, and after the boats had been searched for arms,) the said New asked me how I would like to purchase a parcel of arms. I asked him how many there were. He answered, about forty or fifty, or between forty and fifty; do not recollect which, and as elegant muskets and bayonets as I ever saw. He offered them to me at a price which I considered only about one-third of their value; and assigned as a reason for selling them so low, that they were lost to them at that time, and it was better to get something for them than nothing. I observed to him jocularly, that they could not have been of much use in settling the Washita land. He said it was unnecessary to say to me, or to any man of understanding, that the men I saw engaged in this business had no other view than that of settling a new country; that they were generally too well fixed at home to embark on so dull an enterprise; but that this was a good idea to hold out to the world; and it seemed to go down pretty well. Knowing that there had been a search for the arms, and an official report that they could not be found, I inquired of Mr. New how they were to be got. He said that they would not be delivered to me, but would be placed where I could get them; and I think said at any place I should direct in the neighborhood. I declined making any purchase of him.

With respect to the last arrest of the partisans of Colonel Burr, when a considerable number were arrested, it arose from the following circumstance: In a few days after Colonel Burr had left the town of Washington, and was said to have escaped, and after the Governor's proclamation for his apprehension had issued, as I understood, a negro boy was discovered near the mouth of Cole's creek, (opposite to which Colonel Burr's boats were stationed,) riding on a horse which had belonged to Colonel Burr, and having on his surtout coat, as I heard. These circumstances created a suspicion; the boy was searched, and there was found sewed up in the cape of his coat a paper in these words: "If you are yet together, keep together, and I will join you to-morrow night; in the mean time put all your arms in perfect order; ask the bearer no questions; but tell him all you may think I wish to know. He does not know that this is from me, nor where I am. C. T. and D. F." This paper was proved to be in the handwriting of Colonel Burr by a Colonel Fitzpatrick, as I understood. In consequence of this discovery, a number, perhaps between twenty and thirty men, said to be the adherents of Colonel Burr, were arrested and put under guard. They were not in close confinement when I saw them, nor did I ever hear of their being in that situation. They were only guarded till the alarm was over. I saw several of them going to their lodgings to dinner, and, as I understood, they were usually put on their honor to return at a particular time and place.

LEMUEL HENRY.

HENRICO COUNTY, &c.

Sworn to before me in due form, agreeably to law, 14th October, 1807.

DANIEL L. HYLTON.

Examination of evidence.

MONDAY, October 5.

This day Mr. Burr proceeded to put into execution his threats against General Eaton.

Mr. Burr addressed the court. I have understood, sir, that there are certain proceedings of a court martial, of which General Eaton is the subject, and in which he was charged with offences that would disqualify him as a witness. After a satisfactory search, I find that the papers were burnt in the War Office. I have procured a deposition of the chief clerk in the War Office to show that such is the fact. This is to establish the loss of the papers, with a view to let in oral testimony.

Mr. Hay objected to this proceeding. Suppose that this deposition did actually establish the fact for which it was produced, yet why establish it in this court?

Mr. Hay said he would object to the production of the records of a court martial. He presumed that General Eaton's trial was of a military nature, for some neglect or violation of military duty, and not for any charge of a civil nature. Taking this fact for granted, he presumed that the court would not permit the introduction of the original records. The accused was at liberty to go into evidence as to the general character of a witness, but not as to any particular fact. Under such circumstances, it was unnecessary to occupy the time of the court, either with this affidavit or with oral evidence.

Mr. Burr. The affidavit proves that such papers were burnt in the War Office. We shall prove by a witness that such a court martial was held, and that General Eaton was found guilty of certain crimes, which would disqualify him as a witness in a court of justice. We shall prove that he has been convicted by a court martial of crimen falsi; and that the records of these proceedings were transmitted to the War Office, where they were burnt. We shall then produce a witness to prove these charges. Then will arise a novel question, how far a man convicted of a crime, not in a court of common law jurisdiction, is disqualified from serving as a witness in a court of common law, if it be such a crime as would amount to such a disqualification in a court of common law. When the court shall hear the proof, the question will then arise as to General Eaton's credibility and competency. We shall urge it as to both these points. We shall show that the crimes were great enough to affect his competency, and, if they were of an inferior dye, they would affect his credibility.

Mr. Hay presumed that evidence might be at any time brought up to affect the competency of a witness, but that if it was intended to impeach his credibility, it could only be done on the ground of general character; and that no witness's credibility could be attacked by any particular charge, unless he had received previous notice, and was permitted to prepare for his defence.

After some discussion, the Chief Justice overruled Mr. Hay's objection. Mr. Burr then read the following affidavit:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington County, ss,

Personally appeared before me, one of the justices of the peace of the United States in and for the county of Washington, in the district of Columbia, John Smith, chief clerk in the War Office, who, being duly sworn deposed and saith, that having searched the records and papers in the War Office, there are no records of proceedings of courts martial, or any papers or proceedings relative to the same, previous to the year one thousand eight hundred and one, and that he hath understood, and verily believes, that all records and proceedings of courts martial, which were deposited in said office previous to the —— day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, were burned with the office, and a number of other papers, on that day; that having come into the office since the above date, he never saw any record or proceedings of a court martial held on William Eaton, and that there is no record or proceeding of any such court martial now in the War Office, to the best of this deponent's knowledge and belief.

Sworn before me, this 24th day of September, A. D. 1807.

RICHARD PARROTT.

Annexed is the certificate of James Madison, Secretary of State, that the above R. Parrott is a justice of the peace, as above stated.

Evidence of Colonel Henry Gaither.

Mr. Burr. Are you acquainted with Gen. Eaton? Answer. I am; early in '96—

General Eaton. I presume I have a right to know what is to be proved by this witness.

Mr. Wickham. With respect to Gen. Eaton's right, that is out of the question; he forgets that this is a case between the United States and Mr. Burr.

Mr. Burr. I have stated twice that Col. Gaither is to prove certain proceedings of a court martial. We shall prove the conviction of Gen. Eaton for certain crimes; and we may perhaps go further, and say something as to his general character.

General Eaton. I am willing, sir, that the most minute acts of my life should be inquired into; but, sir, I have been taken by surprise; I did not suppose that the toms were to be ransacked, to establish things which happened beyond the flood; but the records of that court martial should be produced here; the law, in every case, requires the best evidence.

Mr. Wickham. It is unfortunate that Gen. Eaton did not know that the records were burnt.

General Eaton. You, sir, know that there are always three copies of the proceedings of a court martial. This man who arrested me, if he has done his duty, ought to have kept one copy; the judge advocate another; and a triplicate copy of them is filed in the Department of War; but, sir, if all these copies are lost, I will supply them; and though my copy may not be verbatim and minute, I will furnish the general contents. I waive my demand for the copy of the record; and if testimony be now introduced, I shall only claim the privilege of explaining after the witness has concluded. After a few remarks from the bench, Col. Gaither proceeded.

Witness. In the early part of 1796, my acquaintance with Capt. Eaton commenced on the river St. Mary's, at a fort then building called Fort Pickering, where he then commanded. I commanded the troops of the United States, on the Oconee. On the information of Capt. Dunscombe, I had Capt. Eaton arrested, and had a court martial; the trial was held—

Mr. Burr. What offences were charged?

Answer. I do not recollect; I was not present at the court martial.

Mr. Burr. State them as far as you do know.

Witness. There was something about dealing in the soldiers' rations, and something about selling the public corn to the inhabitants of that part of the country.

Mr. Burr. For his own profit?

Answer. So the report ran. The number of charges against him I do not recollect; but he was found guilty of some one, or perhaps the whole. I had the proceedings, signed by the President of the court, Captain Freeman, and Captain Eaton was suspended from command either for three or six months.

Question. What did you do with these proceedings?

Answer. They were sent to the Secretary of War; they were upwards of one hundred pages. I do not know whether I confirmed the sentence or not. There were some letters from Captain Eaton, requesting me not to send them on.

General Eaton. I wish those letters produced.

Question. And what did you do with Eaton? Did you send him on?

Answer. He was to be under arrest for some months after the confirmation of these proceedings. Many things were laid against him; Major Commandant Freeman complained of his quarters being stoned in the night, and supposed Captain Eaton was the cause of it. I thought it best, in consequence of these complaints, to send him on to the Secretary of War, he being of no use there so long as he was suspended.

Mr. Wirt. Was the sentence ever confirmed by the Secretary of War?

Answer. I do not know; I never heard.

Mr. Hay. Will you be pleased to say what charges you do recollect?

Answer. I cannot repeat the charges. There was something about selling public corn to the inhabitants, and clothing his soldiers with nankeens which he had brought from Philadelphia, and on which he made a profit. However, I never attended the court; I only arrested him.

Question. Can you form any conjecture as to the number of charges?

Answer. I cannot. The whole record was not filled up with the charges, but they also contained the proceedings and Captain Eaton's defence.

Question. Do you know whether you confirmed the sentence or not?

Answer. I do not recollect; but I believe I did not, from having received some letters from Captain Eaton insinuating that I would not do justice, at which I was much hurt.

Question. And you do not know whether the Secretary of War confirmed the sentence?

Answer. I do not. I never heard any thing more about it, until I heard of his being sent as consul to Tunis.

Mr. Wirt. Then he was appointed to Tunis after all these proceedings?

Mr. McRae. When an officer is convicted of a crime, is it not customary to cashier him?

Answer. It depends on the nature of the offence. I have seen them sometimes cashiered, and sometimes rebuked.

Question. Was it not regular for you first to have acted on this sentence?

Answer. By the rules and articles of War I might have done it; and, so far indeed, until it touched his commission.

General Eaton. Are you positive that the suspension of the court was for three or six months?

Answer. I do not say that the sentence ran for three or six months. There was a suspension for months or years.

Mr. McRae. For years. There is a very great difference between years and months.

Chief Justice. That is of no importance.

Mr. McRae. It certainly shows the incorrectness of the witness's memory.

Question. Did you say that General Eaton wrote you not to send the records to the Secretary of War?

Answer. So I understood from his letters. He wanted a conference with me.

General Eaton. Are you confident whether this request was made before or after the trial?

Answer. I am not confident. It has been a great while ago.

Mr. Hay. Is it customary for the Secretary of War to send an answer when a sentence is sent to him for confirmation?

Answer. Yes; but many letters from him to me never arrived, and some that arrived were broken open.

Question. And you sent General Eaton to the Secretary of War?

Answer. Yes; a vessel was going from St. Mary's to Philadelphia. I wrote to Captain Eaton to come down and sent him on to Philadelphia for further instructions.

Mr. McRae. Did you hear from General Eaton afterwards?

Answer. Just before he shipped himself off to Tunis, he wrote to me.

Mr. Martin. Did the complaints cease after he went to Philadelphia?

Answer. Yes, we were perfectly tranquil.

Mr. Wickham. Do you recollect any charge of putting an infant on the muster-roll, and drawing rations for him? Answer. No.

Question. A little boy?

Answer. Yes; a fifer. I thought it improper to have two fifers and a drummer on the roll.

Question. What was his name? Answer. Donaldson, or Danielson.

Mr. Hay. Was this one of the charges before the court martial? Answer. No.

Mr. Hay. Then you will answer no questions as to that.

Mr. Wirt. How long did you remain in the army after this? Answer. Till June, 1802.

Question. Did you resign then?

Answer. I got a letter from the Secretary of War, revoking my commission.

Mr. Hay. Were you not yourself under arrest?

Answer. Yes; by the civil authority, and then by the military.

Question. At what time? Answer. In 1802.

Question. Was nothing done in the military arrest?

Answer. I considered my dismissal as giving me liberty to withdraw, and I came off.

Question. By whom were you arrested? Answer. By General Wilkinson.

Mr. Wirt. What officers composed the court martial that tried General Eaton?

Answer. Major Constant Freeman, President, Captain S. Tinsley, Captain Nichol, and some other officers; I am not certain whether Captain Davidson and Ensign McCall were the other members.

General Eaton. They were Ensign McCall and Lieutenant Thompson.

Question. Did they remain in service?

Answer. Freeman is now a major; Thompson is dead; McCall, I think, is in service.

Evidence of Captain Samuel Tinsley.

Mr. Burr. You were a member of the court martial that was held over General Eaton at St. Mary's?

Answer. I was.

Question. What were the charges? Answer. I recollect but one.

Question. And what was that?

Answer. For speculation. When General Eaton went there, he had brought round with him some nankeens, which he had made up into summer coats, and furnished to his men on a profit, as was supposed.

Question. Was he found guilty on these charges? Answer. He was suspended from his command.

Mr. Hay. Do you recollect to which charge the sentence of the court applied? Answer. I do not.

Mr. Wirt. Do you know whether that sentence was ever confirmed? Answer. I never heard.

Mr. Wickham. What was the general character of General Eaton in the garrison? was he generally respected?

Answer. He was not generally liked by the officers.

Question. Do you recollect any charge about public corn?

Answer. I cannot distinctly; there was something said about it. I understood that there was some corn sold by General Eaton.

General Eaton. That is true.

Mr. Wickham. We are asking the witness.

General Eaton. I will save you that trouble, sir.

Mr. Burr. The question is, were the avails applied to his private profit? Answer. It was so said.

Mr. McRae. No, sir. Do you know any thing of it? Answer. I do not.

Question. How long was General Eaton suspended? Answer. For three or six months.

Mr. Hay. You stated that the corn was sold by General Eaton's order; was it publicly sold?

Answer. I do not recollect.

General Eaton. Was not the corn sold by the acting commissary of the garrison, Thompson? Was it not sold through the quartermaster's department? Answer. I cannot tell.

Mr. McRae. Was it sold secretly?

Answer. I will state what I heard; that a part of the corn was sold and applied to the use of part of General Eaton's family: so Thompson said.

General Eaton, in explanation of Colonel Gaither's testimony.

MONDAY, October 5.

[Colonel Burr. Before General Eaton goes on, I wish to know how he stands before the court, whether as giving testimony, or as a party. If he is to be considered as giving testimony, we may ask him some questions. If the court thinks proper to indulge him in any observations, I have no objection.]

General Eaton. I understood, by the opinion of the court expressed a few days ago, that explanations, in the situation in which I am placed, are admissible.

Chief Justice. But you will confine yourself to explanations only.

General Eaton. In the fall of the year 1795, I received an order from the Secretary of War to take a command on the St. Mary's, being then a captain on the military peace establishment. Colonel Gaither at that time commanded the regulars on that station, and James Seagroves was Indian agent for the Southern nations. Reports from these gentlemen represented to the Government of the United States the people of Georgia as disaffected, insurrectionary, and disorganizing; that they were in the back country, under the command of General Clarke, preparing an expedition against East Florida; they represented General James Jackson as the head or patron of this description of citizens; they described the Indians as hostilely disposed, and the Spaniards as balancing between dispositions of war and peace.

[Did I state that my orders from the Secretary of War were distinct and special? I accepted the command with distinct and special instructions from the Secretary of War.]

These same reports recommended the establishment of a trading factory on the waters of the St. Mary's; and also recommended that a military post be stationed there, with a view of overawing the Indians, or resisting them, if necessary; of keeping the Spaniards in check, and an eye of vigilance towards any disorderly citizens of Georgia, who might attempt to make aggressions on the territory of a friendly neighbor. Early in the month of January, 1796, I arrived at Coleraine, a post on the waters of the St. Mary's, with directions and special instructions from the Secretary of War, pointing directly towards these objects; and shortly after took my post at the head of three companies of infantry. I ought to mention, that in passing through Savannah, I waited on General Jackson, and communicated to him the two first objects of my command. He apprehended no danger; but said, that in case of need, he would order to my assistance any number of militia which circumstances should require. This, I confess, surprised me not a little, and gave me reason to suspect the accuracy of the information given by Seagroves and Gaither. But I still concealed from General Jackson one of the objects of my command, which was to keep a watchful eye on the citizens of Georgia.

I much disliked the position assigned to us by Seagroves, on the St. Mary's, as a military post. The trading house, in freshes, was below high-water mark. There were no military sites near it; and the circumjacent country was a low pitch-pine barren. The water was bad, being that of the river St. Mary's.

Though there had been some commotions on that frontier, yet I found the Indians friendly, the Spaniards peaceable, and the citizens of Georgia tranquil, except some internal discontents concerning the Yazoo grants.

The post at Coleraine was designated by Seagroves as the best military position on the waters of the St. Mary's. I reconnoitred the country up and down the river; and nine miles above the post by land, I found an elevated site, good encamping ground, and fair springs of running water. The reports which my duty required me to make contrasted these relative positions and relative facts, and were so diametrically opposite to what had before been represented, that I soon found myself in collision with Seagroves. I had discovered that the position recommended by Seagroves was his own private property, and that he owned thirty thousand acres of land adjoining; and I was told (but this I do not assert as a fact) that Colonel Gaither was in partnership with him.

Colonel Gaither visited me at my post in the month of February, I think; and, among other friendly things, offered me a partnership in a purchase which he had made in the Yazoo grants, on advantageous terms. This I declined, as I disliked that business in all its shapes. It occurs to me, also, that Seagroves, about the same time, proposed to me, as an inducement to remove my family and settle in Camden county, to accept, as a compliment, four or five thousand acres of land in the neighborhood of Coleraine. I told him jocosely, but supposed he understood me, that he did not bid high enough.

In the summer following, whether in July or August I cannot say, commissioners arrived, who were appointed by the Government of the United States to treat with the Indians, to settle certain boundaries and disputes about boundaries which had not before been adjusted. About that time the misunderstanding between Colonel Gaither and Mr. Seagroves and myself became very distinct and visible; there was not much intercourse between us; and I was not very desirous to become a partisan among the officers, as every body knows the advantage which great men have on such occasions. This commission was composed of General Perkins, Colonel Hawkins, and George Clymer. They requested me to act as secretary to the commission; and two of them, I think General Perkins and Colonel Hawkins, took lodgings in the block house which I occupied. After the termination of the negotiations with the Indians, those two gentlemen proposed to reconnoitre the country, expressing much dissatisfaction with the position at Coleraine. I rode with them in different directions and at different times, and at length showed them the position nine miles above Coleraine which I have before mentioned, called Trader's Hill. This they surveyed as far as they could by an ocular survey, and viewed it very attentively. They seemed much satisfied with it, and spent the greater part of the day there at the spring. On our return to our quarters, Colonel Hawkins asked me for a copy of my letter to the Secretary of War, describing the relative position of those two posts, and also what I had stated as to the situation of the other objects under my charge. I showed him that copy. He read it attentively, and, making an apostrophe to me, said, "I think, sir, I will now inform you that the commissioners have private instructions to ascertain the truth of certain controversies between you and certain gentlemen high in trust here; and I have the pleasure to inform you that we shall bear testimony to the truth of all your statements." I confess I considered this as a great gain, if not a triumph over those gentlemen, Seagroves and Gaither; and as such I spoke of it. I heard much of the observations of the two gentlemen of whom I have spoken. Seagroves said, that Eaton must be got off this place; Gaither replied, "Leave that to me." He could not remove me by his own order, and resorted to a court-martial as his dernier ressort. Unwilling to suffer the embarrassment of an arrest and trial I wrote to Colonel Gaither, and proposed an interview. Whether he condescended to answer my letter or not, I do not remember. But I was soon after arrested on five several charges; either of which, if supported, would be sufficient to cashier the best officer in the service. I cannot give those charges in their regular order, but I can give them with their specifications.

1st. General charge: DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDERS.—Specification. Disobedience of the orders of Colonel Gaither with respect to some police of the garrison, in which he had no right to interfere. But the specification was not reported, and on it, as well as the general charge, I was acquitted.

2d. General charge: NEGLECT OF DUTY. The specification, amount, and result of that general charge, the same as the first. I was acquitted.

Question. What was the specification of that charge?

Answer. Some little arrangement in the garrison as to the men.

3d. General charge: SPECULATION.—Specification. In paying the arrearages of bounty to some of the men of my company in goods taken from the factory, and in supplying them with certain articles of clothing. It appeared in evidence that these arrangements were with the unanimous vote of the company; and though much pains had been taken, but one solitary soldier could be found to say that he was dissatisfied, notwithstanding every one voted for the measure. My object was to give the men clothing suited to the climate, without any private views whatever. The same arrangement had been made by every commanding officer there, and with the approbation of Gaither. On this general charge I was acquitted.

4th. General charge: PECULATION.—Specification. Inselling public corn. I admitted the fact, and showed in evidence, by the testimony of two commissioned officers, that this corn, about twenty-five or thirty bushels, was perishing on my hands, and was sold by the verbal order of Colonel Gaither, given in their presence, and the avails placed in the quartermaster's hands, for the purpose of procuring hospital supplies. Acquitted on the general charge.

Lastly. FRAUD.—Specification. For having retained from the garrison certain rations of flour due as arrearages, and storing them in the magazine. The fact of retaining the rations and storing them in the general magazine, I also admitted; and showed in evidence, that I retained them to meet a claim of the contractor for an equal number of rations used or destroyed by the soldiers when he had laid in provisions unfit for use. The soldiers being without corn or flour, I sent to the contractor advising him of it. He wished me to use some damaged flour, which I refused; but the soldiers, from necessity, were compelled to open several barrels, and select such as could be used. This occasioned a considerable loss, which the contractor wished me to bear. I absolutely refused, and he instituted a suit against me. When the provisions arrived, I ordered the contractor to provide a number of rations for the soldiers, equal to those to which they were entitled when he had left them without wholesome provisions. On his refusal, I retained that number for the benefit of the soldiers, and had them stored in the general magazine. I was acquitted on that charge.

For what good reason I know not, or for what good purpose I see not, except like Felix, to show the Jews peculiar favor, I was sentenced to be suspended from command only for two months. The proceedings of the court-martial were sent to Colonel Gaither, whose duty it was to decide upon them. Finding that his object was not attained he did not decide upon the sentence, from what spirit of benevolence I know not; but he kept me in a burning sun, confined within the walls of my own fort, for more than a month, without letting me know the sentence of the court. At length he informed me by an order that I was to repair to the seat of Government, and receive further instructions. As I had suffered myself to be arrested by his order, I was compelled to obey, and went round to the seat of Government. I presented myself to the Secretary of War, and begged to know what standing I had as respected my rank. He said, we have been made acquainted with the unhappy misunderstandings which have existed in Georgia and we consider you as we have always done. [Mr. Hay. Who was the Secretary of War? Answer. McHenry.]—The sentence never was approved of; and President Washington pronounced on the whole proceedings, that they were a tissue of persecution and wickedness; as I was told by a gentleman who heard him use the expression.

To throw some little light on the declaration of Colonel Gaither, that I was appointed to a foreign command, I will observe that, at my own request, I was permitted to resume my command on the St. Mary's. After my orders to return to Georgia, I was detained for the purpose of attending a court-martial, which was to sit at Fort Mifflin, until the extraordinary session of Congress, and until Blount's conspiracy exploded. I was then employed by the Government to apprehend certain of his associates. During which session, or about that time, our treaty with Tunis arrived, and was not fully approved by the Senate. It was ratified with the exception of three articles. A proposal was made to me by the Secretary of State to take an embassy to Tunis to ratify that treaty, and to accept of a consular agency. As I never had any predilection for a military peace establishment, I engaged to go on that service. But before I left the seat of Government, I saw Seagroves removed, and the post at St. Mary's left with a sergeant's command, which may account for the subsequent tranquillity of the place. Since which, Mr Gaither has been permitted to retire in arrest.

Col. Burr. Can you assign any date to the court-martial which sat at Fort Mifflin? Answer. I cannot.

Question. Was it in 1796?

Answer. If I am correct, in the extraordinary session of Congress, which I think was in 1797; I am correct as to the court-martial. After I was ordered to Georgia, I remained for some time to sit as a member of the court-martial. But before I could make my arrangements to leave the seat of Government, the extraordinary session of Congress had commenced.

Question. Was it the same year, and pending the extraordinary session of Congress, that you were employed to seize Romaine and others? Was silence imposed upon you by the Secretary as to the seizing of Romaine?

Answer. I cannot say distinctly; though secrecy might have been enjoined, yet I have no objection to state the manner of the arrest of Romaine.

Col. Burr (to Col. Gaither.) Was speculation countenanced with the soldiers?

Answer. No; in no instance.

Question. Did you order the corn to be sold?

Answer. I know nothing about the corn, or any thing about it.

Col. Burr (to Gen. Eaton.) On which charge were you convicted?

Answer. On some specification of a general charge. On every general charge I was acquitted. You know the nature of a general charge. You know, too, that with the stern and just character of General Washington, he would keep no man in office who had been guilty of any of the charges exhibited against me.

Col. Burr (to Col. Gaither.) When was Seagroves removed?

Answer. The latter end of the same year, 1796. He was removed in consequence of a treaty with the Indians, making some variation in our boundaries.

Col. Gaither. General Eaton has said a great many things that I know nothing about, and never heard of before. As to land in partnership with Seagroves, and reports to the Government, I am a total stranger to either circumstance. I recommended strongly to the Secretary of War a removal of the military post from Coleraine, and recommended Trader's Hill. I found Captain Eaton and Captain Tinsley at Coleraine when I arrived there.

Mr. McRae (to Col. Gaither.) How long were you at Coleraine before the arrival of General Eaton?

Answer. He was there before me.

Question. Did General Eaton go there with orders from the Secretary of War?

Answer. Yes; I suppose so.

Question. You suppose General Eaton had no hand in choosing the place?

Answer. I suppose not.

A more correct statement of the evidence of John Brokenbrough and Joseph C. Cabell delivered in court on Wednesday, the 7th of October.

John Brokenbrough and Joseph C. Cabell, members of the grand jury, were called by Colonel Burr.

Col. Burr. I will ask you both, gentlemen, whether General Wilkinson, before the grand jury, acknowledged that, in any of his letters he had used the words, "he was ready?"

Mr. Brokenbrough. I recollect that General Wilkinson acknowledged that, in the winter 1805-6, he had written to you several letters, in one of which he used the expression "what has become of the grand expedition? I fear Miranda has taken the bread out of your mouth. I shall be ready before you." He also assigned as a reason for writing such a letter, that he had done it with a view of drawing from you a full disclosure of your project; if it should be correct and patriotic, that he might unite in it; if improper, that he might reject it. I asked General Wilkinson whether he had written the letter post-marked "13th May;" he said he did not recollect.

Col. Burr. What period was assigned to that letter containing the expressions just quoted?

Answer. The winter of 1805-6.

Mr. Cabell being requested by Colonel Burr to state his recollection of the evidence of General Wilkinson as to the points above mentioned, proceeded in substance as follows:

General Wilkinson had stated, that he had had an interview with you at St. Louis, at which you mentioned a grand project; but that you did not enter into particulars. He remarked that he had made some inquiries as to the nature of the enterprise; but you observed it was unnecessary to enter into particulars, for it was possible it might never be carried into effect. After Colonel Burr left St. Louis, General Wilkinson remarked that he had revolved in his mind the conversation which had passed between him and Colonel Burr, when he spoke of a Western enterprise; and concluded that an attack on Mexico was contemplated, which was to be carried on by the aid of a British fleet through the Gulf of Mexico; that he had written several letters or notes to Colonel Burr with a view to ascertain his real design, between the time of their interview at St. Louis, and the commencement of the following summer; but did not appear to be positive as to the number or nature of those letters. But he remarked that his object was to draw from Colonel Burr a disclosure of the nature of the enterprise; if it were proper, that he might participate in it; but if not, that he might communicate the information to the Government. General Wilkinson, on being interrogated as to the contents of his letters, said that he could not recollect precisely their terms, and but only two expressions which he had used in one of them; "I fear Miranda has taken the bread out of your mouth; I shall be ready for the grand enterprise before you are." I must repeat that Gen. Wilkinson did not appear to be positive as to the dates, number, or contents of those letters; but only as to these two expressions.

With respect to the letter "post-marked 13th May," Gen. Wilkinson, on being interrogated, was not positive whether he had written it, but said he believed he had.

Mr. Wickham. Do you recollect whether General Wilkinson produced a copy, which he said was a true copy of the ciphered letter?

Answer. I do not recollect. I recollect General Wilkinson tendered a copy.

Mr. Wickham (to Mr. Brokenbrough.) Do you recollect whether General Wilkinson produced any fair copy of the ciphered letter to the grand jury?

Answer. I recollect we had a newspaper in which it was published; and as we deciphered the original, we often compared our translation with that copy, and found some variations.

Mr. Hay. Have you a copy of the ciphered letter, as translated by the grand jury? Answer. I have.

Mr. Wickham stated that there were material and essential variations between the translation made by the grand jury, and that published.

Mr. Cabell said, he begged leave to observe, that General Wilkinson was one out of fifty witnesses examined by the grand jury, that his examination took up four days, and that such circumstances only were treasured up as were deemed material.

Mr. McRae. Have you attended to the examination of General Wilkinson before the judge? will you state whether his testimony corresponded with that delivered before the grand jury?

Answer. That is a very extensive question, and one which it is impossible to answer. During the examination of General Wilkinson before the judge, my attention was often called off, and, therefore, I cannot pretend to say whether his testimony throughout corresponded with that delivered before the grand jury. If you will state any particular part of his testimony, I will endeavor to recollect whether it corresponded.

In general, as far as I have attended to the evidence of General Wilkinson given before the judge, the narrative is very much the same with that delivered before the grand jury, with some slight variations. For instance, I understood General Wilkinson said before the court, that but one letter passed between him and Colonel Burr, from the time of their interview at St. Louis till the commencement of the next summer; before the grand jury, I understood him to have said some letters or notes.

The circumstance of the packet being slipped from the side pocket of Mr. Swartwout, and thrust into the hands of General Wilkinson in the absence of Colonel Cushing, at the interview at Natchitoches, was mentioned by the general to the grand jury; if the same was not stated in court, as I have understood, that makes another variance.

Mr. McRae. It was mentioned to the court by General Wilkinson.

Mr. Cabell. Then, sir, I stand corrected. I have already said I could not pretend to an accurate recollection of all General Wilkinson's testimony before the court.

Mr. Wickham (to Mr. Brokenbrough.) Do you recollect any variance between the evidence of Mr. Swartwout and General Wilkinson?

Answer. As to the delivery of the letter from Colonel Burr, there was no difference; but in the details of their conversations there was a very important one.

Here some desultory conversation took place between the counsel on both sides and the court, on the subject of Mr. Tazewell's reply to the question propounded to Dr. Brokenbrough. The counsel for the prosecution and the Chief Justice disagreed in their notes.

Mr. Wickham asked Mr. Cabell the same general question.

Mr. Cabell answered, that the statement of Mr. Tazewell had appeared to him to be very plain and correct, and had been delivered with his usual ability. Being called on to state how far General Wilkinson and Mr. Swartwout agreed in their testimony before the grand jury, in relation to their conversations at Natchitoches, I must say that they coincided in some respects, and differed in others. The material variance is this: Swartwout most positively denied that he had made any criminal communications whatever; and denied his having said any thing about seizing. According to General Wilkinson, the communications of Swartwout were criminal; according to Mr. Swartwout, they were innocent and honorable.

As I have spoken in such high terms of Mr. Tazewell's statement, I must beg leave to except from that sentiment the inference which he drew from the manner in which Mr. Swartwout delivered his testimony before the grand jury. The manner of Mr. Swartwout was certainly that of conscious innocence; but there is other testimony in the case. I choose to suspend my opinion of characters till this investigation shall have terminated.

Evidence of Thomas Power.

SATURDAY, October 17.

Colonel Burr. This witness is to be examined for two purposes: first, to verify certain papers; secondly, to prove that General Wilkinson was at a certain period in the pay of the Spanish Government; and then, by other witnesses, we shall prove that his pay has continued, and that he has frequently been in the habit of receiving large sums of Spanish silver. The object is to impeach his credibility, by proving the falsehood of his declaration that he had not corresponded with the Baron de Carondelet.

Mr. McRae said it was not regular to offer proof of any particular crime to impeach the credibility of a witness. No rule of evidence is more clear than that the general character of the witness is all that should be investigated for that purpose; since every man ought to have notice to enable him to defend himself against any specific charge. He observed, that General Wilkinson had heretofore been slanderously accused of being a pensioner of Spain; that, being desirous of giving his calumniators an opportunity of proving their charges against him, he had once requested General Washington, when he was President, and afterwards Mr. Adams, to direct a court-martial for his trial; but they (satisfied of his innocence) refused his request. General Hamilton also declared that he thought the charge a slander, and a trial unnecessary.

Mr. Wickham. Receiving money from the King of Spain is not an indictable offence. Our ground of defence is, that Colonel Burr's expedition was in concurrence with General Wilkinson against the dominions of the King of Spain, in case of a war. If we prove, that, at the time Wilkinson was pretending to favor Burr's expedition, and secretly determined to defeat it, he was receiving a Spanish pension, this will explain his conduct. He defeated the enterprise of Burr by hatching a charge of treason against the United States, on purpose to serve the King, whose money he was receiving.

Mr. Martin. I am not surprised that gentlemen should have so much feeling on this subject, especially the gentleman who made this objection. There can be no prosecution against a man for receiving Spanish money. Mr. Benjamin Sebastian, in Kentucky, was indeed accused of this as an offence, and it was proved upon him; but I have not heard, though he voluntarily resigned his office of judge, that any prosecution was instituted against him. For my part I wish there was a little more Spanish money among us; I should like to have some of it myself. We wish to show that General Wilkinson is interested in the destruction of Colonel Burr; that he has placed himself in such a situation that he must hang Colonel Burr, or be himself eternally detested. He offered to be tried by a court-martial, because he knew that the only witness against him was out of the power of the process of the United States, being in the dominions of the King of Spain.

Mr. McRae. The gentlemen have heretofore been arguing that the United States were, in fact, at war with Spain. If so, it would have been a great crime in Wilkinson, an officer of the United States, to receive a pension from the King of Spain.

Mr. McRae also read a part of the ninth section of Article 1 of the constitution of the United States, which declares, that "no person, holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State." Would it not, then, said Mr. McRae, be a crime in General Wilkinson, holding a commission under the Government of the United States, to violate the constitution, by receiving a present from the King of Spain? Being admitted to be a crime, it cannot, under the rule of law which I have mentioned, be offered in evidence. If, in fact, any money was received by him, it might have been in commercial intercourse with some Spanish officer; and, if he had been informed in time of the accusation against him, he might have explained the circumstance, and shown that such was the case.

Mr. McRae also remarked the inconsistency of the arguments of the counsel for Colonel Burr; their insisting that his intentions were perfectly innocent, (being merely the settlement of the Washita lands,) and yet attempting to brand General Wilkinson with guilt, for being a participator in those intentions. If they were both equally guilty, this would not render Aaron Burr less criminal.

Mr. Wickham. We never said that General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr were equally guilty. What I said was, that both were engaged in an honorable enterprise in the event of a war with Spain. What we charge General Wilkinson with is, having united with Colonel Burr, and then deserting him; turning traitor, and representing the case quite different from the truth.

The Chief Justice. It is absolutely necessary to hear the testimony to judge of the fact. The only difficulty is, that it does not appear, under the impressions I now have, what effect it can have. If it was proved that General Wilkinson had been a pensioner of the court of Spain, it could have no influence on the case.

Mr. Wickham. We say that General Wilkinson had an interest with the King of Spain, and, in order to preserve the dominions of that monarch which he knew were about to be attacked, he withdrew from Colonel Burr, and represented an enterprise, which was perfectly innocent and eventual, as one highly criminal.

Mr. Martin. General Wilkinson, by betraying Colonel Burr, had a double motive: the one was to acquire favor with his own Government; the other with the King of Spain.

The Chief Justice. I do not understand it to be your object to prove a continuing pension.

Colonel Burr. Our object is to prove the receipt of fourteen thousand and odd dollars at one time, and some knowledge of the payment of other sums of money to General Wilkinson.

Colonel Burr (to Mr. Power.) Are you acquainted with Alexis Bon Ami? Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you know his signature? Answer. I think I do.

Question. Is he a justice of the peace in New Orleans? Answer. Yes.

[Here Colonel Burr produced a certificate from the office of the Secretary of State, showing that Mr. Bon Ami was a justice of the peace for New Orleans.]

Question. Are you acquainted with the signatures of Messrs. Derbigny and Mercier?

Answer: With both, very well.

Question. Will you look at those papers? (showing him their depositions, signed by them respectively, and attested by Bon Ami, a justice of the peace for New Orleans.)

Mr. Power said he believed the signatures to those depositions were in the hand-writing of the persons whose names were annexed to them.

Colonel Burr. Do you know whether Mr. Mercier was subpoenaed to attend here?

Answer. I believe he was. I heard him say that he was subpoenaed, but the afflictions of his family were such, arising from the death of his father-in-law, that he could not possibly attend.

Question. Do you know why Mr. Derbigny is not here? do you know whether he was subpoenaed?

Answer: I heard him say he was.

Question. Why did he not attend?

Answer: I heard him say it would be the utter ruin of his family if he were to take such a long and expensive journey, and in the mean time neglect his business.

Question. Is he a man upon whose personal exertions his family depend for a subsistence?

Answer. I believe so.

Col. Burr (to Mr. Power.) Do you know of any correspondence in cipher by General Wilkinson with Baron Carondelet?

[Mr. Hay objected to the question on the grounds before stated; and because the answer, whether it be in the negative or affirmative, could have no influence on the cause.

Mr. Wickham said that General Wilkinson, in the course of his examination, had been asked whether he had been in the habit of corresponding with the Baron Carondelet in cipher, and had answered "No;" but immediately afterwards said "he did not recollect." He admitted that the answer of General Wilkinson was hastily given; but still, if we are able to prove that he had been in the habit of corresponding with the Baron Carondelet in cipher, his saying that he did not recollect such a correspondence will have a direct tendency to weaken his testimony. If a witness has sworn to a particular fact, although immaterial to the cause, the opposite party may falsify that part, for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the witness.]

Colonel Burr repeated the last question to Mr. Power: Do you know of any correspondence in cipher by General Wilkinson with the Baron de Carondelet?

Mr. Power (addressing the judge.) I hope the court will indulge me with a few remarks, in order to show the delicacy and hardship of the situation in which I am placed. I had, for many years previous to the cession of Louisiana to the United States, been a Spanish officer and a Spanish subject; [Question. Are you a Spanish officer now? Answer. Yes.] my domicile is in New Orleans, but I reside there under a stipulation in the treaty, which allows that privilege. Under this safeguard and protection I was residing and little expected that I should be disturbed or molested for doings, of which I know nothing. On the 16th of August, an attorney or agent of Colonel Burr presented me with a subpoena. I objected to receiving the subpoena, saying that it was irregular and illegal, first, because no writ could be served on a Sunday; and secondly, because it ought to have come through the hands of the marshal of the district. I soon found that my objections were nugatory. I had heard that several others had been subpoenaed, and were excused from attending by giving their affidavits. I offered to do the same, and to declare that I was totally ignorant of Burr's plans.

Those objections of mine were not admitted; nor would my affidavit be received. On my expressing a reluctance to attend, I was given to understand, by the agent of Colonel Burr, that by the same authority which was exercised on Knox last winter, and by which he was put on board a ship and confined with malefactors, I should be treated in the same way. This, I confess, had more weight with me than all his logic. [Colonel Burr. Are you about to object to answering the question? Answer. I am, sir.] I believe it is a fact too generally known that for several years prior to running the boundary line between the United States and the Spanish provinces, I was employed as an agent for my Government.

Mr. Hay. Are you going to answer the question as to the correspondence?

Answer. I am about to show my situation to be so delicate, that I cannot, consistently with honor, answer it; nor can I answer any question which may operate against the King my master.

Colonel Burr. Had you any mercantile connexion with General Wilkinson?

Answer. I had not.

Colonel Burr said that he did not think that there had been any pretext offered which would justify an evasion of the question.

Mr. Power. What would be the amount of the deposition of a man, who, in the very act of deposing, was breaking his most sacred engagements, and pronouncing himself a perjured villain?

Colonel Burr. Are you under the obligation of an oath as to the transaction?

Answer. I am under the obligation of the honor of an officer; an obligation of the highest dignity, which was imposed upon me when I accepted the badge of my office. I never did repeat any set form of words; the mere formula of an oath was never proposed to me; and my superior officer knew my sentiments too well to offer me such an insult. Such a proposition I should have rejected with disdain and indignation.

Mr. Wickham said that, however unpleasant it might be to Mr. Power to answer the question, or whatever his ideas might be as to his ordinary engagements, still it was necessary, for the sake of justice, that the question should be answered. Mr. Power's being an officer of the King of Spain could not release him from the obligation to give evidence in a court of justice. He was now here, within the power of the court, and would be dealt with as any other citizen of the United States.

The Chief Justice said the question must be answered; though he was very sorry that the necessity existed. The objection to answer was not a valid one.

Mr. Power. I have already said that when the interest of the King, my master, is implicated, I will not answer. The court may take what measures it pleases. (Addressing Colonel Burr;) Place yourself in my situation, Colonel Burr; put your hand upon your own bosom, and say what you would do yourself.

Mr. Martin (in a plaintive tone of voice) begged Mr. Power to recollect that the life of a man was at stake; a man who was prosecuted with rigor by his own Government. He must recollect the importance and necessity of calling in the aid of all the evidence which can be procured to exempt him from unmerited punishment.

Mr. Power. I feel full well the situation of Colonel Burr; but I have more at stake than Colonel Burr. I have my honor, my reputation, which are more dear to me than life or property. What would my family, my children, do with property, if these were violated?

Mr. Wickham said he would not press the answer at that time, nor apply to the court to take the necessary measures to enforce it; but would give Mr. Power a few hours to reflect. He will be expected to attend here at three o'clock, at which time the same question will be repeated.

Mr. Power attended a little before three o'clock, and remained for several minutes after. But Mr. Wirt being then in the midst of his argument, he was not called until after he had left the court room. He was again introduced on Monday.

Colonel Burr offered to read the depositions of Messrs. Mercier and Derbigny.

Mr. Hay objected, both because it was improper to read depositions where the witnesses might be had; and because they contained matter improper to be given in evidence. He instanced the deposition of Mr. Stoddart, which the court would not suffer to be read, although, besides being subpoenaed, he (Mr. Hay) had written him several letters pressing his attendance. He said that the absence of the witnesses could not be justified on the grounds stated by them. The excuse offered by one was nothing but the death of his father-in-law; and by the other was, that the distance and expense attending the journey, and the losses of his personal exertions for a subsistence to his family, would produce utter ruin to them if he were to attend. Many other witnesses had attended under circumstances much more oppressive.

The counsel for Colonel Burr contended that there was a wide difference between the case of Mr. Stoddart and that of these witnesses. Mr. Stoddart was convenient to the court, and his attendance might be enforced. Besides, they did not understand the deposition of Mr. Stoddart to be absolutely, but only provisionally rejected; and that it might be read, if his attendance could not be procured.

The Chief Justice decided that the depositions might be read if they contained no matter which was improper to be given in evidence. [It was finally agreed that the judge should take the depositions, and select such parts as were legal evidence.]

MONDAY, October 19.

After Mr. Wirt had finished his excellent speech, the examination of several witnesses took place.

The question concerning Mr. Power's refusal to give evidence recurred. That gentleman was still determined not to reveal any political transactions in which he had been employed as an officer of the Spanish Government.

The counsel for Colonel Burr insisted that he should be compelled to state all that he knew concerning a correspondence between General Wilkinson and the Baron de Carondelet.

The Chief Justice observed that the existence of such a correspondence could be of importance in the present case no farther than that it might be considered as discrediting General Wilkinson's declaration, that he did not recollect his having carried on a correspondence with the Baron de Carondelet, in a cipher similar to that which was used by Colonel Burr. He said that the object of that correspondence would, if explained, have no effect on his decision, relative to the motion now before him. He, therefore, required Mr. Power to answer questions as to the existence of such a correspondence, but not as to its objects.

Mr. Power was then examined, and stated that a correspondence, in a complicated cipher, in which a small dictionary was used, was carried on for some time between General Wilkinson and the Baron de Carondelet; but whether it was the same as that used by Colonel Burr he did not know.

Evidence of Lieutenant Jacob Jackson, delivered in court, on Monday the 19th of October, 1807, which evidence was revised, and again sworn to by him, on Tuesday the 20th of the same month, in the form of a deposition.

I, Jacob Jackson, a second lieutenant in the regiment of artillerists, do certify and say, that, on the 3d or 4th day of January, 1807, Aaron Burr arrived at the Chickasaw Bluffs, in the night time, with one boat, and sent to the commanding officer of the garrison, wishing to know whether he could have quarters in the garrison during the night. Being the commanding and only officer there, I informed the messenger that the said Burr could be accommodated. Accordingly, he came to the garrison in company with several other gentlemen; and the next morning he asked me whether I had heard of the attempts made in Kentucky to prosecute him, under an apprehension that he was about to invade the Spanish dominions. I answered that I had not. He then went on to observe, that he had been prosecuted, but that nothing could be made out against him; that he was going on a project which many wished to know, but that from their inquisitiveness he was not disposed to gratify them. It was a "project, however," said he, "which was honorable to myself, and which would be the making of those who should follow me, provided they survived the undertaking." He continued to observe, that the subjects of Spain were in a very distressed situation, and that his project would tend to relieve them from the tyranny of their Government. I was then asked by him what I thought the opinion of my brother (a member of Congress,) was on the subject. I answered that I did not know. He then asked what I thought of such a project myself? I answered, that if the United States were going to war with Spain, I should be very glad to embark in the enterprise. On which he remarked, that the leading characters in the United States did not mean openly to carry on a war against the Spaniards, but that they secretly favored his views. I then told him that, if such was the case, I was willing to engage in the enterprise; and, after telling me again that the leading men in the United States (by which I supposed he meant to include the heads of departments,) approved his measures, he remarked that he wished to engage young men; that he wished me to go with him, for one; and, that in case I complied, he would give me a captain's commission. Fully believing, from the conversation and high standing of said Aaron Burr, that a war was secretly to be carried on by the United States, against some of the territories of Spain, I finally consented to engage under him. He then observed that I might probably want some money to raise a company. I replied, that I did not want more than was sufficient to take me home; and mentioned one hundred and fifty dollars. He inquired whether I could not let him have some arms and ammunition. I replied that I had a small supply of these articles, but that I did not think myself authorized to furnish him; on which he observed, that he had got some at another garrison, and that I should be justified in supplying him; to which I replied that I did not wish to implicate myself. He then requested me to let some of my men repair two or three muskets, and run him some balls, (the lead he procured at the public factory,) as he wanted, in descending the Mississippi, to kill game for the use of himself and the residue of his men who were behind; and I accordingly suffered the muskets to be repaired and the balls to be run. In the course of various conversations, he frequently requested me to let him have some soldiers to go with him; which I as often refused; at last he wished me to let him have a soldier to carry a letter to Colonel John McKee, in the Chickasaw nation; and, on my refusal, he requested me to give one of my soldiers a pass for twenty days; and observed, that, if he did not return, I could not be blameable; this I also refused. In the course of this conversation, he asked me whether I could not then go with him, or soon follow him, and take with me the soldiery under my command. In answer to which, I remarked (being somewhat alarmed at his propositions,) that I was about to send in my resignation; and that, as soon as I was discharged from the service, I had no objection to following him; but that I could not undertake to seduce the soldiery from their duty while I held a commission. I also observed, that my family was respectable, and that I would not do any thing to injure the feelings of my relations, or to wound my reputation as an officer; and that, whatever might be his projects, I did not wish to hear any thing more about them, unless they were honorable. To which he replied, that his views were honorable; and that, by my complying with his request, I should not incur any blame; that many of the officers of the army were actually engaged with him; and that he expected to derive great assistance from the present military force; that General Eaton was coming round with the navy; and that he expected soon to receive ten thousand stands of arms. He, moreover, observed that, as he was acquainted with my father, he should like to have me join him, and the sooner I did it the better. I replied, that it might be some time before I could receive an answer to my resignation; but that when I did, I would follow him, provided I found him patronised by the United States. He then observed, that it would not do to delay business, and would, therefore, furnish me with money to raise a company. He asked me the expense of a man to carry a letter to Colonel McKee in the Chickasaw nation. I replied, about fifteen dollars. He then asked me how many Indians I thought Colonel McKee could raise in the Choctaw nation? My reply was, that I did not know; but that Colonel McKee had resided there some time, and his influence was probably considerable.

On the morning of the 6th of the said January, just before he started down the Mississippi, on my entering the room where the said Burr was, he said to me, there is something for you on the mantel-tree piece, over the fire; on which, I took from thence one hundred and fifty dollars in bank notes; and a draft on John Smith for five hundred dollars, which he, at the same time, presented me, observing that a draft was easier carried than money; that as to a receipt for the money, he should not take any; and that in case I disliked his plans, he relied on my honor to return it. This money and draft were given me by the said Burr for the express purpose of raising a company of men to join him, and for building a boat calculated to ascend currents, particular instructions about which he gave me. He further observed, that he intended to fix himself in the Spanish dominions, and there proclaim his intentions; that if I was not informed of them before I left the Bluffs, he wished me, on my way to Virginia, to call on General Tupper, at Marietta, to whom he should communicate his intentions, as soon as he had fixed himself in the Spanish dominions, and that he would communicate them to me; and, at the same time, he gave me a letter to said Tupper, which I burned as soon as I received the President's proclamation; and, on his leaving the Bluffs, he pressed me to leave the garrison in fifteen days, and not to wait for the acceptance of my resignation; and, on my way down the Mississippi, to endeavor to get as many of the soldiery at the Bluffs to accompany me as possible.

And further this deponent saith not.

CITY OF RICHMOND, scit:

This day, the 21st of October, 1807, Thomas Ritchie, editor of the Enquirer, published in this city, made oath before me, a magistrate of the said city, that the ten half sheets annexed hereto, containing opinions of the Circuit Court of the United States for the fifth circuit and district of Virginia, in the case of Aaron Burr, &c. &c., were printed in the Enquirer, from the original manuscript furnished by Chief Justice Marshall; and that the proof sheets were always submitted to his inspection and correction.

Given under my hand, the day and year above written.

Opinion of the court on the motion made by the counsel for the United States, Monday, May 25th, 1807, to commit Aaron Burr for treason, after the grand jury were sworn, and before the indictment was laid before them.

TUESDAY, May 26.

The court delivered the following opinion, on Mr. Hay's motion for commitment:

In considering the question which was argued yesterday, it appears to be necessary to decide:

1st. Whether the court, sitting as a court, possesses the power to commit any person charged with an offence against the United States.

2d. If this power be possessed, whether circumstances exist in this case which ought to restrain its exercise.

The first point was not made in the argument, and would, if decided against the attorney for the United States, only change the mode of proceeding. If a doubt can exist respecting it, that doubt arises from the omission, in the laws of the United States, to invest their courts, sitting as courts, with the power in question. It is expressly given to every justice and judge, but not to a court.

This objection was not made on the part of Colonel Burr; and is now mentioned, not because it is believed to present any intrinsic difficulty, but to show that it has been considered.

This power is necessarily exercised by courts in discharge of their functions, and seems not to have been expressly given, because it is implied in the duties which a court must perform; and the judicial act contemplates it in this light. They have cognizance of all crimes against the United States; they are composed of the persons who can commit for those crimes; and it is obviously understood, by the Legislature, that the judges may exercise collectively the power which they possess individually, so far as is necessary to enable them to retain a person charged with an offence, in order to receive the judgment which may finally be rendered in his case. The court say this is obviously understood by the Legislature, because there is no clause expressly giving to the court the power to bail or to commit a person, who appears in the discharge of his recognizance, and against whom the attorney for the United States does not choose to proceed; and yet the 33d section of the judicial act evinces a clear understanding in the Legislature, that the power to take bail is in possession of the court.

If a person shall appear, in conformity with his recognizance, and the court passes away without taking any order respecting him, he is discharged. A new recognizance, therefore, or a commitment on the failure to enter into one, is in the nature of an original commitment; and this power has been uniformly exercised.

It is believed to be a correct position, that the power to commit, for offences of which it has cognizance, is exercised by every court of criminal jurisdiction, and that courts as well as individual magistrates are conservators of the peace.

Were it otherwise, the consequence would only be that it would become the duty of the judge to descend from the bench, and, in his character as an individual magistrate, to do that which the court is asked to do.

If the court possesses the power, it is certainly its duty to hear the motion which has been made on the part of the United States; for in cases of the character of that under consideration, its duty and its power are co-extensive with each other. It was observed, when the motion was made, and the observation may now be repeated, that the arguments urged, on the part of the accused, rather prove the motion on the part of the United States unnecessary, or that inconveniences may result from it, than the want of a legal right to make it.

The first is, that the grand jury being now in session, ready to receive an indictment, the attorney for the United States ought to proceed by bill, instead of applying to the court, since the only purpose of a commitment is to bring the accused before a grand jury. This statement contains an intrinsic error, which destroys its operation. The commitment is not made for the sole purpose of bringing the accused before a grand jury; it is made for the purpose of subjecting him, personally, to the judgment of the law, and the grand jury is only the first step towards that judgment.

If, as has been argued, the commitment was simply to detain the person until a grand jury could be obtained, then its operation would cease on the assembling of a grand jury; but such is not the fact. The order of commitment retains its force while the jury is in session; and if the prosecutor does not proceed, the court is accustomed to retain a prisoner in confinement, or to renew his recognizance to a subsequent term.

The arguments drawn from the general policy of our laws, from the attention which should be bestowed on prosecutions, instituted by special order of the Executive, from the peculiar inconveniences and hardships of this particular case, from the improper effects which inevitably result from this examination, are, some of them, subject for the consideration of those who make the motion, rather than of the court, and others go to the circumspection with which the testimony in support of the motion ought to be weighed, rather than to the duty of hearing it.

It has been said that Col. Burr already stands charged with treason, and that, therefore, a motion to commit him for the same offence is improper; but the fact is not so understood by the court. The application to charge him with treason was rejected by the judge to whom it was made, because the testimony offered in support of the charge did not furnish probable cause for the opinion that the crime had been committed. After this rejection, Col. Burr stood, so far as respected his legal liability to have the charge repeated, in precisely the same situation as if it had never been made. He appears in court now as if the crime of treason had never before been alleged against him; that it has been alleged, that the Government had had time to collect testimony for the establishment of the fact, that an immense crowd of witnesses are attending for the purpose, that the prosecutor in his own judgment has testimony to support the indictment, are circumstances which may have their influence on the motion for a commitment, or on a continuance, but which cannot deprive the attorney for the United States of the right to make his motion. If he was about to send up a bill to the grand jury, he might move that the person he designed to accuse should be ordered into custody, and it would be in the discretion of the court to grant or to reject the motion.

The court perceives and regrets that the result of this motion may be publications unfavorable to the justice, and to the right decision of the case; but if this consequence is to be prevented, it must be by other means than by refusing to hear the motion. No man feeling a correct sense of the importance which ought to be attached by all to a fair and impartial administration of justice, especially in criminal prosecutions, can view, without extreme solicitude, any attempt which may be made to prejudice the public judgment, and to try any person, not by the laws of his country and the testimony exhibited against him, but by public feelings, which may be, and often are, artificially excited against the innocent as well as the guilty. But the remedy, for a practice not less dangerous than it is criminal, is not to be obtained by suppressing motions, which either party may have a legal right to make.

It is the choice of the prosecutor on the part of the United States to proceed with his motion; it is the opinion of the court that he may open his testimony.

OPINION OF THE COURT

On the question whether Jacob Dunbaugh's affidavit, taken at New Orleans, and certified by B. Cenas, Justice of the Peace, was admissible as evidence on the motion for commitment—pronounced Thursday, May 28.

The Chief Justice pronounced the opinion of the court in the following words.

On the part of the United States, a paper purporting to be an affidavit has been offered in evidence, to the reading of which two exceptions are taken:

1st. That an affidavit ought not to be admitted where the personal attendance of the witness could have been obtained;

2dly. That this paper is not so authenticated as to entitle itself to be considered as an affidavit.

That a magistrate may commit upon affidavits has been decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, though not without hesitation. The presence of the witness to be examined by the committing justice confronted with the accused is certainly to be desired, and ought to be obtained, unless considerable inconvenience and difficulty exist in procuring his attendance. An ex parte affidavit, shaped, perhaps, by the person pressing the prosecution, will always be viewed with some suspicion, and acted upon with some caution; but the court thought it would be going too far to reject it altogether. If it was obvious that the attendance of the witness was easily attainable, but that he was intentionally kept out of the way, the question might be otherwise decided.

But the particular case before the court does not appear to be of this description. The witness resides at a great distance; and there is no evidence that the materiality of his testimony was known to the prosecutors or to the Executive in time to have directed his attendance. It is true that general instructions, which would apply to any individual, might have been sent, and the attendance of this or any other material witness obtained under those instructions; but it would be requiring too much to say that the omission to do this ought to exclude an affidavit. This exception, therefore, will not prevail.

The second is, that the paper is not so authenticated as to be introduced as testimony on a question which concerns the liberty of a citizen.

This objection is founded on two omissions in the certificate.

The first is, that the place at which the affidavit was taken does not appear;

The second, that the certificate of the Governor does not state the person who administered the oath to be a magistrate, but goes no further than to say that a person of that name was a magistrate.

That, for aught appearing to the court, this oath may or may not, in point of fact, have been legally administered, must be conceded.

The place where the oath was administered not having been stated, it may have been administered where the magistrate had no jurisdiction, and yet the certificate be perfectly true. Of consequence, there is no evidence before the court that the magistrate had power to administer the oath, and was acting in his judicial capacity.

The effect of testimony may often be doubtful, and courts must exercise their best judgment in the case; but of the verity of the paper there ought never to be a doubt. No paper writing ought to gain admittance into a court of justice as testimony, unless it possesses those solemnities which the law requires. Its authentication must not rest upon probability, but must be as complete as the nature of the case admits of. This is believed to be a clear legal principle. In conformity with it is, as the court conceives, the practice of England and of this country, as is attested by the books of forms; and no case is recollected in which a contrary principle has been recognised. This principle is in some degree illustrated by the doctrine with respect to all courts of a limited jurisdiction. Their proceedings are erroneous, if their jurisdiction be not conclusively shown. They derive no validity from the strongest probability that they had jurisdiction in the case; none, certainly, from the presumption that, being a court, a usurpation of jurisdiction will not be presumed. The reasoning applies in full force to the actings of a magistrate whose jurisdiction is local. Thus, in the case of a warrant, it is expressly declared that the place where it was made ought to appear.

The attempt to remedy this defect, by comparing the date of the certificate given by the magistrate with that given by the Governor, cannot succeed. The answer given at bar to this argument is conclusive. The certificate wants those circumstances which would make it testimony, and without them no part of it can be regarded.

The second objection is equally fatal. The Governor has certified that a man of the same name with the person who has administered the oath is a magistrate, but not that the person who has administered it is a magistrate.

It is too obvious to be controverted that there may be two or more persons of the same name; and, consequently, to produce that certainty which the case readily admits of, the certificate of the Governor ought to have applied to the individual who administered the oath. The propriety of this certainty and precision in a certificate, which is to authenticate any affidavit to be introduced into a court of justice, is so generally admitted, that I do not recollect a single instance in which the principle has been departed from.

It has been said that it ought to appear that there are two persons of the same name, or the court will not presume such to be the fact. The court presumes nothing. It may or may not be the fact, and the court cannot presume that it is not. The argument proceeds upon the idea that an instrument is to be disproved by him who objects to it, not that it is to be proved by him who offers it. Nothing can be more repugnant to the established usage of courts.

How is it to be proved that there are two persons of the name of Cenas in the Territory of Orleans? If, with a knowledge of several weeks, perhaps months, that this prosecution was to be carried on, the Executive ought not to be required to produce this witness, ought the prisoner to be required, with the notice of a few hours, to prove that two persons of the same name reside in New Orleans?

It has been repeatedly urged that a difference exists between the strictness of laws which would be applicable to a trial in chief, and that which is applicable to a motion to commit for trial.

On the reality of this distinction the present controversy affords conclusive proof. At a trial in chief, the accused possesses the valuable privilege of being confronted with his accuser. But there must be some limit to this relaxation, and it appears not to have extended so far as to the admission of a paper not purporting to be an affidavit, and not shown to be one.

When it is asked whether every man does not believe that this affidavit was really taken before a magistrate, it is at once answered that this cannot affect the case. Should a man of probity declare a certain fact within his own knowledge, he would be credited by all who knew him, but his declaration could not be received as testimony by the judge, who firmly believed him. So a man might be believed to be guilty of a crime, but a jury could not convict him, unless the testimony proved him to be guilty of it. This judicial disbelief of a probable circumstance does not establish a wide interval between common law and common sense. It is believed, in this respect, to show their intimate union.

The argument goes to this; that the paper shall be received and acted upon as an affidavit, not because the oath appears to have been administered according to law, but because it is probable that it was so administered.

This point seems to have been decided by the constitution.

"The right of the people," says that instrument, "to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the places to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

The cause of seizure is not to be supported by a probable oath, or an oath that was probably taken, but by oath absolutely taken. This oath must be a legal oath; and if it must be a legal oath, it must legally appear to the court to be so. This provision is not made for a final trial; it is made for the very case now under consideration. In the cool and temperate moments of reflection, undisturbed by that whirlwind of passion with which in those party conflicts which most generally produce acts or accusations of treason the human judgment is sometimes overthrown, the people of America have believed the power even of commitment to be capable of too much oppression in its execution, to be placed, without restriction, even in the hands of the National Legislature. Shall a judge disregard those barriers which the nation has deemed it proper to erect?

The interest which the people have in this prosecution has been stated; but it is firmly believed that the best and true interest of the people is to be found in a rigid adherence to those rules which preserve the fairness of criminal prosecutions in every stage.

If this was a case to be decided by principle alone, the court would certainly not receive this paper. But if the point is settled by decisions, they must be conformed to.

It has been said to be settled in the Supreme Court of the United States by admitting the affidavit of Wilkinson, to which an exception was taken, because it did not appear that the magistrate had taken the oaths prescribed by law. It was said that, as by law he could not act until he had taken the oaths and he was found acting, it must be presumed that this prerequisite was complied with; that is, that his acting as a magistrate under his commission was evidence that he was authorized so to act.

It will not be denied that there is much strength in the argument; but the cases do not appear to be precisely parallel.

The certificate that he is a magistrate and that full faith is due to his acts, implies that he has qualified, if his qualification is necessary to his being a complete magistrate, whose acts are entitled to full faith and credit.

It is not usual for a particular certificate that a magistrate has qualified to accompany his official acts.

There is no record of his qualification, and no particular testimonial of it could be obtained.

These observations do not apply to the objections which exist.

But it is said that the certificate is the same with that in General Wilkinson's affidavit.

If this objection had been taken and overruled, it would have ended the question. But it was not taken, so far as is now recollected, and does not appear to have been noticed by the court. It is not recollected by the judge who sat on that occasion to have been noticed. A defect, if it be one, which was not observed, cannot be cured by being passed over in silence.

The case in Washington was a civil case, and turned upon the point, that no form of the commission was prescribed, and, consequently, that it was not necessary to appear on the face of it that it was directed to magistrates.

That it was the duty of the clerk to direct it to magistrates, and he should not be presumed to have neglected his duty in a case in which his performance of it need not appear on the face of the instrument.

That the person intending to take this exception ought to have taken it sooner, and not surprise the opposite party when it was too late to correct it.

But the great difference is, that the privy examination was a mere ministerial act; the administering an oath is a judicial act.

The court is of opinion that the paper, purporting to be an affidavit made by Dunbaugh, cannot be read, because it does not appear to be on oath.

Opinion on the motion for a writ of subpoena duces tecum, to be directed to the President of the United States, pronounced June 13, 1807.

The discussion of this question was at length waived, when the Chief Justice delivered the following opinion on the motion to issue a subpoena duces tecum, directed to the President of the United States. The object of the motion now to be decided is to obtain copies of certain orders understood to have been issued to the land and naval officers of the United States for the apprehension of the accused; and an original letter from General Wilkinson to the President, in relation to the accused, with the answer of the President to that letter, which papers are supposed to be material to the defence. As the legal mode of effecting this object, a motion is made for a subpœna duces tecum to be directed to the President of the United States.

In opposition to this motion, a preliminary point has been made by the counsel for the prosecution. It has been insisted by them that, until the grand jury shall have found a true bill, the party accused is not entitled to subpœnas or to the aid of the court to obtain his testimony.

It will not be said that this opinion is now, for the first time, advanced in the United States; but certainly it is now, for the first time, advanced in Virginia. So far back as any knowledge of our jurisprudence is possessed, the uniform practice of this country has been to permit any individual, who was charged with any crime, to prepare for his defence, and to obtain the process of the court for the purpose of enabling him so to do. This practice is as convenient, and is as consonant to justice as it is to humanity. It prevents, in a great measure, those delays which are never desirable, which frequently occasion the loss of testimony, and which are often oppressive, that would be the inevitable consequence of withholding from a prisoner the process of the court, until the indictment against him was found by a grand jury. The right of an accused person to the process of the court, to compel the attendance of witnesses, seems to follow necessarily from the right to examine those witnesses; and, wherever the right exists, it would be reasonable that it should be accompanied with the means of rendering it effectual. It is not doubted that a person, who appears before a court under a recognizance, must expect that a bill will be preferred against him, or that a question concerning the continuance of the recognizance will be brought before the court. In the first event, he has the right, and it is, perhaps, his duty, to prepare for his defence at the trial. In the second event, it will not be denied that he possesses the right to examine witnesses on the question of continuing his recognizance. In either case, it would seem reasonable that he should be entitled to the process of the court, to procure the attendance of his witnesses.

The genius and character of our laws and usages are friendly, not to condemnation at all events, but to a fair and impartial trial; and they, consequently, allow to the accused the right of preparing the means to secure such a trial. The objection that the attorney may refuse to proceed at this time, and that no day is fixed for the trial, if he should proceed, presents no real difficulty. It would be a very insufficient excuse to a prisoner who had failed to prepare for his trial, to say that he was not certain the attorney would proceed against him. Had the indictment been found at the last term, it would have been, in some measure, uncertain whether there would have been a trial at this, and still more uncertain on what day that trial would take place; yet subpœnas would have issued returnable to the first day of the term; and if, after its commencement, other subpœnas had been required, they would have issued returnable as the court might direct. In fact, all process, to which the law has affixed no certain return day, is made returnable at the discretion of the court.

General principles, then, and general practice, are in favor of the right of every accused person, so soon as his case is in court, to prepare for his defence, and to receive the aid of process of the court, to compel the attendance of his witnesses.

The constitution and laws of the United States will now be considered for the purpose of ascertaining how they bear upon the question.

The eighth amendment to the constitution gives to the accused, in all criminal prosecutions, a right to a speedy and public trial, and to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. The right given by this article must be deemed sacred by the courts, and the article should be so construed as to be something more than a dead letter. What can more effectually elude the right to a speedy trial than the declaration that the accused shall be disabled from preparing for it, until an indictment shall be found against him? It is certainly much more in the true spirit of the provision which secures to the accused a speedy trial, that he should have the benefit of the provision which entitles him to compulsory process as soon as he is brought into court.

This observation derives additional force from the consideration of the manner in which this subject has been contemplated by Congress. It is obvious, by the intention of the National Legislature, that, in all capital cases, the accused shall be entitled to process before indictment found. The words of the law are: "and every such person or persons, accused or indicted of the crimes aforesaid, (that is, of treason, or any other capital offence,) shall be allowed and admitted, in his said defence, to make any proof that he or they can produce by lawful witness or witnesses, and shall have the like process of the court, where he or they shall be tried, to compel his or their witnesses to appear at his or their trial, as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear on the prosecution against them."

This provision is made for persons accused or indicted. From the imperfection of human language, it frequently happens that sentences which ought to be the most explicit are of doubtful construction; and in this case, the words "accused or indicted" may be construed to be synonymous to describe a person in the same situation, or to apply to different stages of the prosecution. The word or may be taken in a conjunctive or a disjunctive sense. A reason for understanding them in the latter sense is furnished by the section itself. It commences with declaring that any person who shall be accused and indicted of treason, shall have a copy of the indictment, and at least three days before his trial. This right is obviously to be enjoyed after an indictment, and therefore the words are "accused and indicted." So, with respect to the subsequent clause, which authorizes a party to make his defence, and directs the court, on his application, to assign him counsel. The words relate to any one accused and indicted. But when the section proceeds to authorize the compulsory process for witnesses, the phraseology is changed. The words are, "and every such person or persons accused or indicted," &c.; thereby adapting the expression to the situation of an accused person both before and after indictment. It is to be remarked, too, that the person so accused or indicted, is to have "the like process to compel his or their witnesses to appear at his or their trial, as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear on the prosecution against them." The fair construction of this clause would seem to be that, with respect to the means of compelling the attendance of witnesses to be furnished by the court, the prosecution and defence are placed by the law on equal ground. The right of the prosecutor to take out subpœnas or to avail himself of the aid of the court in any stage of the proceedings previous to the indictment is not controverted. This act of Congress, it is true, applies only to capital cases; but persons charged with offences not capital have a constitutional and a legal right to examine their testimony, and this act ought to be considered as declaratory of the common law in cases where this constitutional right exists.

Upon immemorial usage, then, and upon what is deemed a sound construction of the constitution and law of the land, the court is of opinion that any person charged with a crime in the courts of the United States has a right, before as well as after indictment, to the process of the court, to compel the attendance of his witnesses. Much delay and much inconvenience may be avoided by this construction; no mischief which is perceived can be produced by it. The process would only issue, when, according to the ordinary course of proceeding, the indictment would be tried at the term to which the subpoena is made returnable, so that it becomes incumbent on the accused to be ready for his trial at that term.

This point being disposed of, it remains to inquire whether a subpœna duces tecum cannot be directed to the President of the United States, and whether it ought to be directed in this case.

This question originally consisted of two parts. It was at first doubted whether a subpoena could issue, in any case, to the Chief Magistrate of the nation; and, if it could, whether that subpoena could do more than direct his personal attendance; whether it could direct him to bring with him a paper which was to constitute the gist of his testimony.

While the argument was opening, the attorney for the United States avowed his opinion that a general subpoena might issue to the President, but not a subpœna duces tecum. This terminated the argument on that part of the question. The court, however, has thought it necessary to state briefly the foundation of its opinions that such a subpoena may issue.

In the provisions of the constitution and of the statute which give to the accused a right to the compulsory process of the court, there is no exception whatever. The obligation, therefore, of those provisions is general; and it would seem that no person could claim an exemption from them but one who would not be a witness. At any rate, if an exception to the general principle exists, it must be looked for in the law of evidence. The exceptions furnished by the law of evidence (with one only reservation) so far as they are personal, are of those only whose testimony could not be received.

The single reservation alluded to is the case of the King. Although he may perhaps give testimony, it is said to be incompatible with his dignity to appear under the process of the court. Of the many points of difference which exist between the First Magistrate in England and the First Magistrate of the United States, in respect of the personal dignity conferred on them by the constitution of their respective nations, the court will only select and mention two. It is a principle of the English constitution that the King can do no wrong; that no blame can be imputed to him; that he cannot be named in debate.

By the constitution of the United States, the President, as well as every other officer of the Government, may be impeached, and may be removed from office on conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors.

By the constitution of Great Britain, the crown is hereditary, and the monarch can never become a subject.

By that of the United States, the President is elected from the mass of the people, and, on the expiration of the time for which he was elected, returns to the mass of the people again.

How essentially this difference of circumstances must vary the policy of the laws of the two countries in reference to the personal dignity of the Executive chief will be perceived by every person. In this respect, the First Magistrate of the Union may more properly be likened to the First Magistrate of a State—at any rate under the former confederation; and it is not known ever to have been doubted that the Chief Magistrate of a State might be served with a subpœna ad testificandum.

If, in any court of the United States, it has ever been decided that a subpoena cannot issue to the President, that decision is unknown to this court.

If, upon any principle, the President could be construed to stand exempt from the general provisions of the constitution, it would be because his duties as Chief Magistrate demand his whole time for national objects. But it is apparent that this demand is not unremitting, and if it should exist at the time when his attendance on a court is required, it would be known on the return of the subpoena, and would rather constitute a reason for not obeying the process of the court, than a reason against its being issued. In point of fact, it cannot be doubted that the people of England have the same interest in the service of the Executive Government, that is, of the cabinet council, that the American people have in the service of the Executive of the United States, and that their duties are as arduous and as unremitting. Yet it has never been alleged that a subpoena might not be directed to them.

It cannot be denied, that, to issue a subpoena to a person filling the exalted station of the Chief Magistrate, is a duty which would be dispensed with much more cheerfully than it would be performed; but, if it be a duty, the court can have no choice in the case.

If, then, as it is admitted by the counsel for the United States, a subpoena may issue to the President, the accused is entitled to it of course; and whatever difference may exist with respect to the power to compel the same obedience to the process, as if it had been directed to a private citizen, there exists no difference with respect to the right to obtain it. The guard furnished to this high officer to protect him from being harassed by vexatious and unnecessary subpoenas, is to be looked for in the conduct of a court after those subpoenas have issued, not in any circumstance which is to precede their being issued.

If, in being summoned to give his personal attendance to testify, the law does not discriminate between the President and a private citizen, what foundation is there for the opinion, that this difference is created by the circumstance that his testimony depends on a paper in his possession, not on facts which have come to his knowledge otherwise than by writing? The court can perceive no foundation for such an opinion. The propriety of introducing any paper into a case as testimony, must depend on the character of the paper, not on the character of the person who holds it. A subpœna duces tecum, then, may issue to any person to whom an ordinary subpoena may issue, directing him to bring any paper of which the party praying it has a right to avail himself, as testimony, if, indeed, that be the necessary process for obtaining the view of such paper.

When this subject was suddenly introduced, the court felt some doubt concerning the propriety of directing a subpoena to the chief magistrate, and some doubt also concerning the propriety of directing any paper in his possession, not public in its nature, to be exhibited in court. The impression that the questions which might arise in consequence of such process were more proper for discussion on the return of the process than on its issuing, was then strong on the mind of the judges; but the circumspection with which they would take any step which would, in any manner, relate to that high personage, prevented their yielding readily to those impressions, and induced the request that those points, if not admitted, might be argued. The result of that argument is a confirmation of the impression originally entertained. The court can perceive no legal objection to issuing a subpœna duces tecum to any person whatever, provided the case be such as to justify the process.

This is said to be a motion to the discretion of the court. This is true; but a motion to its discretion, is a motion not to its inclination but to its judgment, and its judgment is to be guided by sound legal principles.

A subpœna duces tecum varies from an ordinary subpoena only in this, that a witness is summoned for the purpose of bringing with him a paper in his custody. In some of our sister States, whose system of jurisprudence is erected on the same foundation with our own, this process, we learn, issues of course. In this State it issues not absolutely of course, but with leave of the court. No case, however, exists, as is believed, in which the motion has been founded on an affidavit, in which it has been denied, or in which it has been opposed. It has been truly observed, that the opposite party can regularly take no more interest in the awarding a subpœna duces tecum than in the awarding an ordinary subpoena. In either case he may object to any delay, the grant of which may be implied in granting the subpoena; but he can no more object regularly to the legal means of obtaining testimony which exists in the mind, than in the papers of the person who may be summoned. If no inconvenience can be sustained by the opposite party, he can only oppose the motion in the character of an amicus curiæ, to prevent the court from making an improper order, or from burdening some officer by compelling an unnecessary attendance. This court would certainly be very unwilling to say that, upon a fair construction, the constitutional and legal right to obtain its process to compel the attendance of witnesses does not extend to their bringing with them such papers as may be material in the defence. The literal distinction which exists between the cases is too much attenuated to be countenanced in the tribunals of a just and humane nation. If, then, the subpoena be used without inquiry into the manner of its application, it would seem to trench on the privileges which the constitution extends to the accused; it would seem to reduce his means of defence within narrower limits than is designed by the fundamental law of our country, if an overstrained rigor should be used with respect to his right to apply for papers deemed by himself to be material. In the one case, the accused is made the absolute judge of the testimony to be summoned; if, in the other, he is not to judge absolutely for himself, his judgment ought to be controlled only so far as it is apparent that he means to exercise his privileges, not really in his own defence, but for purposes which the court ought to discountenance. The court would not lend its aid to motions obviously designed to manifest disrespect to the Government, but the court has no right to refuse its aid to motions for papers to which the accused may be entitled, and which may be material in his defence.

These observations are made to show the nature of the discretion which may be exercised. If it is apparent that the papers are irrelative to the case, or that, for state reasons, they cannot be introduced into the defence, the subpœna duces tecum would be useless; but, if this is not apparent, if they may be important in the defence, if they may be safely read at the trial, would it not be a blot in the page which records the judicial proceedings of this country, if in a case of such serious import as this the accused should be denied the use of them?

The counsel for the United States take a very different view of this subject, and insist that a motion for process to obtain testimony should be supported by the same full and explicit proof of the nature and application of that testimony, which would be required on a motion which would delay public justice; which would arrest the ordinary course of proceeding, or which would in any other manner affect the rights of the opposite party. In favor of this position has been urged the opinion of one, whose loss as a friend and as a judge, I sincerely deplore; whose worth I feel, and whose authority I shall at all times greatly respect. If his opinion were really opposed to mine, I should certainly revise, deliberately revise, the judgment I had formed; but I perceive no such opposition.

In the trials of Smith and Ogden, the court in which Judge Patterson presided required a special affidavit in support of a motion made by the counsel for the accused for a continuance and for an attachment against witnesses who had been summoned and had failed to attend.

Had this requisition of a special affidavit been made as well as a foundation for an attachment, as for a continuance, the cases would not have been parallel; because the attachment was considered by the counsel for the prosecution merely as a mean of punishing the contempt; and a court might certainly require stronger testimony to induce them to punish a contempt than would be required to lend its aid to a party in order to procure evidence in a cause. But the proof furnished by the case is most conclusive, that the special statements of the affidavit were required solely on account of the continuance.

Although the counsel for the United States considered the motion for an attachment merely as a mode of punishing for contempt, the counsel for Smith and Ogden considered it as compulsory process to bring in a witness, and moved a continuance until they could have the benefit of this process. The continuance was to arrest the ordinary course of justice, and therefore the court required a special affidavit, showing the materiality of the testimony before this continuance could be granted. Prima facie evidence could not apply to the case, and there was an additional reason for a special affidavit. The object of this special statement was expressly said to be for a continuance.

Colden proceeded: "The present application is to put off the cause on account of the absence of witnesses, whose testimony the defendant alleges is material for his defence, and who have disobeyed the ordinary process of the court. In compliance with the intimation from the bench yesterday, the defendant has disclosed, by the affidavit which I have just read, the points to which he expects the witnesses who have been summoned will testify.

"If the court cannot, or will not issue compulsory process to bring in the witnesses, who are the objects of this application, then the cause will not be postponed.

"Or if it appears to the court that the matter disclosed by the affidavit might not be given in evidence if the witnesses were now here, then we cannot expect that our motion will be successful. For it would be absurd to suppose that the court will postpone the trial on account of the absence of witnesses whom they cannot compel to appear; and of whose voluntary attendance there is too much reason to despair; or on account of the absence of witnesses, who, if they were before the court, could not be heard on the trial." (Page 12.)

This argument states unequivocally the purpose for which a special affidavit was required.

The counsel for the United States considered the subject in the same light. After exhibiting an affidavit for the purpose of showing that the witnesses could not probably possess any material information, Mr. Sanford said "It was decided by the court yesterday that it was incumbent on the defendant, in order to entitle himself to a postponement of the trial, on account of the absence of these witnesses, to show in what respect they are material for his defence. It was the opinion of the court that the general affidavit in common form would not be sufficient for this purpose; but that the particular facts expected from the witnesses must be disclosed, in order that the court might, upon those facts, judge of the propriety of granting the postponement." (Page 27.)

The court frequently treated the subject so as to show the opinion that the special affidavit was required only on account of the continuance; but what is conclusive on this point is, that, after deciding the testimony of the witnesses to be such as could not be offered to the jury, Judge Patterson was of opinion that a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue ought to be granted. He could not have required the materiality of the witness to be shown on a motion the success of which did not, in his opinion, in any degree, depend on that materiality; and which he granted, after deciding the testimony to be such as the jury ought not to hear. It is then most apparent that the opinion of Judge Patterson has been misunderstood, and that no inference can possibly be drawn from it opposed to the principle which has been laid down by the court. That principle will, therefore, be applied to the present motion.

The first paper required is the letter of General Wilkinson, which was referred to in the message of the President to Congress. The application of that letter to the case is shown by the terms in which the communication was made. It is a statement of the conduct of the accused, made by the person who is declared to be the essential witness against him. The order for producing this letter is opposed—

1st. Because it is not material to the defence.

It is a principle universally acknowledged, that a party has a right to oppose to the testimony of any witness against him the declarations which that witness has made at other times on the same subject. If he possesses this right, he must bring forward proof of those declarations. This proof must be obtained before he knows positively what the witness will say; for if he waits until the witness has been heard at the trial, it is too late to meet him with his former declarations. Those former declarations, therefore, constitute a mass of testimony which a party has a right to obtain, by way of precaution, and the positive necessity of which can only be decided at the trial.

It is with some surprise an argument was heard from the bar, insinuating that the award of a subpoena on this ground gave the countenance of the court to suspicions, affecting the veracity of a witness who is to appear on the part of the United States. This observation could not have been considered. In contests of this description the court takes no part; the court has no right to take a part. Every person may give in evidence testimony such as is stated in this case. What would be the feelings of the prosecutor, if in this case the accused should produce a witness completely exculpating himself, and the attorney for the United States should be arrested in his attempt to prove what the same witness had said upon a former occasion, by a declaration from the bench that such an attempt could not be permitted, because it would imply a suspicion on the court that the witness had not spoken the truth? Respecting so unjustifiable an interposition but one opinion would be formed.

The second objection is, that the letter contains matter which ought not to be disclosed.

That there may be matter, the production of which the court would not require, is certain; but that in a capital case, the accused ought not in some form to have the benefit of it, if it was really essential to his defence, is a position which the court would very reluctantly deny. It ought not to be believed that the department which superintends prosecutions in criminal cases would be inclined to withhold it. What ought to be done under such circumstances presents a delicate question, the discussion of which, it is hoped, will never be rendered necessary in this country. At present it need only be said that the question does not occur at this time. There is certainly nothing before the court which shows that the letter in question contains any matter the disclosure of which would endanger the public safety. If it does contain such matter, the fact may appear before the disclosure is made. If it does contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the Executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will, of course, be suppressed. It is not easy to conceive that so much of the letter as relates to the conduct of the accused can be a subject of delicacy with the President. Every thing of this kind, however, will have its due consideration on the return of the subpoena.

3dly. It has been alleged that a copy may be received instead of the original; and the act of Congress has been cited in support of this proposition.

This argument presupposes that the letter required is a document filed in the Department of State, the reverse of which may be, and most probably is, the fact. Letters addressed to the President are most usually retained by himself. They do not belong to any of the Departments. But were the fact otherwise, a copy might not answer the purpose. The copy would not be superior to the original, and the original itself would not be admitted, if denied, without proof that it was in the hand-writing of the witness. Suppose the case put at the bar, of an indictment on this letter for a libel, and on its production it should appear not to be in the hand-writing of the person indicted. Would its being deposited in the Department of State make it his writing, or subject him to the consequence of having written it? Certainly not. For the purpose, then, of showing the letter to have been written by a particular person, the original must be produced, and a copy could not be admitted.

On the confidential nature of this letter, much has been said at the bar, and authorities have been produced, which appear to be conclusive. Had its contents been orally communicated, the person to whom the communications were made could not have excused himself from detailing them, so far as they might be deemed essential in the defence. Their being in writing gives no additional sanctity; the only difference produced by that circumstance is, that the contents of the paper must be proved by the paper itself, not by the recollection of the witness.

Much has been said about the disrespect to the Chief Magistrate, which is implied by this motion, and by such a decision of it as the law is believed to require.

These observations will be very truly answered by the declaration that this court feels many, perhaps peculiar motives, for manifesting as guarded a respect for the Chief Magistrate of the Union as is compatible with its official duties. To go beyond these would exhibit a conduct which would deserve some other appellation than the term respect.

It is not for the court to anticipate the event of the present prosecution. Should it terminate as is expected on the part of the United States, all those who are concerned in it should certainly regret that a paper which the accused believed to be essential to his defence, which may, for aught that now appears, be essential, had been withheld from him. I will not say that this circumstance would in any degree tarnish the reputation of the Government, but I will say that it would justly tarnish the reputation of the court which had given its sanction to its being withheld. Might I be permitted to utter one sentiment with respect to myself, it would be to deplore most earnestly the occasion which should compel me to look back on any part of my official conduct with so much self-reproach as I should feel, could I declare, on the information now possessed, that the accused is not entitled to the letter in question, if it should be really important to him.

The propriety of requiring the answer to this letter is more questionable. It is alleged that it most probably communicates orders showing the situation of this country with Spain, which will be important on the misdemeanor. If it contains matter not essential to the defence, and the disclosure is unpleasant to the Executive, it certainly ought not to be disclosed. This is a point which will appear on the return.

The demand of the orders which have been issued, and which have been, as is alleged, published in the Natchez Gazette, is by no means unusual. Such documents have often been produced in the courts of the United States and the courts of England. If they contain matter interesting to the nation, the concealment of which is required by the public safety, that matter will appear upon the return. If they do not, and are material they may be exhibited.

It is said they cannot be material, because they cannot justify any unlawful resistance which may have been employed or meditated by the accused.

Were this admitted, and were it also admitted that such resistance would amount to treason, the orders might still be material, because they might tend to weaken the endeavor to connect such overt act with any overt act of which this court may take cognizance.

The court, however, is rather inclined to the opinion that the subpoena, in such case, ought to be directed to the head of the department in whose custody the orders are, and the court must suppose that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which has been stated by the attorney for the United States to refer the counsel for the prisoner to his legal remedy for the copies he desired, alluded to such a motion as is now made.

The affidavit on which the motion is grounded has not been noticed. It is believed that such a subpoena as is asked ought, to issue if there exist any reason for supposing that the testimony may be material and ought to be admitted. It is only because the subpoena is addressed to those who administer the Government of this country, that such an affidavit was required as would furnish probable cause to believe that the testimony was desired for the real purposes of defence, and not for such as this court will forever discountenance.

Opinion delivered June 18, 1807, on the question whether Charles Willie should be compelled to answer certain questions.

As soon as the court assembled, the Chief Justice delivered the following opinion in the case of Willie:

In point of law the question now before the court relates to the witness himself. The attorney for the United States offers a paper in cipher which he supposes to have proceeded from a person against whom he has preferred an indictment for high treason and another for misdemeanor, both of which are now before the grand jury, and produces a person said to be the secretary or clerk of the accused, who is supposed either to have copied this paper by his directions, or to be able to prove in some other manner that it has proceeded from his authority. To a question demanding whether he understands this paper, the witness has declined giving an answer, saying that the answer might criminate himself; and it is referred to the court to decide whether the excuse he has offered be sufficient to prevent his answering the question which has been propounded to him.

It is a settled maxim of law that no man is bound to criminate himself. This maxim forms one exception to the general rule which declares that every person is compellable to bear testimony in a court of justice. For the witness, who considers himself as being within this exception, it is alleged that he is, and from the nature of things must be, the sole judge of the effect of his answer: that he is, consequently, at liberty to refuse to answer any question, if he will say upon his oath that his answer to that question might criminate himself.

When this opinion was first suggested, the court conceived the principle laid down at the bar to be too broad, and, therefore, required that authorities in support of it might be adduced. Authorities have been adduced, and have been considered. In all of them the court could perceive that an answer to the question propounded might criminate the witness, and he was informed that he was at liberty to refuse an answer. These cases do not appear to the court to support the principle laid down by the counsel for the witness, in the full latitude in which they have stated it. There is no dictum which takes from the court the right to consider and decide whether any direct answer to the particular question propounded could be reasonably supposed to affect the witness. There may be questions, no direct answer to which could in any degree affect him, and there is no case which goes so far as to say that he is not bound to answer such question. The case of Goosly, in this court, is perhaps the strongest that has been adduced. But the general doctrine of the judge in that case must have referred to the circumstances which showed that the answer might criminate him.

When two principles come in conflict with each other, the court must give them both a reasonable construction, so as to preserve them both to a reasonable extent. The principle which entitles the United States to the testimony of every citizen, and the principles by which every witness is privileged not to accuse himself, can neither of them be entirely disregarded. They are believed both to be preserved to a reasonable extent, and according to the true intention of the rule, and of the exception to that rule, by observing that course which it is conceived courts have generally observed. It is this: When a question is propounded, it belongs to the court to consider and to decide whether any direct answer to it can implicate the witness. If this be decided in the negative, then he may answer it without violating the privilege which is secured to him by law. If a direct answer to it may criminate himself, then he must be the sole judge what his answer would be. The court cannot participate with him in this judgment, because they cannot decide on the effect of his answer, without knowing what it would be, and a disclosure of that fact to the judges would strip him of the privilege which the law allows, and which he claims. It follows, necessarily, then, from this state of things, that if the question be of such a description that an answer to it may or may not criminate the witness, according to the purport of that answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it would be, to answer the question or not. If, in such a case, he says upon his oath that his answer would criminate himself, the court can demand no other testimony of the fact. If the declaration be untrue, it is in conscience and in law as much a perjury as if he had declared any other untruth upon his oath; as it is one of those cases in which the rule of law must be abandoned, or the oath of the witness be received.

The counsel for the United States have also laid down this rule according to their understanding of it; but they appear to the court to have made it as much too narrow, as the counsel for the witness have made it too broad. According to their statement, a witness can never refuse to answer any question unless that answer, unconnected with any other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of a crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule, that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself.

It is certainly not only a possible but a probable case, that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would do by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom, he is safe; but draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself, would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description.

What testimony may be possessed, or is attainable against any individual, the court can never know. It would seem, then, that the court ought never to compel a witness to give an answer which discloses a fact that would form a necessary and essential part of a crime which is punishable by the laws.

To apply this reasoning to the particular case under consideration. To know and conceal the treason of another is misprision of treason, and is punishable by law. No witness, therefore, is compellable by law to disclose a fact which would form a necessary and essential part of this crime. If the letter in question contain evidence of treason, which is a fact not dependent on the testimony of the witness before the court, and, therefore, may be proved without the aid of his testimony, and if the witness was acquainted with that treason when the letter was written, he may probably be guilty of misprision of treason, and, therefore, the court ought not to compel him to answer any question, the answer to which might disclose his former knowledge of the contents of that letter.

But if the letter should relate to the misdemeanor and not to the treason, the court is not apprised that a knowledge and concealment of the misdemeanor would expose the witness to any prosecution whatever. On this account, the court was at first disposed to inquire whether the letter should be deciphered, in order to determine, from its contents, how far the witness could be examined respecting it. The court was inclined to this course, from considering the question as one which might require a disclosure of the knowledge which the witness might have had of the contents of this letter when it was put in cipher, or when it was copied by himself, if, indeed, such was the fact. But on hearing the question more particularly and precisely stated, and finding that it refers only to the present knowledge of the cipher, it appears to the court that the question may be answered without implicating the witness, because his present knowledge would not, it is believed, in a criminal prosecution, justify the inference that his knowledge was acquired previous to this trial, or afford the means of proving that fact.

The court is, therefore, of opinion that the witness may answer the question now propounded.

The gentlemen of the bar will understand the rule laid down by the court to be this:

It is the province of the court to judge whether any direct answer to the question which may be proposed will furnish evidence against the witness.

If such answer may disclose a fact, which forms a necessary and essential link in the chain of testimony, which would be sufficient to convict him of any crime, he is not bound to answer it so as to furnish matter for that conviction.

In such a case the witness must himself judge what his answer will be; and if he says on oath that he cannot answer without accusing himself, he cannot be compelled to answer.

Opinion on the motion for an attachment against General Wilkinson, pronounced Saturday, June 27.

The Chief Justice delivered the following opinion on the motion for an attachment against General Wilkinson: The motion now under consideration was heard at this time because it was alleged to be founded on a fact which might affect the justice of the case in which the court is about to be engaged, and because, while the bills were depending before the grand jury, the court might, without impeding the progress of the business, examine into the complaint which has been made.

The motion is to attach General Wilkinson for a contempt of this court, by obstructing the fair course of justice, with regard to a prosecution depending before it. In support of this charge has been offered the testimony of Mr. Knox, who states a conversation between General Wilkinson and himself, previous to his being served with a subpoena, the object of which was to extract from him whatever information he might possess, respecting the expedition which was the subject of inquiry in this court; and who states, also, that he was afterwards summoned before Judge Hall, who examined him upon interrogatories, and committed him to jail, whence he was taken by order of the deputy marshal, who was a military as well as civil officer, and put on board the Revenge, in which General Wilkinson sailed, for the purpose of being brought from New Orleans to Richmond.

That unfair practices towards a witness, who was to give testimony in this court, or oppression under color of its process, although those practices and that oppression were acted in another district, would be punishable in the mode now suggested, provided the person who had acted therein came within the jurisdiction of the court, is a position which the court is not disposed to controvert; but it is also believed that this mode of punishment ought not to be adopted unless the deviation from law could be clearly attached to the person against whom the motion was made; and unless the deviation was intentional, or unless the course of judicial proceeding was, or might be, so affected by it, as to make a punishment in this mode obviously conducive to a fair and correct administration of justice.

The conversation which took place between General Wilkinson and the witness, on the arrival of the latter in New Orleans, was manifestly held with the intention of drawing from him any information which he might possess, relative to the expedition which was then the subject of inquiry. In this intention, there was nothing unlawful. Government, and those who represent it, may justifiably and laudably use means to obtain voluntary communications, provided those means be not such as might tempt the person making them to give an improper coloring to his representations, which might afterwards adhere to them when repeated in court. The address stated to have been employed, the condescension and regard with which the witness was treated, are not said by himself to have been accompanied with any indications of a desire to draw from him more than the truth. The offer of money, if with a view to corrupt, could not be too severely reprehended. It is certainly a dangerous species of communication between those who are searching for testimony, and the person from whom it is expected. But in this case, the court cannot contemplate the offer as being made with immoral views. The witness had a right to demand from those he was expected to accuse a small sum of money, sufficient to subsist him on his return to his home. He was asked whether, on receiving this sum, his objections to giving testimony would be removed. This was certainly a delicate question, but it might be asked without improper motives, and it was pressed no further. This is not shown to be an attempt to contaminate the source of justice, and a consequent contempt of the court, in which it is administered.

The imprisonment of Mr. Knox, and the order for conveying him from New Orleans to Richmond, were the acts of Judge Hall. Whether his proceedings were legal or illegal, they are not shown to have been influenced by General Wilkinson, and this court cannot presume such to have been the fact. General Wilkinson, therefore, is not responsible for them. They were founded, it is true, on an affidavit made by him; but there was no impropriety in making this affidavit, and it remained with the judge to decide what the law would authorize in the case.

All the subsequent proceedings were directed by the civil authority. The agents who executed the orders of the judge were, indeed, military men, who, most probably, would not have disobeyed the commander-in-chief; but that officer is not responsible in this way for having failed to interpose his authority, in order to prevent the execution of the orders of the judge, even if those orders ought not to have been given.

Upon a full view of the subject, the case appears to have been this. General Wilkinson was desirous that the testimony of the witness should be obtained; and, aware of the accusations which had before been brought against him for the use he had made of the military power, he was desirous of obtaining the testimony by lawful means, and therefore referred the subject to a judge of the Territory, under whose orders all subsequent proceedings were taken. Whether the judge did or did not transcend the limits prescribed by law, those ministerial officers who obeyed his orders cannot be supposed to have acted with a knowledge that he had mistaken his power. Should it be admitted that this would be no defence for them in an action to obtain compensation for the injury, yet it furnishes sufficient evidence that no contempt was intended to this court by General Wilkinson; that he has not been guilty of any intentional abuse of its process, or of any oppression in the manner of executing it.

It is said that Captain Gaines, the gentleman whom the marshal appointed as his deputy for this particular purpose, had not taken the oath of office, and was, therefore, not legally qualified to act in that character. However correct this observation may be in itself, it does not appear to the court to justify an attachment against General Wilkinson. The person who sees in the possession of another, a commission as deputy marshal, and sees that others, acting under the commission, ought not to be subjected to a process of contempt for having made no inquiries respecting the oath which the law requires to be taken.

The attachment will not be awarded, because General Wilkinson cannot be considered as having controlled or influenced the conduct of the civil magistrate, and because in this transaction his intention appears to have been not to violate the laws. In such a case, where an attachment does not seem to be absolutely required by the justice due to the particular individual against whom the prosecution is depending, the court is more inclined to leave the parties to the ordinary course of law, than to employ the extraordinary powers which are given for the purpose of preserving the administration of justice in that purity which ought to be so universally desired.

Opinion on the question concerning the order in which the evidence to the jury on the trial of Aaron Burr for treason was to be introduced, pronounced on Tuesday, August 18, 1807.

Although this is precisely the same question relative to the order of evidence which was decided by this court on the motion to commit, yet it is now presented under somewhat different circumstances, and may, therefore, not be considered as determined by the former decision. At that time no indictment was found, no pleadings existed, and there was no standard by which the court could determine the relevancy of the testimony offered, until the fact to which it was to apply should be disclosed. There is now an indictment specifying the charge which is to be proved on the part of the prosecution; there is an issue made up, which presents a point to which all the testimony must apply, and, consequently, it is in the power of the court to determine, with some accuracy, on the relevancy of the testimony which may be offered.

It is contended in support of the motion which has been made, that, according to the regular order of evidence, and the usage of courts, the existence of the fact on which the charge depends, ought to be shown, before any testimony explanatory or confirmatory of that fact can be received. Against the motion, it is contended that the crime alleged in the indictment consists of two parts—the fact and the intention; and that it is in the discretion of the attorney for the United States, first to adduce the one or the other; that no instance has ever occurred of the interference of a court with that arrangement which he has thought proper to make.

As is not infrequent, the argument on both sides appears to be in many respects correct. It is the most usual, and appears to be the natural order of testimony to show, first the existence of the fact respecting which the inquiry is to be made. It is unquestionably attended with this advantage; there is a fixed and certain object to which the mind applies with precision all the testimony which may be received, and the court can decide with less difficulty on the relevancy of all the testimony which may be offered. But this arrangement is not clearly shown to be established by any fixed rule of evidence, and no case has been adduced in which it has been forced by the court on the counsel for the prosecution.

On one side, it has been contended that, by requiring the exhibition of the fact in the first instance, a great deal of time may be saved, since there may be a total failure of proof with respect to the fact; and this argument has been answered by observing, that, should there even be such failure, they could not interpose and arrest the progress of the cause; but must permit the counsel for the prosecution to proceed with that testimony which is now offered.

Levying of war is a fact which must be decided by the jury. The court may give general instructions on this as on every other question brought before them, but the jury must decide upon it as compounded of fact and law. Two assemblages of men, not unlike in appearance, possibly may be the one treasonable and the other innocent. If, therefore, the fact exhibited to the court and jury should, in the opinion of the court, not amount to the act of levying war, the court could not stop the prosecution, but must permit the counsel for the United States to proceed to show the intention of the act, in order to enable the jury to decide upon the fact coupled with the intention.

The consumption of time would probably be nearly the same, whether the counsel for the prosecution commenced with the fact or the intention, provided those discussions which respect the admissibility of evidence would be as much avoided in the one mode as in the other. The principal importance which, viewing the question in this light, would seem to attach to its decision, is the different impressions which the fact itself might make, if exhibited at the commencement or close of the prosecution.

Although human laws punish actions, the human mind spontaneously attaches guilt to intentions. The same fact, therefore, may be viewed very differently, where the mind is prepared, by a course of testimony, calculated to impress it with a conviction of the criminal designs of the accused, and where the fact is stated without such preparation. The overt act may be such as to influence the opinion, on the testimony afterwards given, respecting the intention; and the testimony respecting the intention may be such as to influence the opinion on the testimony which may be afterwards given respecting the overt act.

On the question of consuming time, the argument was placed in one point of view, by the counsel for the defence, which excited some doubt. The case was supposed of only one witness to the overt act, and a declaration that it could be proved by no other. The court was asked whether the counsel would be permitted then to proceed to examine the intentions of the accused, and to do worse than waste the time of the court and jury, by exposing, without a possible object, the private views and intentions of any person whatever.

Perhaps, in such a case, the cause might be arrested, but this does not appear to warrant the inference that it might be arrested, because the fact proved by the two witnesses did not appear to the court to amount to the act of levying war. In the case supposed, the declaration of the law is positive, and a point proper to be referred to the court occurs, which suspends the right of the jury to consider the subject, and compels them to bring in a verdict of not guilty. In such a case no testimony could be relevant, and all testimony ought to be excluded. Suppose the counsel for the prosecution should say that he had no testimony to prove the treasonable intention; that he believed confidently the object of the assemblage of men on Blannerhasset's island to be innocent; that it did not amount to the crime of levying war—surely it would be a wanton and useless waste of time to proceed with the examination of the overt act. When such a case occurs, it cannot be doubted that a nolle prosequi will be entered, or the jury be directed, with the consent of the attorney, to find a verdict of not guilty.

It has been truly stated that the crime alleged in the indictment consists of the fact, and of the intention with which that fact was committed. The testimony disclosing both the fact and the intention must be relevant. The court finds no express rule stating the order in which the attorney is to adduce relevant testimony, nor any case in which a court has interfered with the arrangement he has made. No alteration of that arrangement, therefore, will now be directed.

But it is proper to add that the intention, which is considered as relevant in this stage of the inquiry, is the intention which composes a part of the crime—the intention with which the overt act itself was committed; not a general evil disposition, or an intention to commit a distinct fact. This species of testimony, if admissible at all, is received as corroborative or confirmatory testimony. It does not itself prove the intention with which the act was performed, but it renders other testimony probable which goes to that intention. It is explanatory of or assistant to that other testimony. Now it is essentially repugnant to the usages of courts, to the declarations of the books by whose authority such testimony is received, that corroborative or confirmatory testimony should precede that which it is to corroborate or confirm. Until the introductory testimony be given, that which is merely corroborative is not relevant, and, of consequence, if objected to, cannot be admitted without violating the best settled rules of evidence.

This position may be illustrated by a direct application to the testimony of General Eaton. So far as his testimony relates to the fact charged in the indictment, so far as relates to levying war on Blannerhasset's island, so far as it relates to a design to seize on New Orleans, or to separate by force the Western from the Atlantic States, it is deemed relevant, and is now admissible. So far as it respects other plans, to be executed in the city of Washington or elsewhere, if it indicates a treasonable design, it is a design to commit a distinct act of treason, and is, therefore, not relevant to the present indictment. It can only, by showing a general evil intention, render it more probable that the intention in the particular case was evil; it is merely additional or corroborative testimony, and, therefore, if admissible at any time, is only admissible according to rules and principles which the court must respect, after hearing that which it is to confirm.

The counsel will perceive how many questions respecting the relevancy of testimony the arrangement proposed on the part of the prosecution will most probably produce. He is, however, at liberty to proceed according to his own judgment, and the court feels itself bound to exclude such testimony only as, at the time of its being offered, does not appear to be relevant.

Opinion on the motion to stop the introduction of evidence in the trial of Aaron Burr for treason; pronounced Monday, August 31.

The question now to be decided has been argued in a manner worthy of its importance, and with an earnestness evincing the strong conviction felt by the counsel on each side that the law is with them.

A degree of eloquence, seldom displayed on any occasion, has embellished a solidity of argument and a depth of research, by which the court has been greatly aided in forming the opinion it is about to deliver.

The testimony adduced on the part of the United States, to prove the overt act laid in the indictment, having shown, and the attorney for the United States having admitted, that the prisoner was not present when the act, whatever may be its character, was committed, and there being no reason to doubt but that he was at a great distance and in a different State, it is objected to the testimony offered on the part of the United States to connect him with those who committed the overt act, that such testimony is totally irrelevant, and must, therefore, be rejected.

The arguments in support of this motion respect in part the merits of the case as it may be supposed to stand independent of the pleadings, and in part as exhibited by the pleadings.

On the first division of the subject two points are made:

1st. That, conformably to the constitution of the United States, no man can be convicted of treason who was not present when the war was levied.

2d. That, if this construction be erroneous, no testimony can be received to charge one man with the overt acts of others, until those overt acts, as laid in the indictment, be proved to the satisfaction of the court.

The question which arises on the construction of the constitution, in every point of view in which it can be contemplated, is of infinite moment to the people of this country and to their Government, and requires the most temperate and the most deliberate consideration.

“Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them.”

What is the natural import of the words “levying of war? And who may be said to levy it?” Had their first application to treason been made by our constitution, they would certainly have admitted of some latitude of construction. Taken most literally, they are perhaps of the same import with the words raising or creating war; but as those who join after the commencement are equally the objects of punishment, there would, probably, be a general admission that the term also comprehended making war, or carrying on war. In the construction which courts would be required to give these words, it is not improbable that those who should raise, create, make, or carry on war, might be comprehended. The various acts which would be considered as coming within the term would be settled by a course of decisions; and it would be affirming boldly to say, that those only who actually constituted a portion of the military force appearing in arms could be considered as levying war. There is no difficulty in affirming that there must be a war, or the crime of levying it cannot exist; but there would often be considerable difficulty in affirming that a particular act did or did not involve the person committing it in the guilt, and in the fact of levying war. If, for example, an army should be actually raised, for the avowed purpose of carrying on open war against the United States, and subverting their Government, the point must be weighed, very deliberately, before a judge would venture to decide that an overt act of levying war had not been committed by a commissary of purchases, who never saw the army, but who, knowing its object and leaguely himself with the rebels, supplied that army with provisions; or by a recruiting officer, holding a commission in the rebel service, who, though never in camp, executed the particular duty assigned to him.

But the term is not for the first time applied to treason by the constitution of the United States. It is a technical term. It is used in a very old statute of that country whose language is our language, and whose laws form the substratum of our laws. It is scarcely conceivable that the term was not employed by the framers of our constitution in the sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it. So far as the meaning of any terms, particularly terms of art, is completely ascertained, those by whom they are employed must be considered as employing them in that ascertained meaning, unless the contrary be proved by the context. It is therefore reasonable to suppose, unless it be incompatible with other expressions of the constitution, that the term “levying war” is used in that instrument in the same sense in which it was understood in England and in this country to have been used in the statute of the 25th of Edward III., from which it was borrowed.

It is said that this meaning is to be collected only from adjudged cases. But this position cannot be conceded to the extent in which it is laid down. The superior authority of adjudged cases will never be controverted. But those celebrated elementary writers, who have stated the principles of the law, whose statements have received the common approbation of legal men, are not to be disregarded. Principles laid down by such writers as Coke, Hale, Foster, and Blackstone, are not lightly to be rejected. These books are in the hands of every student. Legal opinions are formed upon them, and those opinions are afterwards carried to the bar, the bench, and the Legislature. In the exposition of terms, therefore, used in instruments of the present day, the definitions and the dicta of those authors, if not contradicted by adjudications, and if compatible with the words of the statute, are entitled to respect. It is to be regretted that they do not shed as much light on this part of the subject as is to be wished.

Coke does not give a complete definition of the term, but puts cases which amount to levying war. “An actual rebellion or insurrection, he says, is a levying of war.” In whom? Coke does not say whether in those only who appear in arms, or in all those who take part in the rebellion or insurrection by real open deed.

Hale, in treating on the same subject, puts many cases which shall constitute a levying of war, without which no act can amount to treason, but he does not particularize the parts to be performed by the different persons concerned in that war, which shall be sufficient to fix on each the guilt of levying it.

Foster says, “the joining with rebels in an act of rebellion, or with enemies in acts of hostility, will make a man a traitor.” “Furnishing rebels or enemies with money, arms, ammunition, or other necessaries, will prima facie make a man a traitor.”

Foster does not say that he would be a traitor under the words of the statute, independent of the legal rule which attaches the guilt of the principal to an accessory, nor that his treason is occasioned by that rule. In England this discrimination need not be made except for the purpose of framing the indictment; and, therefore, in the English books we do not perceive any effort to make it. Thus, surrendering a castle to rebels, being in confederacy with them, is said by Hale and Foster to be treason under the clause of levying war; but whether it be levying war in fact, or aiding those who levy it, it is not said. Upon this point Blackstone is not more satisfactory. Although we may find, among the commentators upon treason, enough to satisfy the inquiry, what is a state of internal war, yet no precise information can be acquired from them which would enable us to decide, with clearness, whether persons not in arms, but taking part in a rebellion, could be said to levy war independent of that doctrine which attaches to the accessory the guilt of his principal.

If, in adjudged cases, this question has been taken up and directly decided, the court has not seen those cases. The arguments which may be drawn from the form of the indictment, though strong, is not conclusive. In the precedent found in Tremaine, Mary Speake, who was indicted for furnishing provisions to the party of the Duke of Monmouth, is indicted for furnishing provisions to those who were levying war, not for levying war herself. It may correctly be argued, that, had this act amounted to levying war, she would have been indicted for levying war, and the furnishing of provisions would have been laid as the overt act. The court felt this when the precedent was produced. But the argument, though strong, is not conclusive; because, in England, the inquiry whether she had become a traitor by levying war, or by giving aid and comfort to those who were levying war, was unimportant; and because, too, it does not appear, from the indictment, that she was actually concerned in the rebellion; that she belonged to the rebel party; or was guilty of any thing further than a criminal speculation, in selling them provisions.

It is not deemed necessary to trace the doctrine that, in treason, all are principals, to its source. Its origin is, most probably, stated correctly by Judge Tucker, in a work, the merit of which is with pleasure acknowledged. But if a spurious doctrine has been introduced into the common law, and has, for centuries, been admitted as genuine, it would require great hardihood in a judge to reject it. Accordingly, we find those of the English jurists who seem to disapprove the principle, declaring that it is now too firmly settled to be shaken.

It is unnecessary to trace this doctrine to its source for another reason. The terms of the constitution comprise no question respecting principal and accessory, so far as either may be truly and in fact said to levy war. Whether in England a person would be indicted in express terms for levying war, or for assisting others in levying war; yet if, in correct and legal language, he can be said to have levied war; and if it has never been decided that the act would not amount to levying war, his case may, without violent construction, be brought within the letter and the plain meaning of the constitution.

In examining these words, the argument which may be drawn from felonies, as, for example, from murder, is not more conclusive. Murder is the single act of killing with malice aforethought. But war is a complex operation, composed of many parts, co-operating with each other. No one man, or body of men, can perform them all if the war be of any continuance. Although, then, in correct and in law language, he alone is said to have murdered another who has perpetrated the fact of killing, or has been present aiding that fact, it does not follow that he alone can have levied war who has borne arms. All those who perform the various and essential military parts of prosecuting the war, which must be assigned to different persons, may, with correctness and accuracy, be said to levy war.

Taking this view of the subject, it appears to the court, that those who perform a part in the prosecution of the war may correctly be said to levy war and to commit treason under the constitution. It will be observed, that this opinion does not extend to the case of a person who performs no act in the prosecution of the war, who counsels and advises it, or who, being engaged in the conspiracy, fails to perform his part. Whether such persons may be implicated by the doctrine, that, whatever would make a man an accessory in felony, makes him a principal in treason; or are excluded, because that doctrine is inapplicable to the United States, the constitution having declared that treason shall consist only in levying war, and having made the proof of overt acts necessary to conviction, is a question of vast importance, which it would be proper for the Supreme Court to take a fit occasion to decide, but which an inferior tribunal would not willingly determine, unless the case before them should require it.

It may now be proper to notice the opinion of the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States against Bollman and Swartwout. It is said that this opinion, in declaring that those who do not bear arms may yet be guilty of treason, is contrary to law, and is not obligatory, because it is extrajudicial, and was delivered on a point not argued. This court is, therefore, required to depart from the principle there laid down.

It is true that, in that case, after forming the opinion that no treason could be committed, because no treasonable assemblage had taken place, the court might have dispensed with proceeding further in the doctrines of treason. But it is to be remembered, that the judges might act separately, and perhaps, at the same time, on the various prosecutions which might be instituted, and that no appeal lay from their decisions. Opposite judgments on the point would have presented a state of things infinitely to be deplored by all. It was not surprising, then, that they should have made some attempt to settle principles which would probably occur, and which were in some degree connected with the point before them.

The court had employed some reasoning to show that without the actual embodying of men war could not be levied. It might have been inferred from this, that those only who were so embodied could be guilty of treason. Not only to exclude this inference, but also to affirm the contrary, the court proceeded to observe: "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting, by force, a treasonable object, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."

This court is told that if this opinion be incorrect, it ought not to be obeyed, because it was extrajudicial. For myself, I can say that I could not lightly be prevailed on to disobey it, were I even convinced that it was erroneous; but I would certainly use any means which the law placed in my power to carry the question again before the Supreme Court for reconsideration, in a case in which it would directly occur and be fully argued.

The court which gave this opinion was composed of four judges. At the time I thought them unanimous, but I have since had reason to suspect that one of them, whose opinion is entitled to great respect, and whose indisposition prevented his entering into the discussions on some of those points which were not essential to the decision of the very case under consideration, did not concur in this particular point with his brethren. Had the opinion been unanimous, it would have been given by a majority of the judges. But should the three who were absent concur with that judge who was present, and who perhaps dissents from what was then the opinion of the court, a majority of the judges may overrule this decision. I should, therefore, feel no objection, although I then thought, and still think, the opinion perfectly correct, to carry the point, if possible, again before the Supreme Court, if the case should depend upon it.

In saying that I still think the opinion perfectly correct, I do not consider myself as going further than the preceding reasoning goes. Some gentlemen have argued as if the Supreme Court had adopted the whole doctrine of the English books on the subject of accessories to treason. But certainly such is not the fact. Those only who perform a part, and who are leagued in the conspiracy, are declared to be traitors. To complete the definition both circumstances must concur. They must "perform a part," which will furnish the overt act, and they must be "leagued in the conspiracy." The person who comes within this description, in the opinion of the court, levies war. The present motion, however, does not rest upon this point; for if under this indictment the United States might be let in to prove the part performed by the prisoner, if he did perform any part, the court could not stop the testimony in its present stage.

2d. The second point involves the character of the overt act which has been given in evidence, and calls upon the court to declare whether that act can amount to levying war. Although the court ought now to avoid any analysis of the testimony which has been offered in this case, provided the decision of the motion should not rest upon it, yet many reasons concur in giving peculiar propriety to a delivery, in the course of these trials, of a detailed opinion on the question, what is levying war? As this question has been argued at great length, it may probably save much trouble to the counsel now to give that opinion.

In opening the case it was contended by the attorney for the United States, and has since been maintained on the part of the prosecution, that neither arms nor the application of force or violence are indispensably necessary to constitute the fact of levying war. To illustrate these positions several cases have been stated, many of which would clearly amount to treason. In all of them, except that which was probably intended to be this case, and on which no observation will be made, the object of the assemblage was clearly treasonable; its character was unequivocal, and was demonstrated by evidence furnished by the assemblage itself; there was no necessity to rely upon information drawn from extrinsic sources, or, in order to understand the fact, to pursue a course of intricate reasoning and to conjecture motives. A force is supposed to be collected for an avowed treasonable object, in a condition to attempt that object, and to have commenced the attempt by moving towards it. I state these particulars because although the cases put may establish the doctrine they are intended to support, may prove that the absence of arms or the failure to apply force to sensible objects, by the actual commission of violence on those objects, may be supplied by other circumstances; yet they also serve to show that the mind requires those circumstances to be satisfied that war is levied.

Their construction of the opinion of the Supreme Court is I think thus far correct. It is certainly the opinion which was at the time entertained by myself, and which is still entertained. If a rebel army, avowing its hostility to the sovereign power, should front that of the Government, should march and countermarch before it, should manoeuvre in its face, and should then disperse from any cause whatever without firing a gun, I confess I could not, without some surprise, hear gentlemen seriously contend that this could not amount to an act of levying war. A case equally strong may be put with respect to the absence of military weapons. If the party be in a condition to execute the purposed treason without the usual implements of war, I can perceive no reason for requiring those implements in order to constitute the crime.

It is argued that no adjudged case can be produced from the English books where actual violence has not been committed. Suppose this were true. No adjudged case has, or, it is believed, can be produced from those books in which it has been laid down that war cannot be levied without the actual application of violence to external objects. The silence of the reporters on this point may be readily accounted for. In cases of actual rebellion against the Government, the most active and influential leaders are generally most actively engaged in the war, and as the object can never be to extend punishment to extermination, a sufficient number are found among those who have committed actual hostilities to satisfy the avenging arm of justice. In cases of constructive treason, such as pulling down meeting houses, where the direct and avowed object is not the destruction of the sovereign power, some act of violence might be generally required to give the crime a sufficient degree of malignity to convert it into treason, to render the guilt of any individual unequivocal.

But Vaughan's case is a case where there was no real application of violence, and where the act was adjudged to be treason. Gentlemen argue that Vaughan was only guilty of adhering to the King's enemies; but they have not the authority of the court for so saying. The judges unquestionably treat the cruising of Vaughan as an overt act of levying war.

The opinions of the best elementary writers concur in declaring, that, where a body of men are assembled for the purpose of making war against the Government, and are in a condition to make that war, the assemblage is an act of levying war. These opinions are contradicted by no adjudged case, and are supported by Vaughan's case. This court is not inclined to controvert them.

But although, in this respect, the opinion of the Supreme Court has not been misunderstood on the part of the prosecution, that opinion seems not to have been fully adverted to in a very essential point, in which it is said to have been misconceived by others.

The opinion, I am informed, has been construed to mean that any assemblage whatever, for a treasonable purpose, whether in force, or not in force, whether in a condition to use violence, or not in that condition, is a levying of war. It is this construction which has not indeed been expressly advanced at the bar, but which is said to have been adopted elsewhere, that the court deems it necessary to examine.

Independent of authority, trusting only to the dictates of reason, and expounding terms according to their ordinary signification, we should probably all concur in the declaration that war could not be levied without the employment and exhibition of force. War is an appeal from reason to the sword, and he who makes the appeal evidences the fact by the use of the means. His intention to go to war may be proved by words, but the actual going to war is a fact which is to be proved by open deed. The end is to be effected by force, and it would seem that in cases where no declaration is to be made, the state of actual war could only be created by the employment of force or being in a condition to employ it.

But the term having been adopted by our constitution, must be understood in that sense in which it was universally received in this country when the constitution was framed. The sense in which it was received is to be collected from the most approved authorities of that nation from which we have borrowed the term.

Lord Coke says, that levying war against the King was treason at the common law. "A compassing or conspiracy to levy war, he adds, is no treason; for there must be a levying of war in fact." He proceeds to state cases of constructive levying war, where the direct design is not to overturn the Government, but to effect some general object by force. The terms he employs in stating these cases are such as indicate an impression on his mind, that actual violence is a necessary ingredient in constituting the fact of levying war. He then proceeds to say, "an actual rebellion or insurrection is a levying of war within this act." "If any with strength and weapons invasive and defensive doth hold and defend a castle or fort against the King and his power, this is levying of war against the King." These cases are put to illustrate what he denominates "a war in fact." It is not easy to conceive "an actual invasion or insurrection" unconnected with force, nor can "a castle or fort be defended with strength and weapons invasive and defensive" without the employment of actual force. It would seem, then, to have been the opinion of Lord Coke, that to levy war there must be an assemblage of men in a condition, and with an intention, to employ force. He certainly puts no case of a different description.

Lord Hale says, (149. 6.) "what shall be said to be a levying of war is partly a question of fact; for it is not every unlawful or riotous assembly of many persons to do an unlawful act, though de facto they commit the act they intend, that makes a levying of war; for then every riot would be treason, &c., but it must be such an assembly as carries with it speciem belli, the appearance of war, as if they ride or march vexillis explicatis, with colors flying, or if they be formed into companies or furnished with military officers, or if they are armed with military weapons, as swords, guns, bills, halberds, pikes, and are so circumstanced that it may be reasonably concluded they are in a posture of war, which circumstances are so various that it is hard to describe them all particularly."

"Only the general expressions in all the indictments of this nature that I have seen are more guerrine arraiati, arrayed in warlike manner."

He afterwards adds, "If there be a war levied as is above declared, viz: an assembly arrayed in warlike manner, and so in the posture of war for any treasonable attempt, it is bellum livatum, but not percussum."

It is obvious that Lord Hale supposed an assemblage of men in force, in a military posture, to be necessary to constitute the fact of levying war. The idea he appears to suggest, that the apparatus of war is necessary, has been very justly combated by an able judge who has written a valuable treatise on the subject of treason; but it is not recollected that his position, that the assembly should be in a posture of war for any treasonable attempt, has ever been denied. Hawk. ch. 17, sec. 23, says, "That not only those who rebel against the King, and take up arms to dethrone him, but also, in many other cases, those who, in a violent and forcible manner, withstand his lawful authority are said to levy war against him; and therefore those that hold a fort or castle against the King's forces, or keep together armed numbers of men against the King's express command, have been adjudged to levy war against him."

The cases put by Hawkins are all cases of actual force and violence. "Those who rebel against the King, and take up arms to dethrone him." In many other cases those "who, in a violent and forcible manner, withstand his lawful authority." "Those that hold a fort or castle against his forces, or keep together armed numbers of men against his express command."

These cases are obviously cases of force and violence.

Hawkins next proceeds to describe cases in which war is understood to be levied under the statute, although it was not directly made against the Government: This Lord Hale terms an interpretatio, or constructive levying of war, and it will be perceived that he puts no case in which actual force is dispensed with.

"Those also, he says, who make an insurrection in order to redress a public grievance, whether it be a real or pretended one, and, of their own authority, attempt with force to redress it, are said to levy war against the King, although they have no direct design against his person, inasmuch as they insolently invade his prerogative, by attempting to do that by private authority which he by public justice ought to do, which manifestly tends to a downright rebellion; as where great numbers by force attempt to remove certain persons from the King," &c. The cases here put by Hawkins of a constructive levying of war do, in terms, require force as a constituent part of the description of the offence.

Judge Foster, in his valuable treatise on treason, states the opinion which he has quoted from Lord Hale, and differs from that written so far as the latter might seem to require swords, drums, colors, &c., what he terms the pomp and pageantry of war, as essential circumstances to constitute the fact of levying war. In the cases of Damaree and Purchase, he says, "the want of those circumstances weighed nothing with the court, although the prisoners' counsel insisted much on that matter." But, he adds, "the number of the insurgents supplied the want of military weapons; and they were provided with axes, crowns, and other tools of the like nature proper for the mischief they intended to effect. Furor arma ministrat."

It is apparent that Judge Foster here alludes to an assemblage in force, or, as Lord Hale terms it, "in a warlike posture;" that is, in a condition to attempt or proceed upon the treason which had been contemplated. The same author afterwards states at large the cases of Damaree and Purchase, from 8th State Trials, and they are cases where the insurgents not only assembled in force, in the posture of war, or in a condition to execute the treasonable design, but they did actually carry it into execution, and did resist the guards who were sent to disperse them:

Judge Foster states, section 4, all insurrections to effect certain innovations of a public and general concern, by an armed force, to be, in construction of law, high treason within the clause of levying war.

The cases put by Foster of constructive levying of war, all contain, as a material ingredient, the actual employment of force. After going through this branch of his subject, he proceeds to state the law in the case of an actual levying of war, that is, where the war is intended directly against the Government.

He says, section 9, "An assembly armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, for a treasonable purpose, is bellum livatum though not bellum percussum. Listing and marching are sufficient overt acts without coming to a battle or action. So cruising on the King's subjects under a French commission, France being then at war with us, was held to be adhering to the King's enemies though no other act of hostility be proved."

"An assembly armed and arrayed in a warlike manner for any treasonable purpose" is certainly in a state of force; in a condition to execute the treason for which they assembled. The words "enlisting and marching," which are overt acts of levying war, do, in the arrangement of the sentence, also imply a state of force, though that state is not expressed in terms; for the succeeding words, which state a particular event as not having happened, prove that event to have been the next circumstance to those which had happened; they are "without coming to a battle or action." "If men be enlisted and march," that is, if they march prepared for battle or in a condition for action, (for marching is a technical term applied to the movement of a military corps,) it is an overt act of levying war, though they do not come to a battle or action. This exposition is rendered the stronger by what seems to be put in the same sentence as a parallel case with respect to adhering to an enemy. It is cruising under a commission from an enemy without committing any other act of hostility. Cruising is the act of sailing in warlike form and in a condition to assail those of whom the cruiser is in quest.

This exposition, which seems to be that intended by Judge Foster, is rendered the more certain by a reference to the case in the State Trials from which the extracts are taken. The words used by the Chief Justice are, "when men form themselves into a body, and march, rank and file, with weapons offensive and defensive, this is levying of war with open force, if the design be public." Mr Phipps, the counsel for the prisoner, afterwards observed, "intending to levy war is not treason unless a war be actually levied." To this the Chief Justice answered, "Is it not actually levying of war, if they actually provide arms and levy men, and, in a warlike manner, set out and cruise, and come with a design to destroy our ships?" Mr Phipps still insisted "it would not be an actual levying of war unless they committed some act of hostility." "Yes, indeed," said the Chief Justice, "the going on board and being in a posture to attack the King's ships." Mr Baron Powis added, "but for you to say that, because they did not actually fight, it is not a levying of war, is it not plain what they did intend? That they came with that intention, that they came in that posture, that they came armed, and had guns and blunderbusses, and surrounded the ship twice; they came with an armed force, that is a strong evidence of the design."

The point insisted on by counsel in the case of Vaughan, as in this case, was, that war could not be levied without actually fighting. In this case the counsel was very properly overruled; but it is apparent that the judges proceeded entirely on the idea that a warlike posture was indispensable to the fact of levying war.

Judge Foster proceeds to give other instances of levying war. "Attacking the King's forces in opposition to his authority, upon a march or in quarters, is levying war." "Holding a castle or fort against the King or his forces, if actual force be used in order to keep possession, is levying war. But a bare detainer, as suppose by shutting the gates against the King or his forces, without any other force from within, Lord Hale conceiveth, will not amount to treason."

The whole doctrine of Judge Foster, on this subject, seems to demonstrate a clear opinion that a state of force and violence, a posture of war, must exist to constitute, technically as well as really, the fact of levying war.

Judge Blackstone seems to concur with his predecessors. Speaking of levying war, he says, "This may be done by taking arms not only to dethrone the King, but under pretence to reform religion or the laws, or to remove evil counsellors, or other grievances, whether real or pretended; for the law does not, neither can it, permit any private man, or set of men, to interfere forcibly in matters of such high importance."

He proceeds to give examples of levying war, which show that he contemplated actual force as a necessary ingredient in the composition of this crime.

It would seem, then, from the English authorities, that the words "levying war" have not received a technical different from their natural meaning, so far as respects the character of the assemblage of men which may constitute the fact. It must be a warlike assemblage, carrying the appearance of force, and in a situation to practise hostility.

Several judges of the United States have given opinions at their circuits on this subject, all of which deserve and will receive the particular attention of this court.

In his charge to the grand jury, when John Fries was indicted, in consequence of a forcible opposition to the direct tax, Judge Iredell is understood to have said, "I think I am warranted in saying, that, if in the case of the insurgents who may come under your consideration, the intention was to prevent, by force of arms, the execution of any act of the Congress of the United States altogether, any forcible opposition, calculated to carry that intention into effect, was a levying war against the United States, and, of course, an act of treason." To levy war, then, according to this opinion of Judge Iredell, required the actual exertion of force.

Judge Patterson, in his opinions delivered in two different cases, seems not to differ from Judge Iredell. He does not, indeed, precisely state the employment of force as necessary to constitute a levying of war, but in giving his opinion in cases in which force was actually employed, he considers the crime in one case as dependent on the intention; and in the other case he says, "combining these facts and this design," (that is, combining actual force with a treasonable design,) "the crime is high treason."

Judge Peters has also indicated the opinion that force was necessary to constitute the crime of levying war.

Judge Chase has been particularly clear and explicit. In an opinion, which he appears to have prepared on great consideration, he says, "the court are of opinion, that if a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection to resist or oppose the execution of a statute of the United States by force, that they are only guilty of a high misdemeanor; but if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, that they are guilty of the treason of levying war; and the quantum of the force employed neither increases nor diminishes the crime, whether by one hundred or one thousand persons is wholly immaterial.

"The court are of opinion, that a combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason, unless, combined with an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into execution, some actual force or violence must be used in pursuance of such design to levy war; but that it is altogether immaterial whether the force used be sufficient to effectuate the object. Any force connected with the intention will constitute the crime of levying war."

In various parts of the opinion delivered by Judge Chase in the case of Fries, the same sentiments are to be found. It is to be observed that these judges are not content that troops should be assembled in a condition to employ force. According to them some degree of force must have been actually employed.

The judges of the United States, then, so far as their opinions have been quoted, seem to have required still more to constitute the fact of levying war than has been required by the English books. Our judges seem to have required the actual exercise of force, the actual employment of some degree of violence. This, however, may be, and probably is, because in the cases in which their opinions were given, the design not having been to overturn the Government, but to resist the execution of a law, such an assemblage would be sufficient for the purpose as to require the actual employment of force to render the object unequivocal.

But it is said all these authorities have been overruled by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against Swartwout and Bollman.

If the Supreme Court have, indeed, extended the doctrine of treason further than it has heretofore been carried by the judges of England or of this country, their decision would be submitted to. At least this court could go no further than to endeavor again to bring the point directly before them. It would, however, be expected that an opinion which is to overrule all former precedents, and to establish a principle never before recognized, should be expressed in plain and explicit terms. A mere implication ought not to prostrate a principle which seems to have been so well established. Had the intention been entertained to make so material a change in this respect, the court ought to have expressly declared, that any assemblage of men whatever, who had formed a treasonable design, whether in force or not, whether in a condition to attempt the design or not, whether attended with warlike appearances or not, constitutes the fact of levying war. Yet no declaration to this amount is made. Not an expression of the kind is to be found in the opinion of the Supreme Court. The foundation on which this argument rests is the omission of the court to state that the assemblage, which constitutes the fact of levying war, ought to be in force, and some passages which show that the question respecting the nature of the assemblage was not in the mind of the court when the opinion was drawn, which passages are mingled with others, which at least show that there was no intention to depart from the course of the precedents in cases of treason by levying war.

Every opinion, to be correctly understood, ought to be considered with a view to the case in which it was delivered. In the case of the United States against Bollman and Swartwout, there was no evidence that even two men had ever met for the purpose of executing the plan in which those persons were charged with having participated. It was, therefore, sufficient for the court to say, that, unless men were assembled, war could not be levied. That case was decided by this declaration. The court might, indeed, have defined the species of assemblage which would amount to levying of war, but, as this opinion was not a treatise on treason, but a decision of a particular case, expressions of doubtful import should be construed in reference to the case itself; and the mere omission to state that a particular circumstance was necessary to the consummation of the crime, ought not to be construed into a declaration that the circumstance was unimportant. General expressions ought not to be considered as overruling settled principles, without a direct declaration to that effect. After these preliminary observations the court will proceed to examine the opinion which has occasioned them.

The first expression in it, bearing on the present question is, "to constitute that specific crime for which the prisoner, now before the court, has been committed, war must be actually levied against the United States. However flagitious may be the crime of conspiracy to subvert, by force, the Government of our country, such conspiracy is not treason. To conspire to levy war, and actually to levy war, are distinct offences. The first must be brought into operation by the assemblage of men for a purpose treasonable in itself, or the fact of levying war cannot have been committed."

Although it is not expressly stated that the assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying into operation the treasonable intent, which will amount to levying war, must be an assemblage in force, yet it is fairly to be inferred from the context; and nothing like dispensing with force appears in this paragraph. The expressions are, "to constitute the crime, war must be actually levied." "A conspiracy to levy war is spoken of as "a conspiracy to subvert, by force, the Government of our country." Speaking in general terms of an assemblage of men for this or for any other purpose, a person would naturally be understood as speaking of an assemblage in some degree adapted to the purpose. An assemblage to subvert, by force, the Government of our country, and amounting to a levying of war, should be an assemblage in force.

In a subsequent paragraph the court says, "it is not the intention of the court to say, that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled in order to effect, by force, a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, &c. and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are traitors. But there must be an actual assembling of men for the treasonable purpose to constitute a levying of war."

The observations made on the preceding paragraph, apply to this. "A body of men actually assembled, in order to effect, by force, a treasonable purpose," must be a body assembled with such appearance of force as would warrant the opinion that they were assembled for the particular purpose; an assemblage to constitute an actual levying of war should be an assemblage with such appearance of force as would justify the opinion that they met for that purpose.

This explanation, which is believed to be natural, certainly not a strained explanation of the words, derives some additional aid from the terms in which the paragraph last quoted commences. "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of treason who has not appeared in arms against his country." These words seem to obviate an inference which might otherwise have been drawn from the preceding paragraph. They indicate that, in the mind of the court, the assemblage stated in that paragraph was an assemblage in arms; that the individuals who composed it had appeared in arms against their country; that is, in other words, that the assemblage was a military, a warlike assemblage.

The succeeding paragraph in the opinion, relates to a conspiracy, and serves to show that force and violence were in the mind of the court, and that there was no idea of extending the crime of treason, by construction, beyond the constitutional definition which had been given of it.

Returning to the case actually before the court, it is said "a design to overturn the Government of the United States in New Orleans, by force, would have been unquestionably a design which, if carried into execution, would have been treason, and the assemblage of a body of men for the purpose of carrying it into execution, would amount to levying of war against the United States."

Now what could reasonably be said to be an assemblage of a body of men for the purpose of overturning the Government of the United States in New Orleans by force? Certainly an assemblage in force, an assemblage prepared and intending to act with force, a military assemblage. The decisions, heretofore made by the judges of the United States, are then declared to be in conformity with the principles laid down by the Supreme Court. Is this declaration compatible with the idea of departing from those opinions on a point within the contemplation of the court? The opinions of Judge Patterson and Judge Iredell are said "to imply an actual assembling of men, though they rather designed to remark on the purpose to which the force was to be applied than on the nature of the force itself." This observation certainly indicates that the necessity of an assemblage of men was the particular point the court meant to establish, and that the idea of force was never separated from this assemblage.

The opinion of Judge Chase is next quoted with approbation. This opinion, in terms, requires the employment of force.

After stating the verbal communications said to have been made by Mr. Swartwout to General Wilkinson, the court says "if these words import that the Government of New Orleans was to be revolutionized by force, although merely as a step to, or a mean of, exciting some greater projects, the design was unquestionably treasonable, and any assemblage of men for that purpose would amount to a levying of war."

The words "any assemblage of men," if construed to affirm that any two or three of the conspirators who might be found together after this plan had been formed, would be the act of levying war, would certainly be misconstrued. The sense of the expressions "any assemblage of men" is restricted by the words "for this purpose." Now could it be in the contemplation of the court that a body of men would assemble for the purpose of revolutionizing New Orleans by force, who should not themselves be in force?

After noticing some difference of opinion among the judges respecting the import of the words said to have been used by Mr. Swartwout, the court proceeds to observe: "But whether this treasonable intention be really imputable to the plan or not, it is admitted that it must have been carried into execution by an open assemblage for that purpose, previous to the arrest of the prisoner, in order to consummate the crime as to him?"

Could the court have conceived "an open assemblage" "for the purpose of overturning the Government of New Orleans by force" "to be only equivalent to a secret furtive assemblage without the appearance of force?"

After quoting the words of Mr. Swartwout, from the affidavit, in which it was stated that Mr. Burr was levying an army of seven thousand men, and observing that the treason to be inferred from these words would depend on the intention with which it was levied, and on the progress which had been made in levying it, the court say, "the question then is, whether this evidence proves Colonel Burr to have advanced so far in levying an army as actually to have assembled them."

Actually to assemble an army of seven thousand men is unquestionably to place those who are so assembled in a state of open force.

But as the mode of expression used in this passage might be misconstrued so far as to countenance the opinion that it would be necessary to assemble the whole army in order to constitute the fact of levying war, the court proceeds to say, "It is argued that since it cannot be necessary that the whole seven thousand men should be assembled, their commencing their march by detachments to the place of rendezvous must be sufficient to constitute the crime."

"This position is correct, with some qualification. It cannot be necessary that the whole army should assemble, and that the various parts which are to compose it should have combined. But it is necessary there should be an actual assemblage; and therefore this evidence should make the fact unequivocal.

"The travelling of individuals to the place of rendezvous, would, perhaps, not be sufficient. This would be an equivocal act, and has no warlike appearance. The meeting of particular bodies of men, and their marching from places of partial to a place of general rendezvous, would be such an assemblage."

The position here stated by the counsel for the prosecution is, that the army "commencing its march by detachments to the place of rendezvous, (that is, of the army,) must be sufficient to constitute the crime."

This position is not admitted by the court to be universally correct. It is said to be "correct with some qualification." What is that qualification?

"The travelling of individuals to the place of rendezvous," and by this term is not to be understood one individual by himself, but several individuals either separately or together but not in military form, "would, perhaps, not be sufficient." Why not sufficient? Because, says the court, "this would be an equivocal act, and has no warlike appearance." The act, then, should be unequivocal, and should have a warlike appearance. It must exhibit, in the words of Sir Matthew Hale, speciem belli, the appearance of war. This construction is rendered in some measure necessary when we observe that the court is qualifying the position. "That the army, commencing their march by detachments to the place of rendezvous, must be sufficient to constitute the crime." In qualifying this position they say, "the travelling of individuals would, perhaps, not be sufficient." Now, a solitary individual travelling to any point, with any intent, could not, without a total disregard of language, be termed a marching detachment. The court, therefore, must have contemplated several individuals travelling together; and the words being used in reference to the position they were intended to qualify, would seem to indicate the distinction between the appearances attending the usual movement of a company of men for civil purposes, and that military movement which might, in correct language, be denominated "marching by detachments."

The court then proceeded to say, "the meeting of particular bodies of men, and the marching from places of partial to a place of general rendezvous, would be such an assemblage."

It is obvious from the context that the court must have intended to state a case which would in itself be unequivocal, because it would have a warlike appearance. The case stated, is that of distinct bodies of men assembling at different places and marching from these places of partial to a place of general rendezvous. When this has been done, an assemblage is produced which would in itself be unequivocal. But when is it done? what is the assemblage here described? The assemblage formed of the different bodies of partial at a place of general rendezvous. In describing the mode of coming to this assemblage the civil term "travelling" is dropped, and the military term "marching" is employed. If this was intended as a definition of an assemblage which would amount to levying war, the definition requires an assemblage at a place of general rendezvous, composed of bodies of men who had previously assembled at places of partial rendezvous. But this is not intended as a definition; for, clearly, if there should be no places of partial rendezvous, if troops should embody in the first instance, in great force for the purpose of subverting the Government by violence, the act would be unequivocal; it would have a warlike appearance, and it would, according to the opinion of the Supreme Court, properly construed, and according to the English authorities, amount to levying war. But this, though not a definition, is put as an example; and surely it may be safely taken as an example. If different bodies of men, in pursuance of a treasonable design plainly proved, should assemble in warlike appearances at places of partial rendezvous, and should march from those places to a place of general rendezvous, it is difficult to conceive how such a transaction could take place without exhibiting the appearance of war, without an obvious display of force. At any rate, a court in stating generally such a military assemblage as would amount to levying war, and having a case before them in which there was no assemblage whatever, cannot reasonably be understood in putting such an example, to dispense with those appearances of war which seem to be required by the general current of authorities. Certainly they ought not to be so understood when they say in express terms, that "it is more safe as well as more consonant to the principles of our constitution, that the crime of treason should not be extended by construction to doubtful cases; and that crimes not already within the constitutional definition, should receive such punishment as the Legislature, in its wisdom, may provide."

After this analysis of the opinion of the Supreme Court, it will be observed, that the direct question whether an assemblage of men which might be construed to amount to a levying of war, must appear in force or in military form, was not in argument or in fact before the court, and does not appear to have been in terms decided. The opinion seems to have been drawn without particularly adverting to this question; and, therefore, upon a transient view of particular expressions, might inspire the idea that a display of force, that appearances of war were not necessary ingredients to constitute the fact of levying war. But upon a more intent and more accurate investigation of this opinion, although the terms force and violence are not employed as descriptive of the assemblage, such requisites are declared to be indispensable as can scarcely exist without the appearance of war and the existence of real force. It is said that war must be levied in fact; that the object must be one which is to be effected by force; that the assemblage must be such as to prove that this is its object; that it must not be an equivocal act, without a warlike appearance; that it must be an open assemblage for the purpose of force. In the course of this opinion, decisions are quoted and approved, which require the employment of force to constitute the crime. It seems extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile these various declarations with the idea that the Supreme Court considered a secret, unarmed meeting, although that meeting be of conspirators, and although it met with a treasonable intent, as an actual levying of war. Without saying that the assemblage must be in force or in warlike form, they express themselves so as to show that this idea was never discarded, and they use terms which cannot be otherwise satisfied.

The opinion of a single judge certainly weighs as nothing if opposed to that of the Supreme Court; but if he was one of the judges who assisted in framing that opinion, if while the impressions under which it was framed were yet fresh upon his mind, he delivered an opinion on the same testimony, not contradictory to that which had been given by all the judges together, but showing the sense in which he understood terms that might be differently expounded, it may fairly be said to be in some measure explanatory of the opinion itself.

To the judge before whom the charge against the prisoner at the bar was first brought, the same testimony was offered with that which had been exhibited before the Supreme Court, and he was required to give an opinion in almost the same case. Upon this occasion he said, "war can only be levied by the employment of actual force. Troops must be embodied; men must be assembled in order to levy war." Again he observed, "the fact to be proved in this case is an act of public notoriety. It must exist in the view of the world, or it cannot exist at all. The assembling of forces to levy war is a visible transaction, and numbers must witness it."

It is not easy to doubt what kind of assemblage was in the mind of the judge who used these expressions, and it is to be recollected that he had just returned from the Supreme Court, and was speaking on the very facts on which the opinion of that court was delivered.

The same judge, in his charge to the grand jury who found this bill, observed, "to constitute the fact of levying war, it is not necessary that hostilities shall have actually commenced by engaging the military force of the United States, or that measures of violence against the Government shall have been carried into execution. But levying war is a fact in the constitution of which force is an indispensable ingredient. Any combination to subvert by force the Government of the United States, violently to dismember the Union, to compel a change in the administration, to coerce the repeal or adoption of a general law, is a conspiracy to levy war, and if the conspiracy be carried into effect by the actual employment of force, by the embodying and assembling men for the purpose of executing the treasonable design which was previously conceived, it amounts to levying of war. It has been held that arms are not essential to levying war, provided the force assembled be sufficient to attain or perhaps to justify attempting the object without them." This paragraph is immediately followed by a reference to the opinion of the Supreme Court.

It requires no commentary upon these words to show that, in the opinion of the judge who uttered them, an assemblage of men which should constitute the fact of levying war must be an assemblage in force, and that he so understood the opinion of the Supreme Court. If, in that opinion, there may be found in some passages a want of precision, an indefiniteness of expression, which has occasioned it to be differently understood by different persons, that may well be accounted for when it is recollected that in the particular case there was no assemblage whatever. In expounding that opinion the whole should be taken together, and in reference to the particular case in which it was delivered. It is, however, not improbable that the misunderstanding has arisen from this circumstance. The court unquestionably did not consider arms as an indispensable requisite to levying war; an assemblage adapted to the object might be in a condition to effect or to attempt it without them. Nor did the court consider the actual application of the force to the object at all times an indispensable requisite; for an assemblage might be in a condition to apply force, might be in a state adapted to real war, without having made the actual application of that force. From these positions, which are to be found in the opinion, it may have been inferred, it is thought too hastily, that the nature of the assemblage was unimportant, and that war might be considered as actually levied by any meeting of men, if a criminal intention can be imputed to them by testimony of any kind whatever.

It has been thought proper to discuss this question at large, and to review the opinion of the Supreme Court, although this court would be more disposed to leave the question of fact, whether an overt act of levying war was committed on Blannerhasset's island to the jury under this explanation of the law, and to instruct them that, unless the assemblage of Blannerhasset's island was an assemblage in force, was a military assemblage in a condition to make war, it was not a levying of war, and that they could not construe it into an act of war, than to arrest the further testimony which might be offered to connect the prisoner with that assemblage, or to prove the intention of those who assembled together at that place. This point, however, is not to be understood as decided. It will, perhaps, constitute an essential inquiry in another case.

Before leaving the opinion of the Supreme Court entirely on the question of the nature of the assemblage which will constitute an act of levying war, this court cannot forbear to ask why is an assemblage absolutely required? Is it not to judge in some measure of the end by the proportion which the means bear to the end? Why is it that a single armed individual, entering a boat and sailing down the Ohio for the avowed purpose of attacking New Orleans, could not be said to levy war? Is it not that he is apparently not in a condition to levy war? If this be so, ought not the assemblage to furnish some evidence of its intention and capacity to levy war before it can amount to levying war? And ought not the Supreme Court, when speaking of an assemblage for the purpose of effecting a treasonable object by force, be understood to indicate an assemblage exhibiting the appearance of force?

The definition of the attorney for the United States deserves notice in this respect. It is, "when there is an assemblage of men convened for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable object, which force is meant to be employed before the assemblage disperses, this is treason."

To read this definition without adverting to the argument, we should infer that the assemblage was itself to effect by force the treasonable object, not to join itself to some other bodies of men, and then to effect the object by their combined force. Under this construction, it would be expected the appearance of the assemblage would bear some proportion to the object, and would indicate the intention. At any rate, that it would be an assemblage in force. This construction is most certainly not that which was intended, but it serves to show that general phrases must always be understood in reference to the subject matter, and to the general principles of law.

On that division of the subject which respects the merits of the case connected with the pleadings, two points are also made:

1st. That this indictment having charged the prisoner with levying war on Blannerhasset's island, and containing no other overt act, cannot be supported by proof that war was levied at that place by other persons in the absence of the prisoner, even admitting those persons to be connected with him in one common treasonable conspiracy.

2dly. That admitting such an indictment could be supported by such evidence, the previous conviction of some person who committed the act which is said to amount to levying war, is indispensable to the conviction of a person who advised or procured that act.

As to the first point, the indictment contains two counts, one of which charges that the prisoner, with a number of persons unknown, levied war on Blannerhasset's island, in the county of Wood, in the district of Virginia, and the other adds the circumstance of their proceeding from that island down the river for the purpose of seizing New Orleans by force.

In point of fact, the prisoner was not on Blannerhasset's island, nor in the county of Wood, nor in the district of Virginia.

In considering this point, the court is led first to inquire whether an indictment for levying war must specify an overt act, or would be sufficient if it merely charged the prisoner in general terms with having levied war, omitting the expression of place or circumstance.

The place in which a crime was committed is essential to an indictment, were it only to show the jurisdiction of the court. It is also essential for the purpose of enabling the prisoner to make his defence. That at common law an indictment would have been defective which did not mention the place in which the crime was committed, can scarcely be doubted. For this it is sufficient to refer to Hawkins, b. 2, ch. 25, sect. 84, and ch. 23, sect. 91. This necessity is rendered the stronger by the constitutional provision, that the offender "shall be tried in the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed," and by the act of Congress, which requires that twelve petty jurors at least shall be summoned from the county where the offence was committed.

A description of the particular manner in which the war was levied seems also essential to enable the accused to make his defence. The law does not expect a man to be prepared to defend every act of his life which may be suddenly and without notice alleged against him. In common justice, the particular fact with which he is charged ought to be stated, and stated in such a manner as to afford a reasonable certainty of the nature of the accusation, and the circumstances which will be adduced against him. The general doctrine on the subject of indictments is full to this point. Foster, (p. 149,) speaking of the treason of compassing the King's death, says "from what has been said, it followeth that in every indictment for this species of treason, and indeed for levying war and adhering to the King's enemies, an overt act must be alleged and proved. For the overt act is the charge to which the prisoner must apply his defence."

In page 220 Foster repeats this declaration. It is also laid down in Hawk. b. 8, ch. 17, sect. 29; 1st Hale, 121; 1st East, 116; and by the other authorities cited, especially Vaughan's case. In corroboration of this opinion, it may be observed, that treason can only be established by the proof of overt acts, and that by the common law, as well as by the statute of 7th of William III., those overt acts only which are charged in the indictment can be given in evidence, unless, perhaps, as corroborative testimony after the overt acts are proved. That clause in the constitution, too, which says that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right "to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation," is considered as having a direct bearing on this point. It secures to him such information as will enable him to prepare for his defence.

It seems, then, to be perfectly clear that it would not be sufficient for an indictment to allege generally that the accused had levied war against the United States. The charge must be more particularly specified, by laying what is termed an overt act of levying war. The law relative to an appeal, as cited from Stamford, is strongly corroborative of this opinion.

If it be necessary to specify the charge in the indictment, it would seem to follow, irresistibly, that the charge must be proved as laid.

All the authorities which require an overt act require also that this overt act should be proved. The decision in Vaughan's case is particularly in point. Might it be otherwise, the charge of an overt act would be a mischief instead of an advantage to the accused. It would lead him from the true cause and nature of the accusation, instead of informing him respecting it.

But it is contended, on the part of the prosecution, that, although the accused had been never with the party which assembled at Blannerhasset's island, and was at the time at a great distance and in a different State, he was yet legally present, and therefore may properly be charged in the indictment as being present in fact.

It is, therefore, necessary to inquire whether, in this case, the doctrine of constructive presence can apply.

It is conceived by the court to be possible, that a person may be concerned in a treasonable conspiracy, and yet be legally, as well as actually, absent while some one act of treason is perpetrated. If a rebellion should be so extensive as to spread through every State in the Union, it will scarcely be contended that every individual concerned in it is legally present at every overt act committed in the course of that rebellion. It would be a very violent presumption (indeed, too violent to be made without clear authority,) to presume that, even the chief of the rebel army was legally present at every such overt act. If the main rebel army, with the chief at its head, should be prosecuting war at one extremity of our territory, say in New Hampshire, if this chief should be there captured and sent to the other extremity for the purpose of trial; if his indictment, instead of alleging an overt act which was true, in point of fact, should allege that he had assembled some small party, which, in truth, he had not seen; and had levied war, by engaging in a skirmish in Georgia, at a time when, in reality, he was fighting a battle in New Hampshire—if such evidence would support such an indictment by the fiction that he was legally present, though really absent, all would ask to what purpose are those provisions in the constitution which direct the place of trial, and ordain that the accused shall be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation?

But, that a man may be legally absent, who has counselled or procured a treasonable act, is proved by all those books which treat upon the subject, and which concur in declaring that such a person is a principal traitor, not because he was legally present, but because, in treason, all are principals. Yet the indictment, I say, upon general principles, would charge him according to the truth of the case. Lord Coke says, "if many conspire to levy war, and some of them do levy the same, according to the conspiracy, this is high treason in all." Why? Because all were legally present when the war was levied? No. "For in treason," continues Lord Coke, "all be principals, and war is levied." In this case the indictment, reasoning from analogy, would not charge that the absent conspirators were present, but would state the truth of the case. If the conspirator had done nothing which amounted to levying of war, and if, by our constitution, the doctrine that an accessory becomes a principal be not adopted, in consequence of which the conspirator could not be condemned under an indictment, stating the truth of the case, it would be going very far to say that this defect, if it be termed one, may be cured by an indictment stating the case untruly.

This doctrine of Lord Coke has been adopted by all subsequent writers; and it is generally laid down, in the English books, that whatever will make a man an accessory in felony will make him a principal in treason; but it is no where suggested that he is, by construction, to be considered as present, when in point of fact he was absent.

Foster, 3d, has been particularly quoted, and certainly he is precisely in point. "It is well known," says Foster, "that in the language of the case there are no accessories in high treason; all are principals. Every instance of incitement, aid, or protection, which, in the case of felony, will render a man an accessory before or after the fact, in the case of high treason, whether it be treason at common law or by statute, will make him a principal in treason." The cases of incitement and aid are cases put as examples of a man's becoming a principal in treason, not because he was legally present, but by force of that maxim in the common law, that whatever will render a man an accessory at common law, will render him a principal in treason. In other passages, the words "command" or "procure" are used to indicate the same state of things, that is, a treasonable assemblage produced by a man who is not himself in that assemblage.

In point of law, then, the man who incites, aids, or procures a treasonable act, is not merely, in consequence of that incitement, aid, or procurement, legally present when that act is committed.

If it does not result from the nature of the crime, that all who are concerned in it are legally present at every overt act, then each case depends upon its own circumstances; and, to judge how far the circumstances of any case can make him legally present who is in fact absent, the doctrine of constructive presence must be examined.

Hale, in his 1 vol. p. 615, says, "regularly, no man can be a principal in felony unless he be present." In the same page he says, "an accessory before is he that, being absent at the time of the felony committed, doth yet procure, counsel, or command another to commit a felony." The books are full of passages which state this to be the law. Foster, in showing what acts of concurrence will make a man a principal, says, "he must be present at the perpetration, otherwise he can be no more than an accessory before the fact."

These strong distinctions would be idle to treason; at any rate, they would be inapplicable, if they were to be entirely lost in the doctrine of constructive presence.

Foster adds, p. 349, "when the law requireth the presence of the accomplice at the perpetration of the fact in order to render him a principal, it doth not require a strict actual immediate presence, such a presence as would make him an eye or ear witness of what passeth." The terms used by Foster are such as would be employed by a man intending to show the necessity that the absent person should be near at hand, although, from the nature of the thing, no precise distance could be marked out. An inspection of the cases, from which Foster drew this general principle, will serve to illustrate it. (Hale, 439.) In all these cases, put by Hale, the whole party set out together to commit the very fact charged in the indictment, or to commit some other unlawful act, in which they are all to be personally concerned at the same time and place, and are, at the very time when the criminal fact is committed, near enough to give actual personal aid and assistance to the man who perpetrated it. Hale, in p. 449, giving the reason for the decision in the case of the word deceit, says, "they all came with an intent to steal the deer, and consequently the law supposes that they came all with the intent to oppose all that should hinder them in that design." The original case says this was their resolution. This opposition would be a personal opposition. This case, even as stated by Hale, would clearly not comprehend any man who entered into the combination, but who, instead of going to the park where the murder was committed, should not set out with the others, should go to a different park, or should even lose his way.—Hale, 534.

In both the cases here stated, the persons actually set out together, and were near enough to assist in the commission of the fact. That in the case of Pudsy, the felony was, as stated by Hale, a different felony from that originally intended, is unimportant in regard to the particular principle now under consideration, so far as respected distance; as respected capacity to assist in case of resistance, it is the same as if the robbery had been that which was originally designed. The case, in the original report, shows that the felony committed was in fact in pursuance of that originally designed. Foster (350) plainly supposes the same particular design, not a general design composed of many particular distinct facts. He supposes them to be co-operating with respect to that particular design. This may be illustrated by a case which is perhaps common. Suppose a band of robbers confederated for the general purpose of robbing. They set out together, or in parties, to rob a particular individual, and each performs the part assigned to him. Some ride up to the individual and demand his purse; others watch out of sight to intercept those who might be coming to assist the man on whom the robbery is to be committed. If murder or robbery actually take place, all are principals, and all, in construction of law, are present. But suppose they set out at the same time or at different times, by different roads, to attack and rob different individuals or different companies, to commit distinct acts of robbery. It has never been contended that those who committed one act of robbery, or who failed altogether, were constructively present at the act of those who were associated with them in the common object of robbery, who were to share the plunder, but who did not assist at the particular fact. They do, indeed, belong to the general party, but they are not of the particular party which committed this fact. Foster concludes this subject by observing that, "in order to render a person an accomplice and a principal in felony, he must be aiding and abetting at the fact, or ready to afford assistance if necessary." That is, at the particular fact which is charged, he must be ready to render assistance to those who are committing that particular fact; he must, as is stated by Hawkins, be ready to give immediate and direct assistance.

All the cases to be found in the books go to the same point. Let them be applied to that under consideration.

The whole treason laid in this indictment is the levying of war in Blannerhasset's island; and the whole question, to which the inquiry of the court is now directed, is, whether the prisoner was legally present at that fact.

I say this is the whole question, because the prisoner can only be convicted on the overt act laid in the indictment. With respect to this prosecution, it is as if no other overt act existed. If other overt acts can be inquired into, it is for the sole purpose of proving the particular fact charged; it is as evidence of the crime consisting of this particular fact, not as establishing the general crime by a distinct fact.

The counsel for the prosecution have charged those engaged in the defence with considering the overt act as the treason, whereas it ought to be considered solely as the evidence of the treason; but the counsel for the prosecution seem themselves not to have sufficiently adverted to this clear principle, that though the overt act may not be itself the treason, it is the sole act of that treason which can produce conviction; it is the sole point in issue between the parties. And the only division of that point, if the expression be allowed, which the court is now examining, is the constructive presence of the prisoner at the fact charged.

To return, then, to the application of the cases.

Had the prisoner set out with the party from Beaver for Blannerhasset's island, or perhaps had he set out for that place, though not from Beaver, and had arrived in the island, he would have been present at the fact; had he not arrived in the island, but had taken a position near enough to co-operate with those on the island, to assist them in any act of hostility, or to aid them if attacked, the question whether he was constructively present would be a question compounded of law and fact, which would be decided by the jury, with the aid of the court, so far as respected the law. In this case the accused would have been of the particular party assembled on the island, and would have been associated with them in the particular act of levying war said to have been committed on the island.

But if he was not with the party at any time before they reached the island; if he did not join them there, or intend to join them there; if his personal co-operation in the general plan was to be afforded elsewhere, at a great distance, in a different State; if the overt acts of treason to be performed by him were to be distinct overt acts; then he was not of the particular party assembled at Blannerhasset's island, and was not constructively present, aiding and assisting in the particular act which was there committed.

The testimony on this point, so far as it has been delivered, is not equivocal. There is not only no evidence that the accused was of the particular party which assembled on Blannerhasset's island, but the whole evidence shows he was not of that party.

In felony, then, admitting the crime to have been completed on the island, and to have been advised, procured, or commanded by the accused, he would have been incontestably an accessory, and not a principal.

But in treason, it is said, the law is otherwise, because the theatre of action is more extensive.

The reasoning applies in England as strongly as in the United States. While in '15 and '45 the family of Stuart sought to regain the crown they had forfeited, the struggle was for the whole kingdom; yet no man was ever considered as legally present at one place when actually at another, or as aiding in one transaction while actually employed in another.

With a perfect knowledge that the whole nation may be a theatre of action, the English books unite in declaring, that he who counsels, procures, or aids treason, is guilty accessarily and solely in virtue of the common law principle, that what will make a man an accessory in felony makes him a principal in treason. So far from considering a man as constructively present at every overt act of the general treason in which he may have been concerned, the whole doctrine of the books limits the proof against him to those particular overt acts of levying war with which he is charged.

What would be the effect of a different doctrine? Clearly that which has been stated. If a person levying war in Kentucky may be said to be constructively present and assembled with a party carrying on war in Virginia, at a great distance from him, then he is present at every overt act performed any where; he may be tried in any State on the continent, where any overt act has been committed; he may be proved to be guilty of an overt act laid in the indictment in which he had no personal participation, by proving that he advised it, or that he committed other acts.

This is, perhaps, too extravagant to be in terms maintained. Certainly, it cannot be supported by the doctrines of the English law.

The opinion of Judge Patterson in Mitchell's case has been cited on this point. (2 Dal. 348.)

The indictment is not specially stated; but from the case as reported, it must have been either general for levying war in the county of Allegany, and the overt act laid must have been the assemblage of men and the levying of war in that county; or it must have given a particular detail of the treasonable transactions in that county. The first supposition is the most probable; but let the indictment be in the one form or the other, the result is the same. The facts of the case are, that a large body of men, of whom Mitchell was one, assembled at Braddock's Field, in the county of Allegany, for the purpose of committing acts of violence at Pittsburg; that there was also an assemblage at a different time at Couches Fort, at which the prisoner also attended. The general and avowed object of that meeting was to concert measures for resisting the execution of a public law. At Couches Fort, the resolution was taken to attack the house of the inspector, and the body there assembled marched to that house and attacked it. It was proved by the competent number of witnesses, that he was at Couches Fort armed; that he offered to reconnoitre the house to be attacked; that he marched with the insurgents towards the house; that he was with them after the action, attending the body of one of his comrades who was killed in it. One witness swore positively that he was present at the burning of the house, and a second witness said that "it ran in his head that he had seen him there." That a doubt should exist in such case as this, is a strong evidence of the necessity that the overt act should be unequivocally proved by two witnesses.

But what was the opinion of the judge in this case? Couches Fort and Neville's house being in the same county, the assemblage having been at Couches Fort, and the resolution to attack the house having been there taken, the body having for the avowed purposes moved in execution of that resolution towards the house to be attacked, he inclined to think that the act of marching was in itself levying war. If it was, then the overt act laid in the indictment was consummated by the assemblage at Couches and the marching from thence, and Mitchell was proved to be guilty by more than two positive witnesses. But, without deciding this to be the law, he proceeded to consider the meeting at Couches, the immediate marching to Neville's house, and the attack and burning of the house, as one transaction. Mitchell was proved by more than two positive witnesses to have been in that transaction, to have taken an active part in it; and the judge declared it to be unnecessary that all should have seen him at the same time and place.

But suppose not a single witness had proved Mitchell to have been at Couches, or on the march, or at Neville's. Suppose he had been at the time notoriously absent in a different State. Can it be believed by any person who observes the caution with which Judge Patterson required the constitutional proofs of two witnesses to the same overt act, that he would have said Mitchell was constructively present, and might, on that straining of a legal fiction, be found guilty of treason? Had he delivered such an opinion, what would have been the language of this country respecting it? Had he given this opinion, it would have required all the correctness of his life to strike his name from that bloody list in which the name of Jefferies is enrolled.

But to estimate the opinion in Mitchell's case, let its circumstances be transferred to Burr's case. Suppose the body of men assembled in Blannerhasset's island had previously met at some other place in the same county, and that Burr had been proved to be with them by four witnesses; that the resolution to march to Blannerhasset's island for a treasonable purpose had been there taken; that he had been seen on the march with them; that one witness had seen him on the island, that another thought he had seen him there; that he had been seen with the party directly after leaving the island; that this indictment had charged the levying of war in Wood county generally; the cases would then have been perfectly parallel, and the decisions would have been the same.

In conformity with principle and with authority, then, the prisoner at the bar was neither legally nor actually present at Blannerhasset's island; and the court is strongly inclined to the opinion that, without proving an actual or legal presence by two witnesses, the overt act laid in this indictment cannot be proved.

But this opinion is controverted on two grounds.

The first is, that the indictment does not charge the prisoner to have been present;

The second, that, although he was absent, yet, if he caused the assemblage, he may be indicted as being present, and convicted on evidence that he caused the treasonable act.

The first position is to be decided by the indictment itself. The court understands the allegation differently from the attorney for the United States. The court understands it to be directly charged, that the prisoner did assemble with the multitude, and did march with them. Nothing will more clearly test this construction than putting the case into a shape which it may possibly take. Suppose the law to be, that the indictment would be defective unless it alleged the presence of the person indicted at the act of treason. If, upon a special verdict, facts should be found which amounted to a levying of war by the accused, and his counsel should insist that he could not be condemned because the indictment was defective in not charging that he was himself one of the assemblage which constituted the treason, or because it alleged the procurement defectively, would the attorney admit this construction of his indictment to be correct? I am persuaded that he would not, and that he ought not to make such a concession. If, after a verdict, the indictment ought to be construed to allege that the prisoner was one of the assemblage at Blannerhasset's island, it ought to be so construed now. But this is unimportant, for if the indictment alleges that the prisoner procured the assemblage, that procurement becomes part of the overt act, and must be proved, as will be shown hereafter.

The second position is founded on 1 Hale, 214, 288, and 1 East, 127.

While I declare that this doctrine contradicts every idea I had ever entertained on the subject of indictments, since it admits that one case may be stated and a very different case may be proved, I will acknowledge that it is countenanced by the authorities adduced in its support. To counsel or advise a treasonable assemblage, and to be one of that assemblage, are certainly distinct acts, and therefore ought not to be charged as the same act. The great objection to this mode of proceeding is, that the proof essentially varies from the charge [in the character and essence of the offence, and in the testimony by which the accused is to defend himself. These dicta of Lord Hale, therefore, taken in the extent in which they are understood by the counsel for the United States, seem to be repugnant to the declarations we find every where, that an overt act must be laid and must be proved. No case is cited by Hale in support of them; and I am strongly inclined to the opinion, that, had the public received his corrected, instead of his original manuscript, they would, if not expunged, have been restrained in their application to cases of a particular description. Laid down generally, and applied universally to all cases of treason, they are repugnant to the principles for which Hale contends, for which all the elementary writers contend, and from which courts have in no case, either directly reported or referred to in the books, ever departed. These principles are, that the indictment must give notice of the offence; that the accused is only bound to answer the particular charge which the indictment contains, and that the overt laid is that particular charge. Under such circumstances, it is only doing justice to Hale to examine his dicta; and if they will admit of being understood in a limited sense, not repugnant to his own doctrines, nor to the general principles of law, to understand them in that sense.

"If many conspire to counterfeit, or counsel or abet in it, and one of them doth the fact upon that counselling or conspiracy, it is treason in all, and they may be all indicted for counterfeiting generally within the statute, for in such case, in treason, all are principals."

This is laid down as applicable singly to the treason of counterfeiting the coin, and is not applied by Hale to other treasons. Had he designed to apply the principle universally, he would have stated it as a general proposition; he would have laid it down in treating on other branches of the statute, as well as in the chapter respecting the coin; he would have laid it down when treating on indictments generally. But he has done neither. Every sentiment bearing in any manner on this point, which is to be found in Lord Hale while on the doctrine of levying war, or on the general doctrine of indictments, militates against the opinion that he considered the proposition as more extensive than he has declared it to be. No court could be justified in extending the dictum of a judge beyond its terms, to cases in which he has expressly treated, to which he has not himself applied it, and on which he as well as others has delivered opinions which that dictum would overrule. This would be the less justifiable if there should be a clear legal distinction indicated by the very terms in which the judge has expressed himself between the particular case to which alone he has applied the dictum, and other cases to which the court is required to extend it.

There is this clear legal distinction: "They may," says Judge Hale, "be indicted for counterfeiting generally." But if many conspire to levy war, and some actually levy it, they may not be indicted for levying war generally. The books concur in declaring that they cannot be so indicted. A special overt act of levying war must be laid. This distinction between counterfeiting the coins, and that class of treasons among which levying war is placed, is taken in the statute of Edward III. That statute requires an overt act of levying war to be laid in the indictment, and does not require an overt act of counterfeiting the coin to be laid. If in a particular case, where a general indictment is sufficient, it be stated that the crime may be charged generally according to the legal effect of the act, it does not follow, that in other cases, where a general indictment would be insufficient, where an overt act must be laid, that this overt act need not be laid according to the real fact. Hale, then, is to be reconciled with himself, and with the general principles of law, only by permitting the limits which he has himself given to his own dictum, to remain where he has placed them.

In page 238, Hale is speaking generally of the receiver of a traitor, and is stating in what such receiver partakes of an accessory. 1st. "His indictment must be special of the receipt, and not generally that he did the thing; which may be otherwise in case of one that is procurer, counsellor, or consenter."

The words "may be otherwise" do not clearly convey the idea that it is universally otherwise. In all cases of a receiver, the indictment must be special on the receipt, and not general. The words "it may be otherwise in case of a procurer," &c. signify that it may be otherwise in all treasons, or that it may be otherwise in some treasons. If it may be otherwise in some treasons, without contradicting the doctrines of Hale himself, as well as of other writers, but cannot be otherwise in all treasons without such contradiction, the fair construction is, that Hale used these words in their restricted sense; that he used them in reference to treasons in which a general indictment would lie; not to treasons where a general indictment would not lie, but an overt act of the treason must be charged. The two passages of Hale, thus construed, may perhaps be law, and may leave him consistent with himself. It appears to the court to be the fair way of construing them.

These observations relative to the passages quoted from Hale apply to that quoted from East, who obviously copies from Hale, and relies upon his authority.

Upon this point, Keeling, 26, and 1st Hale, 626, have also been relied upon. It is stated in both, that, if a man be indicted as a principal and acquitted, he cannot afterwards be indicted as accessory before the fact; whence it is inferred, not without reason, that evidence of accessorial guilt may be received on such an indictment. Yet no case is found in which the question has been made and decided. The objection has never been taken at a trial and overruled, nor do the books say it would be overruled. Were such a case produced, its application would be questionable. Keeling says, an accessory before the fact is, quodammodo, in some manner, guilty of the fact. The law may not require that the manner should be stated; for in felony it does not require that an overt act should be laid. The indictment, therefore, may be general; but an overt act of levying war must be laid. These cases, then, prove, in their utmost extent, no more than the cases previously cited from Hale and East. This distinction between indictments which may state the fact generally, and those which must lay it specially, bears some analogy to a general and a special action on the case. In a general action, the declaration may lay the assumpsit according to the legal effect of the transaction; but, in a special action on the case, the declaration must state the material circumstances truly, and they must be proved as stated. This distinction also derives some aid from a passage in Hale, 625, immediately preceding that which has been cited at the bar. He says: "If A be indicted as principal, and B as accessory before or after, and both be acquitted, yet B may be indicted as principal, and the former acquittal as accessory is no bar."

The crimes, then, are not the same, and may not indifferently be tried under the same indictment. But why is it that an acquittal as principal may be pleaded in bar to an indictment as accessory, while an acquittal as accessory may not be pleaded in bar to an indictment as principal? If it be answered that the accessorial crime may be given in evidence on an indictment as principal, but that the principal crime may not be given in evidence on an indictment as accessory, the question recurs, on what legal ground does this distinction stand? I can imagine only this: An accessory being quodammodo a principal in indictments where the law does not require the manner to be stated, which need not be special, evidence of accessorial guilt, if the punishment be the same, may possibly be received; but every indictment as an accessory must be special. The very allegation that he is an accessory must be a special allegation, and must show how he became an accessory. The charges of this special indictment, therefore, must be proved as laid; and no evidence which proves the crime in a form substantially different can be received. If this be the legal reason for the distinction, it supports the exposition of these dicta which has been given. If it be not the legal reason, I can conceive no other.

But suppose the law to be as is contended by the counsel for the United States. Suppose an indictment charging an individual with personally assembling among others, and thus levying war, may be satisfied with the proof that he caused the assemblage; what effect will this law have upon this case?

The guilt of the accused, if there be any guilt, does not consist in the assemblage, for he was not a member of it. The simple fact of assemblage no more affects one absent man than another. His guilt, then, consists in procuring the assemblage; and upon this fact depends his criminality. The proof relative to the character of an assemblage must be the same whether a man be present or absent. In the general, to charge any individual with the guilt of an assemblage, the fact of his presence must be proved. It constitutes an essential part of the overt act. If, then, the procurement be substituted in the place of presence, does it not also constitute an essential part of the overt act? Must it not also be proved? Must it not be proved in the same manner that presence must be proved? If, in one case, the presence of the individual makes the guilt of the assemblage his guilt, and, in the other case, the procurement by the individual makes the guilt of the assemblage his guilt, then presence and procurement are equally component parts of the overt act, and equally require two witnesses.

Collateral points may, say the books, be proved according to the course of common law; but is this a collateral point? Is the fact without which the accused does not participate in the guilt of the assemblage, if it was guilty, a collateral point? This cannot be. The presence of the party, where presence is necessary, being a part of the overt act, must be positively proved by two witnesses. No presumptive evidence, no facts from which presence may be conjectured or inferred, will satisfy the constitution and the law. If procurement take the place of presence, and become part of the overt act, then no presumptive evidence, no facts from which the procurement may be conjectured or inferred, can satisfy the constitution and the law. The mind is not to be led to the conclusion that the individual was present by a train of conjectures or inferences, or of reasoning; the fact must be proved by two witnesses. Neither, where procurement supplies the want of presence, is the mind to be conducted to the conclusion that the accused procured the assembly, by a train of conjectures, of inferences, or of reasoning; the fact itself must be proved by two witnesses, and must have been committed within the district.

If it be said that the advising or procurement of treason is a secret transaction, which can scarcely ever be proved in the manner required by this opinion, the answer which will readily suggest itself is, that the difficulty of proving a fact will not justify conviction without proof. Certainly, it will not justify conviction without a direct and positive witness in a case where the constitution requires two. The more correct inference from this circumstance would seem to be, that the advising of the fact is not within the constitutional definition of the crime. To advise or procure a treason is in the nature of conspiring or plotting treason, which is not treason in itself.

If, then, the doctrines of Keeling, Hale, and East are to be understood in the sense in which they are pressed by the counsel for the prosecution, and are applicable in the United States, the fact that the accused procured the assemblage on Blannerhasset's island must be proved, not circumstantially, but positively, by two witnesses, to charge him with that assemblage. But there are still other most important considerations which must be well weighed before this doctrine can be applied to the United States.

The 8th amendment to the constitution has been pressed with great force, and it is impossible not to feel its application to this point. The accused cannot be truly said to be "informed of the nature and cause of the accusation," unless the indictment shall give him that notice which may reasonably suggest to him the point on which the accusation turns, so that he may know the course to be pursued in his defence.

It is also well worthy of consideration, that this doctrine, so far as it respects treason, is entirely supported by the operation of the common law, which is said to convert the accessory before the fact into the principal, and to make the act of the principal his act. The accessory before the fact is not said to have levied war. He is not said to be guilty under the statute. But the common law attaches to him the guilt of that fact which he has advised or procured, and, as contended, makes it his act. This is the operation of the common law, not the operation of the statute. It is an operation, then, which can only be performed where the common law exists to perform it. It is the creature of the common law, and the creature presupposes its creator. To decide, then, that this doctrine is applicable to the United States, would seem to imply the decision that the United States, as a nation, have a common law which creates and defines the punishment of crimes accessorial in their nature. It would imply the further decision, that these accessorial crimes are not, in the case of treason, excluded by the definition of treason given in the constitution. I will not pretend that I have not individually an opinion on these points, but it is one which I should give only in a case absolutely requiring it, unless I could confer respecting it with the judges of the Supreme Court.

I have said that this doctrine cannot apply to the United States without implying those decisions respecting the common law which I have stated, because, should it be true, as is contended, that the constitutional definition of treason comprehends him who advises or procures an assemblage that levies war, it would not follow that such adviser or procurer might be charged as having been present at the assemblage. If the adviser or procurer is within the definition of levying war, and, independent of the agency of the common law, does actually levy war, then the advisement or procurement is an overt act of levying war. If it be the overt act on which he is to be convicted, then it must be charged in the indictment; for he can only be convicted on proof of the overt acts which are charged.

To render this distinction more intelligible, let it be recollected, that although it should be conceded that since the statute of William and Mary, he who advises or procures a treason, may, in England, be charged as having committed that treason, by virtue of the common law operation, which is said, so far as respects the indictment, to unite the accessorial to the principal offence, and permit them to be charged as one, yet it can never be conceded that he who commits one overt act under the statute of Edward, can be charged and convicted on proof of another overt act. If, then, procurement be an overt act of treason under the constitution, no man can be convicted for the procurement under an indictment charging him with actually assembling, whatever may be the doctrine of the common law in the case of an accessorial offender.

It may not be improper in this place again to advert to the opinion of the Supreme Court, and to show that it contains nothing contrary to the doctrine now laid down. That opinion is, that an individual may be guilty of treason "who has not appeared in arms against his country; that if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable object, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."

This opinion does not touch the case of a person who advises or procures an assemblage, and does nothing further. The advising, certainly, and perhaps the procuring, is more in the nature of a conspiracy to levy war, than of the actual levying of war. According to the opinion, it is not enough to be leagued in the conspiracy, and that war be levied, but it is also necessary to perform a part; that part is the act of levying war. This part, it is true, may be minute; it may not be the actual appearance in arms; and it may be remote from the scene of action, that is, from the place where the army is assembled; but it must be a part, and that part must be performed by a person who is leagued in the conspiracy. This part, however minute or remote, constitutes the overt act on which alone the person who performs it can be convicted.

The opinion does not declare that the person who has performed this remote and minute part, may be indicted for a part which was, in truth, performed by others, and convicted on their overt acts. It amounts to this, and nothing more: that when war is actually levied, not only those who bear arms, but those also who are leagued in the conspiracy, and who perform the various distinct parts which are necessary for the prosecution of war, do, in the sense of the constitution, levy war. It may, possibly, be the opinion of the Supreme Court, that those who procure a treason and do nothing further, are guilty under the constitution; I only say that opinion has not yet been given; still less has it been indicated that he who advises shall be indicted as having performed the fact.

It is, then, the opinion of the court, that this indictment can be supported only by testimony which proves the accused to have been actually or constructively present when the assemblage took place on Blannerhasset's island, or by the admission of the doctrine that he who procures an act may be indicted as having performed that act.

It is further the opinion of the court, that there is no testimony whatever which tends to prove that the accused was actually or constructively present when that assemblage did take place. Indeed, the contrary is most apparent. With respect to admitting proof of procurement to establish a charge of actual presence, the court is of opinion, that, if this be admissible in England on an indictment for levying war, which is far from being conceded, it is admissible only by virtue of the operation of the common law, upon the statute, and, therefore, is not admissible in this country, unless by virtue of a similar operation; a point far from being established, but on which, for the present, no opinion is given. If, however, this point be established, still the procurement must be proved in the same manner and by the same kind of testimony which would be required to prove actual presence.

The second point in this division of the subject is, the necessity of adducing the record of the previous conviction of some one person who committed the fact alleged to be treasonable.

This point presupposes the treason of the accused, if any has been committed, to be accessorial in its nature. Its being of this description, according to the British authorities, depends on the presence or absence of the accused at the time the fact was committed. The doctrine on this subject is well understood, has been most copiously explained, and need not be repeated. That there is no evidence of his actual or legal presence, is a point already discussed and decided. It is then apparent that, but for the exception to the general principle which is made in cases of treason, those who assembled at Blannerhasset's island, if that assemblage was such as to constitute the crime, would be principals; and those who might really have caused that assemblage, although, in truth, the chief traitors, would, in law, be accessaries.

It is a settled principle in the law, that the accessory cannot be guilty of a greater offence than his principal. The maxim is accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis; the accessory follows the nature of his principal. Hence results the necessity of establishing the guilt of the principal before the accessory can be tried. For the degree of guilt which is incurred by counselling or commanding the commission of a crime depends upon the actual commission of that crime. No man is an accessory to murder unless the fact has been committed.

The fact can only be established in a prosecution against the person by whom a crime has been perpetrated. The law supposes a man more capable of defending his own conduct than any other person, and will not tolerate that the guilt of A shall be established in a prosecution against B. Consequently, if the guilt of B depends on the guilt of A, A must be convicted before B can be tried. It would exhibit a monstrous deformity, indeed, in our system, if B might be executed for being accessory to a murder committed by A, and A should afterwards, upon a full trial, be acquitted of the fact. For this obvious reason, although the punishment of a principal and accessory was originally the same, and although in many instances it is still the same, the accessory could in no case be tried before the conviction of his principal; nor can he yet be tried previous to such conviction, unless he require it, or unless a special provision to that effect be made by statute.

If, then, this was a felony, the prisoner at the bar could not be tried until the crime was established by the conviction of the person by whom it was actually perpetrated.

Is the law otherwise in this case, because in treason all are principals?

Let this question be answered by reason and by authority.

Why is it that in felonies, however atrocious, the trial of the accessory can never precede the conviction of the principal? Not because the one is denominated the principal and the other the accessory; for that would be ground on which a great law principle could never stand. Not because there was in fact a difference in the degree of moral guilt; for in the case of murder committed by a hardy villain for a bribe, the person plotting the murder and giving the bribe is, perhaps, of the two, the blacker criminal; and, were it otherwise, this would furnish no argument for precedence in trial.

What, then, is the reason?

It has been already given. The legal guilt of the accessory depends on the guilt of the principal; and the guilt of the principal can only be established in a prosecution against himself.

Does not this reason apply in full force to a case of treason?

The legal guilt of the person who planned the assemblage on Blannerhasset's island depends, not simply on the criminality of the previous conspiracy, but on the criminality of that assemblage. If those who perpetrated the fact be not traitors, he who advised the fact cannot be a traitor. His guilt then, in contemplation of law, depends on theirs; and their guilt can only be established in a prosecution against themselves. Whether the adviser of this assemblage be punishable with death, as a principal or as an accessory, his liability to punishment depends on the degree of guilt attached to an act which has been perpetrated by others, and which, if it be a criminal act, renders them guilty also. His guilt, therefore, depends on theirs; and their guilt cannot be legally established in a prosecution against him.

The whole reason of the law, then, relative to the principal and accessory, so far as respects the order of trial, seems to apply in full force to a case of treason committed by one body of men in conspiracy with others who are absent.

If from reason we pass to authority, we find it laid down by Hale, Foster and East, in the most explicit terms, that the conviction of some one who has committed the treason must precede the trial of him who has advised or procured it. This position is also maintained by Leach in his notes on Hawkins; and is not, so far as the court has discovered, any where contradicted.

These authorities have been read and commented on at such length, that it cannot be necessary for the court to bring them again into view. It is the less necessary, because it is not understood that the law is controverted by the counsel for the United States.

It is, however, contended, that the prisoner has waived his right to demand the conviction of some one person who was present at the fact, by pleading to his indictment.

Had this indictment even charged the prisoner according to the truth of the case, the court would feel some difficulty in deciding that he had, by implication, waived his right to demand a species of testimony essential to his conviction. The court is not prepared to say that the act which is to operate against his rights did not require that it should be performed with a full knowledge of its operation. It would seem consonant to the usual course of proceeding in other respects in criminal cases, that the prisoner should be informed that he had a right to refuse to be tried until some person who committed the act should be convicted, and that he ought not to be considered as waiving the right to demand the record of conviction, unless, with the full knowledge of that right, he consented to be tried. The court, however, does not decide what the law would be in such a case; it is unnecessary to decide it; because pleading to an indictment in which a man is charged as having committed an act, cannot be construed to waive a right which he would have possessed, had he been charged with having advised the act. No person indicted as a principal can be expected to say I am not a principal, I am an accessory; I did not commit, I only advised the act.

The authority of the English cases on this subject depends, in a great measure, on the adoption of the common law doctrine of accessorial treasons. If that doctrine be excluded, this branch of it may not be directly applicable to treasons committed within the United States. If the crime of advising or procuring a levying of war be within the constitutional definition of treason, then he who advises or procures it, must be indicted on the very fact, and the question whether the treasonableness of the act may be decided in the first instance in the trial of him who procured it, or must be decided in the trial of one who committed it, will depend upon the reason, as it respects the law of evidence, which produced the British decisions with regard to the trial of principal and accessory, rather than on the positive authority of those decisions.

This question is not essential in the present case; because, if the crime be within the constitutional definition, it is an overt act of levying war, and, to produce a conviction, ought to have been charged in the indictment.

The law of the case being thus far settled, what ought to be the decision of the court on the present motion? Ought the court to sit and hear testimony which cannot affect the prisoner, or ought the court to arrest that testimony? On this question much has been said—much that may, perhaps, be ascribed to a misconception of the point really under consideration. The motion has been treated as a motion confessedly made to stop relevant testimony, and, in the course of the argument, it has been repeatedly stated, by those who oppose the motion, that irrelevant testimony may and ought to be stopped. That this statement is perfectly correct, is one of those fundamental principles in judicial proceedings which is acknowledged by all, and is founded in the absolute necessity of the thing. No person will contend that in a civil or criminal case, either party is at liberty to introduce what testimony he pleases, legal or illegal, and to consume the whole term in details of facts unconnected with the particular case. Some tribunal, then, must decide on the admissibility of testimony. The parties cannot constitute this tribunal, for they do not agree. The jury cannot constitute it, for the question is whether they shall hear the testimony or not. Who, then, but the court can constitute it? It is, of necessity, the peculiar province of the court to judge of the admissibility of testimony. If the court admit improper or reject proper testimony, it is an error of judgment, but it is an error committed in the direct exercise of their judicial functions.

The present indictment charges the prisoner with levying war against the United States, and alleges an overt act of levying war. That overt act must be proved according to the mandates of the constitution and of the act of Congress, by two witnesses. It is not proved by a single witness. The presence of the accused has been stated to be an essential component part of the overt act in this indictment, unless the common law principle respecting accessaries should render it unnecessary; and there is not only no witness who has proved his actual or legal presence, but the fact of his absence is not controverted. The counsel for the prosecution offer to give in evidence subsequent transactions at a different place and in a different State, in order to prove—what? The overt act laid in the indictment? That the prisoner was one of those who assembled at Blannerhasset's island? No: that is not alleged. It is well known that such testimony is not competent to establish such a fact. The constitution and law require that the fact should be established by two witnesses; not by the establishment of other facts, from which the jury might reason to this fact. The testimony, then, is not relevant. If it can be introduced, it is only in the character of corroborative or confirmatory testimony, after the overt act has been proved by two witnesses in such manner that the question of fact ought to be left with the jury. The conclusion that in this state of things no testimony can be admissible is so inevitable that the counsel for the United States could not resist it. I do not understand them to deny that, if the overt act be not proved by two witnesses, so as to be submitted to the jury, all other testimony must be irrelevant, because no other testimony can prove the act. Now, an assemblage on Blannerhasset's island is proved by the requisite number of witnesses, and the court might submit it to the jury whether that assemblage amounted to a levying of war; but the presence of the accused at that assemblage being no where alleged, except in the indictment, the overtact is not proved by a single witness, and, of consequence, all other testimony must be irrelevant.

The only difference between this motion as made, and the motion in the form which the counsel for the United States would admit to be regular, is this: It is now general for the rejection of all testimony. It might be particular with respect to each witness as adduced; but can this be wished, or can it be deemed necessary? If enough is proved to show that the indictment cannot be supported, and that no testimony, unless it be of that description which the attorney for the United States declares himself not to possess, can be relevant, why should a question be taken on each witness?

The opinion of this court on the order of testimony has frequently been adverted to as deciding this question against the motion.

If a contradiction between the two opinions does exist, the court cannot perceive it. It was said that levying war is an act compounded of law and fact, of which the jury, aided by the court, must judge. To that declaration the court still adheres.

It was said that if the overt act was not proved by two witnesses, no testimony, in its nature corroborative or confirmatory, was admissible, or could be relevant.

From that declaration there is certainly no departure. It has been asked, in allusion to the present case, if a general, commanding an army, should detach troops for a distant service, would the men composing that detachment be traitors, and would the commander-in-chief escape punishment?

Let the opinion which has been given answer this question. Appearing at the head of an army would, according to this opinion, be an overt act of levying war; detaching a military corps from it for military purposes might also be an overt act of levying war. It is not pretended that he would not be punishable for these acts; it is only said that he may be tried and convicted on his own acts, in the State where those acts were committed, not on the acts of others in the State where those others acted.

Much has been said, in the course of the argument, on points on which the court feels no inclination to comment particularly, but which may, perhaps, not improperly, receive some notice.

That this court dares not usurp power is most true.

That this court dares not shrink from its duty is not less true.

No man is desirous of placing himself in a disagreeable situation. No man is desirous of becoming the peculiar subject of calumny. No man, might he let the bitter cup pass from him without self-reproach, would drain it to the bottom. But if he has no choice in the case, if there is no alternative presented to him but a dereliction of duty, or the opprobrium of those who are denominated the world; he merits the contempt as well as the indignation of his country who can hesitate which to embrace.

That gentlemen, in a case the utmost interesting, in the zeal with which they advocate particular opinions, and under the conviction, in some measure, produced by that zeal, should on each side press their arguments too far, should be impatient at any deliberation in the court, and should suspect or fear the operation of motives to which alone they can ascribe that deliberation, is perhaps a frailty incident to human nature; but if any conduct on the part of the court could warrant a sentiment that they would deviate to the one side or the other from the line prescribed by duty and by law, that conduct would be viewed by the judges themselves with an eye of extreme severity, and would long be recollected with deep and serious regret.

The arguments on both sides have been intently and deliberately considered. Those which could not be noticed, (since to notice every argument and authority would swell this opinion to a volume,) have not been disregarded. The result of the whole is a conviction as complete as the mind of the court is capable of receiving on a complex subject, that the motion must prevail.

No testimony relative to the conduct or declarations of the prisoner elsewhere and subsequent to the transaction on Blannerhasset's island can be admitted, because such testimony, being in its nature merely corroborative, and incompetent to prove the overt act in itself, is irrelevant until there be proof of the overt act by two witnesses.

This opinion does not comprehend the proof by two witnesses that the meeting on Blannerhasset's island was procured by the prisoner. On that point the court, for the present, withholds its opinion, for reasons which have been already assigned; and as it is understood from the statements made on the part of the prosecution that no such testimony exists. If there be such, let it be offered, and the court will decide upon it.

The jury have now heard the opinion of the court on the law of the case. They will apply that law to the facts, and will find a verdict of guilty or not guilty, as their own consciences may direct.

TRIAL OF AARON BURR ON THE INDICTMENT FOR A MISDEMEANOR.

Opinion of the court on the proper process to be employed for bringing Aaron Burr before the court to answer the indictment for the misdemeanor. Delivered by the Chief Justice on Thursday, September 3.

The question now before the court is, whether bail be demandable from a person actually in custody, against whom an indictment for a misdemeanor has been found by a grand jury. As conducting directly to a decision of this point, the question has been discussed, whether a summons or a capias would be the proper process to bring the accused in to answer the indictment, if, in a point of fact, he was not before the court.

It seems to be the established practice of Virginia in such cases, to issue a summons in the first instance; and, if by any act of Congress the laws of the several States are adopted as the rules by which the courts of the United States are to be governed in criminal prosecutions, the question is at an end; for I should admit the settled practice of the State courts as the sound construction of the State law under which that practice has prevailed.

The thirty-fourth section of the judicial act, it is contended, has made this adoption.

The words of that section are, "That the laws of the several States, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

It might certainly be well doubted, whether this section, if it should be construed to extend to all the proceedings in a case where a reference can be made to the State laws for a rule of decision at the trial, can comprehend a case where, at the trial in chief, no such reference can be made. Now, in criminal cases, the laws of the United States constitute the sole rule of decision; and no man can be condemned or prosecuted in the federal courts on a State law. The laws of the several States, therefore, cannot be regarded as rules of decision in trials for offences against the United States. It would seem to me, too, that the technical term "trials at common law," used in the section, is not correctly applicable to prosecutions for crimes. I have always conceived them to be, in this section, applied to civil suits, as contradistinguished from criminal prosecutions, as well as to suits at common law as contradistinguished from those which come before the court sitting as a court of equity or admiralty.

The provision of this section would seem to be inapplicable to original process for another reason. The case is otherwise provided for by an act of Congress. The fourteenth section of the judicial act empowers the courts of the United States "to issue all writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law."

This section seems to me to give this court power to devise the process for bringing any person before it, who has committed an offence of which it has cognizance, and not to refer it to the State law for that process. The limitation on this power is, that the process shall be agreeable to the principles and usages of law. By which I understand those general principles and those general usages which are to be found not in the legislative acts of any particular State but in that generally recognised and long established law, which forms the substratum of the laws of every State.

Upon general principles of law, it would seem to me that in all cases where the judgment is to affect the person, the person ought to be held subject to that judgment. Thus, in civil actions, where the body may be taken in execution to satisfy the judgment, bail may be demanded. If the right of the plaintiff is supported by very strong probability, as in debt upon a speciality, bail is demandable without the intervention of a judge. If there be no such clear evidence of the debt, bail is often required upon the affidavit of the party. Now, reasoning by analogy from civil suits to criminal prosecutions, it would seem not unreasonable where there is such evidence as an indictment found by a grand jury, to use such process as will hold the person of the accused within the power of the court, or furnish security that the person will be brought forward to satisfy the judgment of the court.

Yet the course of the common law appears originally to have been otherwise. It appears from Hawkins, that the practice of the English courts was to issue a venire facias in the first instance, on an indictment for a misdemeanor. This practice, however, is stated by Blackstone to have been changed. He says, (vol. 4, p. 319) "And so in the case of misdemeanors, it is now the usual practice for any judge of the court of King's Bench, upon certificate of an indictment found, to award a writ of capias immediately, in order to bring in the defendant."

It is, then, the English construction of the common law, that although in the inferior courts the venire facias might be the usual course, and although it had prevailed, yet that a judge of the King's Bench might issue a capias in the first instance.

This subject has always appeared to me to be in a great measure governed by the the thirty-third section of the judicial act. That section provides that, for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in that State where he is found, be arrested, and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be.

This act contemplates an arrest, not a summons; and this arrest is to be not solely for offences for which the State laws authorize an arrest, but "for any crime or offence against the United States." I do not understand the reference to the State law respecting the mode of process as overruling the preceding general words, and limiting the power of arrest to cases in which, according to the State laws, a person might be arrested, but simply as prescribing the mode to be pursued. Wherever, by the laws of the United States, an offender is to be arrested, the process of arrest employed in the State shall be pursued; but an arrest is positively enjoined for any offence against the United States. This construction is confirmed by the succeeding words: "The offender shall be imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be." There exists no power to direct the offender, or to bind him, without bail, to appear before the court, which would certainly have been allowed, had the act contemplated a proceeding in such a case which should leave the person at large without security. But he is absolutely to be imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be.

In a subsequent part of the same section, it is enacted "that, upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death."

There is no provision for leaving the person at large without bail, and I have ever construed this section to impose it as a duty on the magistrate, who proceeds against any offender against the United States, to commit or bail him. I perceive in the law no other course to be pursued.

This section, it is true, does not respect the process upon an indictment. But the law would be inconsistent with itself if it required a magistrate to arrest for any offence against the United States; if it commanded him on every arrest to commit or to bail, and yet refused a capias, and permitted the same offender to go at large so soon as an indictment was found against him. This section, therefore, appears to me to be entitled to great influence in determining the court on the mode of exercising the power given by the fourteenth section in relation to process.

On the impeachment which has been mentioned, this point was particularly committed to Mr. Lee, and the law upon it was fully demonstrated by him.

The only difficulty I ever felt on this question was produced by the former decisions of Judge Iredell. If the State practice on this subject had been adopted, I should have held myself bound by that adoption. But I do not consider the State practice as adopted; Mundell's case was a civil suit, and the decision was that the State rule respecting bail in civil actions must prevail. Sinclair's case was indeed a case similar to this, and in Sinclair's case a venire facias was issued. But I am informed by the clerk that this was his act, at the instance of the attorney, not the act of the court. The point was not brought before the court.

In Callender's case, a capias, or, what is the same thing, a bench warrant, was issued. This was the act of the court; but, not having been an act on argument, or with a view of the whole law of the case, and of former decisions, I should not have considered it as overruling those decisions, if such existed. But there has been no decision expressly adopting the State practice, and the decision in Callender's case appears to me to be correct.

I think the capias the more proper process. It is conformable to the practice of England at the time of our revolution, and is, I think, in conformity with the spirit of the 33d section of the judicial act. I shall, therefore, adopt it.

To issue the capias to take into custody a person actually in custody would be an idle ceremony. In such a case the order of the court very properly supplies the place of a capias. The only difference between proceeding by capias, and by order, which I can perceive, would be produced by making the writ returnable to the next term.

Opinion delivered on Monday, September 14, 1807, on the motion for exclusion of evidence on the trial of Aaron Burr for a misdemeanor.

The present motion is particularly directed against the admission of the testimony of Neale, who is offered for the purpose of proving certain conversations between himself and Herman Blannerhasset. It is objected that the declarations of Herman Blannerhasset are, at this time, inadmissible on this indictment.

The rule of evidence which rejects mere hearsay testimony, which excludes from trials of a criminal or civil nature the declarations of any other individual than of him against whom the proceedings are instituted, has been generally deemed all essential to the correct administration of justice. I know not why a declaration in court should be unavailing, unless made upon oath, if a declaration out of court was to criminate others than him who made it; nor why a man should have a constitutional claim to be confronted with the witnesses against him, if mere verbal declarations, made in his absence, may be evidence against him. I know of no principle, in the preservation of which all are more concerned; I know none, by undermining which, life, liberty, and property might be more endangered. It is, therefore, incumbent on courts to be watchful of every inroad on a principle so truly important.

This rule, as a general rule, is permitted to stand; but some exceptions to it have been introduced concerning the extent of which a difference of opinion prevails, and that difference produces the present question.

The first exception is that in cases of conspiracy; the acts, and it is said by some the declarations, of all the conspirators may be given in evidence on the trial of any one of them, for the purpose of proving the conspiracy; and this case, it is alleged, comes within the exception.

With regard to this exception a distinction is taken in the books between the admissibility and operation of testimony which is clear in point of law, but not at all times easy to practise in fact. It is, that although this testimony be admitted, it is not to operate against the accused unless brought home to him by testimony drawn from his own declarations or his own conduct.

But the question to be considered is, does the exception comprehend this case? Is this a case of conspiracy, according to the well established law meaning of the term?

Cases of conspiracy may be of two descriptions:

1st. Where the conspiracy is the crime, in which case the crime is complete although the act should never be formed; and in such cases, if several be indicted, and all except one be acquitted, that one cannot, say the books, be convicted, because he cannot conspire alone.

2d. Where the crime consists in the intention, and is proved by a conspiracy, so that the conviction of the accused may take place upon evidence that he has conspired to do any act which manifests the wicked intention.

In both these cases an act is not essential to the completion of the crime, and a conspiracy is charged in the indictment as the ground of accusation. If the conspiracy be the sole charge, as it may be, the question to be decided is not whether the accused has committed any particular fact, but whether he has conspired to commit it. Evidence of conspiracy, in such a case, goes directly to support the issue. It has, therefore, been determined that the nature of the conspiracy may be proven by the transactions of any one of the conspirators in furtherance of the common design; the degree of guilt, however, of the particular conspirator upon trial must still depend on his own particular conduct.

In the case at bar the crime consists not in intention, but in acts: The act of Congress does not extend to the secret design, if not carried into open deed, nor to any conspiracy, however extensive, if it do not amount to a beginning or setting on foot a military expedition. The indictment contains no allusion to a conspiracy, and, of consequence, the issue to be tried by the jury is not whether any conspiracy has taken place, but whether the particular facts charged in the indictment have been committed.

I do not mean to admit that, by any course which might have been given to the prosecution, this could have been converted into a case of conspiracy; but most assuredly if it was intended to prove a conspiracy, and to let in that kind of testimony which is admissible only in such a case, the indictment ought to have charged it.

I have not been able to find in the books a single decision or a solitary dictum which would countenance the attempt that is now made to introduce as testimony the declarations of third persons, made in the absence of the person on trial, under the idea of a conspiracy, where no conspiracy is alleged in the indictment. The researches of the counsel for the prosecution have not been more successful; but they suppose this case, though not within the letter, to come clearly within the reasoning of those cases where this testimony has been allowed.

It has been said that, wherever the crime may be committed by a single individual, although in point of fact more than one should be concerned in it, as in all cases of felony, the prosecution must be conducted in the usual mode, and the declarations of third persons cannot be introduced at a trial; but whenever the crime requires more than one person, where, from its nature, it cannot be committed by a single individual, although it shall consist not in conspiracy, but in open deed, yet it is in the nature of a conspiracy, and evidence of the declarations and acts of third persons, connected with the accused, may be received, whether the indictment cover such testimony or not.

I must confess that I do not feel the force of this distinction. I cannot conceive why, when numbers do in truth conspire to commit an act, as murder or robbery, the rule should be that the declaration of one of them is no evidence against another; and yet, if the act should require more than one for its commission, that the declarations of one person engaged in the plot would immediately become evidence against another. I cannot perceive the reason of this distinction; but, admitting its solidity, I know not on what ground to dispense with charging in the indictment the combination intended to be proved. If this combination may be proved by the acts or declarations of third persons, made in the absence of the accused, because he is connected with those persons; if, in consequence of this connexion, the ordinary rules of evidence are to be prostrated, it would seem to me that the indictment ought to give some notice of this connexion.

When the terms used in the indictment necessarily imply a combination, it will be admitted that a combination is charged, and may be proved. And when A, B, and C are indicted for murdering D, yet, in such a case, the declarations of one of the parties, made in the absence of the others, have never been admitted as evidence against the others. If, then, this indictment should even imply that the fact charged was committed by more than one person, I cannot conceive that the declaration of a particeps criminis would become admissible on the trial of a person not present when they were made, unless those declarations form a part of the very transaction charged in the indictment.

If in all this I should be mistaken, yet it remains to be proved that the offence charged may not be committed by a single individual. This may, in some measure, depend on the exposition of the terms of the act; and it is to be observed that this exposition must be fixed. It cannot vary with the varying aspect of the prosecution at its different stages. If, as has been said, a military expedition is begun or set on foot, when a single soldier is enlisted for the purpose, then, unless it be begun as well by the soldier who enlists as by the officer who enlists him, a military expedition may be begun by a single individual. So, if those who engage in the enterprise follow their leader from their confidence in him, without any knowledge of the real object, there is no conspiracy, and the criminal act is the act of an individual. So, too, if the means are any means, the crime may unquestionably be committed by an individual. Should the term be even so construed as to imply that all the means must be provided before the offence can be committed, still all the means may, in many cases, be provided by a single individual. The rule, then, laid down by the counsel for the prosecution, if correct in itself, would not comprehend this case.

2dly. There are also cases in the books where acts are in their nature joint, and where the law attaches the guilt to all concerned in their commission, so that the act of one is in truth the act of others; where the conduct of one person in the commission of the fact constitutes the crime of another person; but this is distinct from conspiracy.

If many persons combine to commit a murder, and all assist in it, and are actually or constructively present, the act of one is the act of all, and is sufficient for the conviction of all.

So in acts of levying war, as in the cases of Damane and Purchase, the acts of the mob were the acts of all in the mob whose conduct showed a concurrence in those acts, and in the general design which the mob were carrying into execution. But these decisions turn on a distinct principle from conspiracy. The crime is a joint crime, and all those who are present, aiding in the commission of it, participate in each other's actions, and in the guilt attached to those actions. The conduct of each contributes to show the nature of this joint crime; and declarations made during the transaction are explanatory of that transaction; but I cannot conceive that, in either case, declarations, unconnected with the transaction, would have been evidence against any other than the person who made them, or persons in whose presence they were made. If, for example, one of several men who had united in committing a murder, should have said that he, with others, contemplated the fact which was afterwards committed, I know of no case which would warrant the admission of this testimony upon the trial of a person who was not present when the words were spoken. So if Damane had previously declared that he had entered into a confederacy for the purpose of pulling down all meeting-houses, I cannot believe that this testimony would have been admissible against a person having no knowledge of the declaration, and giving no assent to it.

In felony, the guilt of the principal attaches to the accessory, and, therefore, the guilt of the principal is proven on the trial of the accessory. In treason, all are principals, and the guilt of him who has actually committed the treason does, in England, attach to him who has advised, aided, or assisted that treason; consequently, the conduct of the person who has perpetrated the fact must be examined on the trial of him who has advised or procured it. But, in misdemeanors by statute, where the commission of a particular fact constitutes the only crime punished by the law, I believe there is no case where the declaration of a particeps criminis can affect any but himself.

3dly. The admission of the declarations of Mr. Blannerhasset may be insisted upon under the idea that he was the agent of Colonel Burr. How far the acts of one man may affect another criminally, is a subject for distinct consideration; but I believe there is no case where the words of an agent can be evidence against his principal on a criminal prosecution. Could such testimony be admissible, the agency must be first clearly established, not by the words of the agent alone, but by the acts of the principal, and the word must be within the power previously shown to have been given.

The opinions of the Circuit Court of New York in trials of Smith and Ogden have been frequently mentioned. Although I have not the honor to know the judge who gave those decisions, I consider them as the determination of a court of the United States, and I shall not be lightly induced to disregard them, or unnecessarily to treat them with disrespect. I do not, however, perceive in the opinions of Judge Talmadge any expression indicating that the declarations of third persons could be received as testimony against any individual who was prosecuted under this act. If he has given that opinion, it has certainly escaped my notice, and has not been suggested to me by counsel. He unquestionably says, in page 113 of the trial, "that the reference which was made to the doctrine of conspiracy did not apply in that case." The reference alluded to was the observation of Mr. Emmet, who had said "that if the object was to charge Col. Smith with the acts of Captain Lewis, they ought to have laid the indictment for a conspiracy." The opinion of the judge, that the doctrine of conspiracy had no application to the case, appears to me to be perfectly correct.

I feel, therefore, no difficulty in deciding that the testimony of Mr. Neale, unless he can go further than merely stating the declarations made to him by Blannerhasset, is at present inadmissible.

But the argument has taken a much wider range. The points made comprehend the exclusion of other testimony suggested by the attorney for the United States, and the opinion of the court upon the operation of testimony. As these subjects are entirely distinct, and as the object of the motion is the exclusion of testimony supposed to be illegal, I shall confine my observations to that part of the argument which respects the admissibility of evidence of the description of that proposed by the attorney for the United States.

The indictment charges the accused in separate counts with beginning, with setting on foot, with preparing, and with providing the means for a military expedition to be carried on against a nation at peace with the United States. Any legal testimony which applies to any one of these counts is relevant. That which applies to none of them must be irrelevant.

The expedition, the character and object of that expedition, that the defendant began it, that he set it on foot, that he provided and prepared the means for carrying it on, are all charged in the indictment, and, consequently, these charges may be all supported by any legal testimony. But that a military expedition was begun or set on foot by others, or that the means were prepared or provided by others, is not charged in this indictment, is not a crime which is or can be alleged against the defendant, and testimony to that effect is therefore not relevant.

All testimony which serves to show the expedition to have been military in its character, as, for instance, testimony respecting their arms and provisions, no matter by whom purchased, their conduct, no matter by whom directed, or who was present, all legal testimony which serves to show the object of the expedition, as would be their actually marching against Mexico, any public declarations made among themselves stating Mexico as their object, any manifesto to this effect, any agreement entered into by them for such an expedition—these, or similar acts, would be received to show the object of the expedition.

In the trials of Smith and Ogden they were received. Whether the particular acts of the accused, on which his guilt or innocence depends, must precede this species of testimony, or may be preceded by it, is a question which merely respects the order of evidence. There can be no doubt but that at some stage of the prosecution either before or after the particular part performed by the accused has been shown, the character and object of the expedition may be shown, and that by any legal testimony calculated to develop that character and object. Whether this testimony is admissible before the proof which particularly applies to the part performed by the accused, or ought to be introduced by first proving that part, is a question which is not made in this case, and which was not made in the case of Smith and Ogden. In that case it was certainly entirely unimportant, and it is probably not less so in this.

It has been also contended that the acts no more than the declarations of third persons can be given in evidence on this indictment.

It has been already said that those acts of equipment which go to show the character of the expedition may be given in evidence. If, for example, Blannerhasset, Tyler, Smith, or any other persons, provided arms, ammunition, or provisions which were applied to the armament, this would be evidence because it would show the character of the expedition. This was done in the case of Smith and Ogden without inquiring who provided the arms, for they belonged to the expedition. Captain Lewis, for instance, purchased several military equipments. It was not deemed necessary to show that Smith was connected with Lewis, for these purchases were made for the expedition, and Smith was not charged with providing them. He was charged with providing other means; and the means provided by Lewis served to show the character of the expedition.

But although the acts of all persons providing means applied to the expedition may be given in evidence upon the same principle that the state of the expedition may be shown, it does not follow that other acts of third persons may be given in evidence.

It has also been contended that no transactions out of the district are testimony.

This position is correct to a considerable extent, but not to that extent in which it is laid down. A declaration of Mr. Burr, for example, made in Kentucky, or elsewhere, that he did set on foot a military expedition on Blannerhasset's island to be carried on against the dominions of the King of Spain, while the United States were at peace with that Power, would, I think, be evidence; so would the actual marching of the troops proved to be raised by him against the province of Mexico. Testimony which goes directly to prove the indictment may, I think, be drawn from any place.

But I do not understand this to be the point really in contest. I understand the counsel of the United States to insist, that providing means in Kentucky, that enlisting men in Kentucky, that joining the expedition in Kentucky, may be given in evidence to show that the accused did begin and set on foot the expedition in Blannerhasset's island, or did provide the means at that place, as charged in the indictment. This I understand to be the great question which divides the prosecution and defence.

It is, I believe, a general rule, that in criminal prosecutions, a distinct crime for which a prosecution may be instituted cannot be given in evidence in order to render it more probable that the particular crime charged in the indictment was committed; if gentlemen think me wrong in this, I will certainly hear them upon the point, but I believe the position to be correct. Now providing the means for a military expedition in Kentucky to be carried on against the dominions of a prince with whom the United States are at peace, is certainly in itself a distinct offence upon which an indictment may be as well supported as it can be for providing means for the same or a similar expedition in Virginia. According to the rule laid down, then, this testimony cannot be received unless it goes to prove directly the charges contained in the indictment. But how can it go directly to prove those charges? Does it follow that the man who has provided the means in Kentucky has also provided the means in Virginia? Certainly it does not follow; and, consequently, the acts alleged in Kentucky do not prove the charges contained in the indictment. They would prove the defendant to have been connected in the enterprise, and gentlemen argue as if they thought this sufficient for their purpose. I shall be excused if I employ a few moments in stating my reasons for thinking it not sufficient.

I have already said, and surely no man will deny it, that two distinct persons may at different places furnish different means for the same enterprise. It will, I presume, not be contended that one of them may be indicted for the means provided by the other. So, too, if the same man shall provide means for the same enterprise at different places, as in Virginia and Kentucky, I do not imagine that an indictment for providing arms in Virginia could be supported by proving that he provided ammunition in Kentucky. They are distinct offences, for either of which he may be punished; and the commission of the one may render more probable, but does not prove the commission of the other.

How, then, do gentlemen mean to make this testimony relevant? It is by making the acts of Blannerhasset, Tyler, and Smith, the acts of Burr; by insisting that their acts show an unlawful expedition to have been begun by him in Virginia, or that the means for that expedition were provided by him in Virginia. This being accomplished, his acts in Kentucky may be adduced to corroborate or confirm the testimony which discloses his conduct in Virginia.

As preliminary, then, to this testimony, such proof of the specific charges contained in the indictment may be given, as may be left to the consideration of the jury.

This proof relates to place as well as to fact. "Of whatsoever nature an offence indicted may be," (says Hawkins, b. 2, ch. 25, sec. 35.) "whether local or transitory, as seditious words or battery, &c. it seems to be agreed that if upon not guilty pleaded, it shall appear that it was committed in a county different from that in which the indictment was found, the defendant shall be acquitted."

This rule is the stronger in the United States, where it is affirmed by the constitution itself, and where the jurisdiction of the court is limited to offences within the district. Its obligation, therefore, is complete.

If there be any direct testimony that an expedition was begun, or set on foot, or that the means were provided or prepared in Virginia, that testimony has not yet been heard, so far as I recollect. If there be such testimony, it must also be shown that the expedition was begun, or that the means were prepared by the accused. No single act of his in Virginia has been offered in evidence. He made a contract in the State of Ohio for boats and provisions, which may have been intended as a part of the expedition, but no contract appears to have been made in Virginia, nor were the boats constructed or provisions procured in Virginia. How, then, is it to appear that he begun or set on foot a military expedition in Virginia, or that he provided or prepared the means for such an expedition?

It is said that if he gave orders from Kentucky or elsewhere, and in consequence of those orders the means were provided in Virginia, the accused is within the letter of the act as well as its spirit, and has himself provided the means in Virginia.

If these orders were in proof, the court as well as the counsel would be enabled to view the subject with more accuracy, and to treat it with more precision. Since those orders are not adduced nor accurately stated, and the question has been argued without them, the court must decline giving any opinion, or consider the orders as offered, and say what orders would be admissible and what inadmissible. The latter course may save the bar the trouble of another argument.

To whom are orders supposed to have been given, and who are supposed to have executed them?

They must have been given to accomplices, or to those who had no share in the expedition.

If accomplices, under the direction of Col. Burr, have provided the means, can their liability to the penalties of the law be doubted? I presume not. If persons engaged in the expedition have provided the means for carrying it on, it will, I presume, be admitted that they are within the letter and the spirit of the act. Each man has himself provided and prepared those particular means which he has furnished. If Col. Burr, as was the case with Col. Smith, has supplied money for the expedition, then money may be charged as the means provided by him; but if that money was advanced to an accomplice, its investment in means for the expedition is the act of the accomplice, for which, being a free agent, he is himself responsible. The accomplice has committed the very act which the law furnishes. Has the accused, by suggesting or procuring that act, also committed it?

I will not say how far the rule that penal laws must be construed strictly, may be carried without incurring the censure of disregarding the sense of the Legislature. It may, however, be safely affirmed that the offence must come clearly within the description of the law, according to the common understanding of the terms employed, or it is not punishable under the law. Now, to do an act, or to advise or procure an act, or to be connected or leagued with one who does that act, is not the same, in either law, language, or in common parlance; and if they are not the same, a penalty affixed to the one is not necessarily affixed to the other. The penalty affixed to the act of providing the means for a military expedition is not affixed to the act of advising or procuring those means to be provided, or of being associated with the man who has provided them. The distinction made by the law between these persons is well settled, and has been too frequently urged to require further explanation. The one is a principal, the other an accessory. In all misdemeanors, punishable only by a statute which describes as the sole offender the person who commits the prohibited act, the one is within and the other not within the statute. In passing the act under consideration, Congress obviously contemplated this distinction. I presume that in a prosecution under the 3d section, for fitting out a privateer, it would not be alleged that a person who was concerned with the men who actually fitted out the privateer, but who performed no act himself, could be convicted on an indictment not for being concerned in fitting out the privateer, but for actually fitting her out. These are stated in that section as separate offences.

This distinction taken in the law is well understood, and cannot be considered as overlooked by those who frame penal acts. They cannot be considered as intending to describe one offender, when they describe another; and if experience suggests defects in the penal code, the Legislature exclusively judges how far those defects are to be remedied.

While expounding the terms of the act, it may not be improper to notice an argument advanced by the attorney for the United States, which was stopped by my observing that he had not correctly understood the opinion delivered in the case of treason. He understood that opinion as approving the doctrine laid down by Keeling and Hale, that an accessory before the fact might plead, in bar of an indictment as accessory, that he had been acquitted as principal; whence it was inferred, that on an indictment for doing an act, evidence of advising or producing that act might be received. I was certainly very far from approving this doctrine. On the contrary, I declared it to contradict every idea I had ever formed on the subject. But if it were correct, I endeavored to show that it could not affect that case. My disapprobation of the doctrine induced me to look further into it, and my persuasion that it is not law is confirmed. Hale, v. 2, p. 292, says, "if A and B be indicted of the murder of C, and upon their evidence it appears that A committed the fact, and B was not present, but was accessory before the fact, by commanding it, B shall be discharged."

In Hale, 2, ch. 85, sec. 11, Hawkins discusses this subject, shows in a note the contradiction in those authorities which maintain the doctrine, cites the opposing authorities, and obviously approves the opinion which is here given. It is apparent, then, that the law never considers the commission and the procurement of an act, even where both are criminal, as the same act.

I cannot, therefore, consider means provided by those who are his accomplices in the expedition, as means provided by Colonel Burr.

If the means were provided by order of the accused, by persons not accomplices, and not guilty under the act, the law may be otherwise. I shall not exclude such testimony. There is, however, some doubt whether the place of trial should be where the orders were given, or where they were executed.

At common law, if an act was procured or advised at one place, and executed at another, it was doubted whether the procurer could be tried at either place, because the offence was not complete at either. This difficulty was removed by a statute made in the reign of Edward VI. If there be testimony showing, by orders from the accused, that means were provided in Virginia by a person not an accomplice, it may be received, and the question respecting the scene of trial put in a way for final decision.

The question whether all the means must be provided before the offence described in the statute has been committed, relates to the effect rather than to the exclusion of the testimony. I shall certainly not reject any evidence which shows that any means were provided by the accused in the place charged in the indictment.

Upon the subject of beginning and setting on foot a military expedition or enterprise, it would be unnecessary, at this time, to say any thing, were it not on account of the question respecting the introduction of testimony out of the district.

What is an expedition? What is an enterprise?

An expedition, if we consult Johnson, is "a march or a voyage with martial intentions." In this sense it does not mean the body which marches, but the march itself. The term is, however, sometimes employed to designate the armament itself, as well as the movement of that armament.

An enterprise is "an undertaking of hazard, an arduous attempt." The proper meaning, then, of this word also describes the general undertaking, and not the armament with which that undertaking is to be accomplished.

The 1st count in the indictment charges that Burr began the expedition in Blannerhasset's island; the 2d and 3d that he set on foot the enterprise in Blannerhasset's island.

If the term expedition is to be taken in its common and direct sense, that is, to mean a march or a voyage with martial intentions, it began where that march or voyage began; and it must have been begun by the accused to bring him within the act.

If the term be taken in its figurative sense, to designate the armament itself, instead of the movements of that armament, then I cannot readily conceive an act which begins an expedition, unless the same act may also be said to provide the means of an expedition. The formation of the plan in the mind is not the commencement of the expedition within the act. Our laws punish no mental crimes not brought into open deed. The disclosure of that plan does not begin it. If it did, the first disclosure would be the beginning. I find a difficulty in conceiving any act which amounts to beginning an expedition, which does not also amount to providing the means for an expedition. However, if there can be such an act, and if it has been committed in Virginia, it may certainly be given in evidence.

The same observations apply to setting on foot an enterprise.

These remarks are made to show what it will be necessary to prove, in order to let in corroborative proof.

It is, then, the opinion of the court, that the declarations of third persons, not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, cannot be received in evidence in this case.

That the acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition, cannot be given in evidence.

That the acts of the accused in a different district, which constitute in themselves substantive cause for a prosecution, cannot be given in evidence, unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment.

That any legal testimony which shows the expedition to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of Spain, may be received.

That any testimony showing that the accused performed within the district any one of the acts charged in the indictment may be received.

Gentlemen will know how to apply these principles. Should any difficulty occur in applying them, the particular case will be brought before the court and decided.

CITY OF RICHMOND, scilicet.

This day, the 28th of October, 1807, Thomas Ritchie, editor of the Enquirer, published in this city, made oath before me, a magistrate of the said city, that the annexed sheet, containing the opinion of the circuit court of the United States for the fifth circuit and Virginia district, in the case of Aaron Burr, &c. &c., was printed in the Enquirer from the original manuscript furnished by Chief Justice Marshall.

Given under my hand, the day and year above written.

WM. RICHARDSON, Mayor.

Conclusive opinion of the Chief Justice Marshall, on the motion for commitment, delivered on Tuesday, October 20, 1807.

Much of the difficulty of the present case arises from its being attended by circumstances entirely opposite to those which are usually found in motions of a similar description.

An examining magistrate commits, and ought to commit, on probable cause. In defining his duty, after stating that he may arrest either upon his own suspicion or that of others, Blackstone adds, "but in both cases it is fitting to examine upon oath the party requiring a warrant, as well to ascertain that there is a felony or other crime actually committed, without which no warrant should be granted, as also to prove the cause and probability of suspecting the party against whom the warrant is prayed."

But although the existence of a fact as the foundation of the charge must be proved before a magistrate can legally imprison a citizen, it is not believed to be true that the same necessity exists for ascertaining with equal clearness the full legal character of that fact, or the degree of guilt which the law attaches to it. On a charge of murder, for example, the homicide must be proved; but the inquiry whether it be justifiable or otherwise is seldom made by an examining magistrate. He could not refuse to commit, unless it was perfectly clear that the act was innocent. - An opinion that a jury ought to acquit would not warrant a refusal on his part to take the steps which might bring the accused before a jury.

In cases where the legal effect of the act alleged to be criminal is in any degree doubtful, it would greatly derange the regular course of justice, and enable many offenders to escape, should a magistrate refuse to arrest until he had received full proof of guilt. If the fact be of such a character as perhaps to be construed into a high and dangerous crime, with the aid of other testimony, which the nature of the case admits, it would seem to be a duty to secure the person, in order to abide the judgment of the law.

Among the many reasons which may be enumerated for committing in a doubtful case, are:

1st. That, upon a considerable portion of a criminal charge, it is the peculiar province of a jury to decide;

2d. That additional testimony is to be expected; and,

3d. That the person most commonly making the commitment is a justice of the peace, not authorized finally to try the offender, and who, consequently, whatever may be the fact, is not presumed to be so competent a judge of the law of the case as he is to whom the power of deciding it is confided.

Had these proceedings commenced with the present motion, founded on testimony such as is now adduced, I certainly should have felt no difficulty in deciding on it. But the proceedings are not now commencing. The persons against whom this motion is made have been seized, one in the Mississippi Territory, one in Kentucky, and one in the western parts of Pennsylvania, or New York, and brought to this place for trial. An immense number of witnesses have been assembled, and a very extensive investigation of the transactions alleged to be criminal has taken place. The result has been the acquittal of one of the accused, upon the principle, that the offence, if committed any where, was committed out of the jurisdiction of this court; and a nolle prosequi has been entered with respect to the others. The witnesses intended to establish the charge before a jury have been examined, and the probability of obtaining testimony which can materially vary the case is admitted to be very remote. The great personal and pecuniary sufferings already sustained must be allowed also to furnish some motives for requiring rather stronger testimony to transmit the accused to a distant State for trial, than would be required in the first instance. It may, likewise, be added, as a consideration of some weight, that the judge who hears the motion, though sitting as an examining magistrate, is one of those who is by law intrusted with the power of deciding finally on the case; and there seems to be, on that account, the less reason for referring the party to a distinct tribunal, on a point on which a slight doubt may exist.

I do not believe that in England, whence our legal system is derived, a justice of assise and nisi prius, after hearing the whole testimony, would commit for trial in another county a man who had been tried in an improper county, unless the probable cause was much stronger than would be required on ordinary occasions.

These conflicting considerations certainly render the questions to be decided more intricate than they would be in a different state of things. After weighing them, I have conceived it to be my duty not to commit on slight ground; but at the same time I cannot permit myself to be governed by the same rules which would regulate my conduct on a trial in chief.

There are certain principles attached to the different characters of a judge sitting as an examining magistrate, and on a trial in chief, which must essentially influence his conduct even under circumstances like those which attend the present case. It is a maxim, universal in theory, though sometimes neglected in practice, that if, in criminal prosecutions, there be doubts either as to fact or law, the decision ought to be in favor of the accused. This principle must be reversed on a question of commitment. In a case like the present, if the judge has formed a clear opinion on the law or fact, which there is not much reason to suppose additional testimony might be obtained to change, it would be injustice to the public, to the accused, and to that host of witnesses who must be drawn from their private avocations to the trial, should he take a step which, in his judgment, could produce only vexation and expense; but if he entertains serious doubts as to the law or fact, it is, I think, his duty, even in a case like this, not to discharge, but to commit.

The charges against the accused are:

- 1st. That they have levied war against the United States at the mouth of Cumberland river, in Kentucky; and
- 2d. That they have begun and provided the means for a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace.

With respect to one of the accused, a preliminary defence is made in the nature of a plea of autrefois acquit.

If the question raised by this defence was one on which my judgment was completely formed in favor of the person by whom it is made, it would certainly be improper for me to commit him; but if my judgment is not absolutely and decidedly formed upon it, there would be a manifest impropriety in undertaking now to determine it. This does not arise from my fear to meet a great question whenever my situation shall require me to meet it, but from a belief that I ought as well to avoid the intrusion of my opinions on my brethren in cases where duty does not enjoin it on me to give them, as the withholding of those opinions where my situation may demand them. The question whether autrefois acquit will be a good plea in this case is of great magnitude, and ought to be settled by the united wisdom of all the judges. Were it brought before me on a trial in chief, I would, if in my power, carry it before the Supreme Court; when brought before me, merely as an examining magistrate, I should deem myself inexcusable were I to decide, while a single doubt remained respecting the correctness of that decision.

To settle new and important questions in our criminal code, especially where those questions are constitutional, is a task upon which a single judge will at any time enter with reluctance; certainly, he would not willingly engage in it while acting as an examining magistrate. There is a decent fitness which all must feel in bringing such questions, if practicable, before all the judges. In England, trials which are expected to involve questions of great magnitude, are seldom assigned to one or two judges. At that interesting crisis, when Hardy, Tooke, Thelwall, and others, were indicted for treason, Chief Justice Eyre was aided and supported by four associate judges, of high talents and character. It would, I have no doubt, in that country be a matter of surprise if any person, whatever might be his station in the judiciary, should undertake to settle a great and novel point on a question of commitment. Although, in the United States, our system does not admit of a commission authorizing a majority of the judges to constitute a court for the trial of special criminal cases, yet it does admit of carrying a doubtful and important point before the Supreme Court, and I should not feel myself justified were I now to give an opinion, anticipating such a measure.

I shall, therefore, consider this motion as if no verdict had been rendered for either of the parties.

Both charges are supported by the same transaction and the same testimony. The assemblage at the mouth of Cumberland is considered as an act of levying war against the United States, and as a military armament collected for the invasion of a neighboring Power with whom the United States were at peace.

From the evidence which details that transaction, it appears that from sixty to one hundred men, who were collected from the upper parts of the Ohio, under the direction of Tyler and Floyd, had descended the river, and reached the mouth of Cumberland about the 25th of December, 1806. The next day they went on shore, and formed a line, represented by some as somewhat circular, to receive Colonel Burr, who was introduced to them, and who said that he had intended to impart something to them, or that he had intended to communicate to them his views, but that reasons of his own had induced him to postpone this communication; or, as others say, that there were then too many bystanders to admit of a communication of his objects.

The men assembled at the mouth of Cumberland appear to have considered Colonel Burr as their chief. Whatever might be the point towards which they were moving, they seemed to have looked upon him as their conductor.

They demeaned themselves in a peaceable and orderly manner. No act of violence was committed, nor was any outrage on the laws practised. There was no act of disobedience to the civil authority, nor were there any military appearances. There were some arms, and some boxes, which might or might not contain arms. There were also some implements of husbandry, but they were purchased at the place. These men assembled under contracts to settle a tract of country on the Red River. No hostile objects were avowed; and, after continuing a day or two on an island in the mouth of the river, the party proceeded down the Ohio.

There are some circumstances in this transaction which are calculated to excite attention and awaken suspicion. If the exclusive object of those who composed this meeting was to settle lands, it would naturally form the subject of public conversation, and there would most probably have been no impediment to a free communication respecting it. The course of the human mind would naturally lead to such communications. The silence observed by the leaders on this subject, connected with hints of ulterior views, seems calculated to impress on the minds of the people themselves that some other project was contemplated, and was probably designed to make that impression.

That the men should have been armed with rifles was to be expected, had their single object been to plant themselves in the Washita; but the musket and bayonet are, perhaps, not the species of arms which are most usually found in our frontier settlements; nor were the individuals who were assembled of that description of persons who would most naturally be employed for such a purpose. The engagement for six months, too, is a stipulation for which it is difficult to account, upon the principle that a settlement of lands was the sole or principal object in contemplation.

These are circumstances which excite suspicion. How far they may be accounted for by saying that ulterior eventual objects were entertained, and that the event on which those objects depended was believed to be certain, or nearly certain, I need not determine; but I can scarcely suppose it possible that it would be contended by any person that the transactions at the mouth of Cumberland do in themselves amount to an act of levying war. There was neither an act of hostility committed, nor any intention to commit such act avowed.

Very early in the proceedings which preceded this motion, I declared the opinion that war might be levied without a battle, or the actual application of force to the object on which it was designed to act; that a body of men assembled for the purpose of war, and being in a posture of war, do levy war; and from that opinion I have certainly felt no disposition to recede. But the intention is an indispensable ingredient in the composition of the fact; and, if war may be levied without striking a blow, the intention to strike must be plainly proved.

To prove this intention, the prosecutor for the United States offers evidence of conversations held by the accused, or some of them, with various individuals, at different times, relative to the views which were entertained, and the plans which had been formed, and of certain facts which took place after leaving the mouth of Cumberland; for, although it was decided not to be within the power of this court to commit for trial in a Territory of the United States, yet every transaction within a Territory has been given in evidence, in the expectation that such testimony might serve to explain the meeting at the mouth of Cumberland, and because it was believed to be proper for an examining magistrate to receive it.

That conversations or actions at a different time and place might be given in evidence as corroborative of the overt act of levying war, after that had been proved in such a manner as to be left to a jury, I never doubted for an instant; but that, in a case where the intent could not be inferred from the fact, and was not proved by declarations connected with the fact, among which I should include the terms under which those who composed the assemblage were convened together, this defect could be entirely supplied by extrinsic testimony, not applying the intent conclusively to the particular fact, is a point on which I have entertained doubts which are not yet entirely removed. The opinion of Judge Iredell, in the case of Fries, according to my understanding of it when read at the bar, appears to bear strongly on this point; and that opinion would be conclusive with me, at least while acting as an examining magistrate. I have not reviewed it particularly, because my decision will not depend on the propriety of admitting this mode of proving the intent.

It has also been made a question whether, after proving a connexion between the accused for some general object, the conversations of one of them may be given in evidence against any other than himself for the purpose of proving what that object was. On the part of the United States it is insisted that such conversations may be given in evidence on an indictment for treason in levying of war. By the defence it is contended that such evidence is only admissible on indictments for a conspiracy, or on indictments where a conspiracy may be laid as an overt act.

The principle that one man shall not be criminated by the declarations of another, not assented to by him, not made in due course of law, constitutes a rule of evidence which ought not unreflectingly to be invaded.

It is one of those principles which I do not think myself required to decide, because I am not sure that its decision, however interesting it might be on a trial in chief, would essentially affect the question of commitment; nor am I confident that its decision, as argued on the part of the United States, would introduce the testimony it was designed to introduce. In the English books, generally, the position that the declarations of a person not on trial may be given in evidence against a man proved to have been connected with him, is laid down only in cases of conspiracy, where the crime is completed without any other open deed. The position is certainly not laid down with respect to such cases in terms which exclude its application to others; but it is not laid down in general terms, and is affirmed to apply to those particular cases, without being affirmed to apply to others. From this general observation relative to the English books, East is to be excepted. He states the proposition generally; yet it may well be doubted whether this general statement was not with a view to the law in that treason which, in England, almost swallows up every other.

But admitting the law to be the same in treason by levying war as in cases of conspiracy, how far does it extend?

The doctrine on this subject was reviewed in the cases of Hardy and Tooke. On the part of the crown, a letter of Thelwall containing seditious songs, composed by himself and sung in the society, was offered as evidence against Hardy, who was connected with Thelwall. This testimony was rejected, because it was not a part of the transaction itself, but an account of that transaction given by Thelwall to a person not engaged in the conspiracy. The court was divided; three for rejecting, and two for admitting the evidence.

A letter addressed by one conspirator to another, but not proved to have been received, was then offered and admitted against the opinion of the chief justice, who thought that such a letter did not amount to an act done, which might be evidence, but only to a relation of that act, which could not be evidence. He was overruled, because a letter from one conspirator to another on the conspiracy, was a complete act in that conspiracy.

The next paper offered was a letter from a society in the conspiracy, which was found in the possession of one of the conspirators, and this was unanimously admitted.

The principle which appears to be established by these decisions is, that a letter from one conspirator to another on the subject of the conspiracy is evidence against all, but that a letter from a conspirator to a person not connected with him, stating facts relative to the conspiracy, is only evidence against himself. How far a conversation held with a stranger, for the purpose of bringing him into the plot, may be considered as a transaction, and, therefore, testimony to show the general conspiracy, does not appear from these decisions.

This species of evidence is received to show the general object of the conspiracy, but can affect no individual further than his assent to that object can be proved by such testimony as is admissible in ordinary cases.

I notice this point for the purpose of observing that I do not decide it on the present motion.

The first question which arises on the evidence is—

With what objects did those men convene who assembled at the mouth of Cumberland?

Was it to separate the Western from the Eastern States, by seizing and holding New Orleans?

Was it to carry on an expedition against Mexico, making the embarkation at New Orleans?

Was this expedition to depend on a war with Spain?

The conversation held by Col. Burr with Commodore Decatur stated his object to be an expedition against Mexico, which would be undertaken, as the commodore understood, with the approbation of Government, in the event of war.

To General Eaton he unfolded, in various conversations, plans for invading Mexico, and also for severing the Western from the Atlantic States.

To Commodore Truxton he spoke of the invasion and conquest of Mexico in the event of a war, as a plan which he had digested in concert with General Wilkinson, and into which he was extremely desirous to draw the commodore. A circumstance is narrated by this witness, which has been noticed by the counsel for the United States, and deserves consideration. It is the declaration of Colonel Burr that he was about to despatch two couriers with letters to General Wilkinson relative to the expedition. It was at this time that Messrs. Bollman and Swartwout are said to have left Philadelphia, carrying each a copy of the ciphered letter which has constituted so important a document in the various motions that have been made on this occasion. This letter, though expressed in terms of some ambiguity, has been understood by the Supreme Court, and is understood by me, to relate to a military expedition against the territories of a foreign Prince: In this sense the testimony offered on the part of the United States shows it to have been also understood by Bollman, by Swartwout, and by General Wilkinson. The inference is very strong, that this letter is the same to which Colonel Burr alluded in his conversation with Commodore Truxton, and strengthens the idea that the accused gave to that gentleman a true statement of the real object, so far, at least, as relates to the point against which his preparations were to be directed. All the conversations relative to an expedition by sea would be equally inapplicable to any attempt on the territories of the United States, and to the settlement of lands.

His conversations with the Messrs. Morgan certainly indicate that his mind was strongly directed to military objects, that he was not friendly to the present administration, and that he contemplated a separation of the Union as an event which would take place at no very distant day.

His conversation with Lieutenant Jackson points in express terms to hostility against Spain.

The conversations of Mr. Blannerhasset evince dispositions unfriendly to the Union, and his writings are obviously intended to disaffect the Western people, and to excite in their bosoms strong prejudices against their Atlantic brethren. That the object of these writings was to prepare the Western States for a dismemberment, is apparent on the face of them, and was frequently avowed by himself. In a conversation with the Messrs. Henderson, which derives additional importance from the solemnity with which his communications were made, he laid open a plan for dismembering the Union under the auspices of Mr. Burr. To others, at subsequent times, he spoke of the invasion of Mexico, as the particular object to which the preparations then making were directed. In all, those whom he sought to engage in the expedition, the idea was excited that, though the Washita was its avowed object, it covered something more splendid; and the allusions to Mexico, when not directed, were scarcely to be misunderstood.

The language of Comfort Tyler also tends to prove that the enterprise was destined against Mexico.

The communications made to General Wilkinson deserve much consideration in marking the real intention of the parties, because it is obvious that Colonel Burr, whether with or without reason, calculated on his co-operation, with the army which he commanded, and that on this co-operation the execution of his plan greatly, if not absolutely, depended. To General Wilkinson, both the ciphered letter and the explanations made by Bollman and Swartwout, declared the expedition to be military, and to be intended against Mexico.

I do not think the authenticity of this letter can now be questioned. When to the circumstances enumerated by the counsel on the part of the United States are added the testimony of Mr. Swartwout, and its being written in a cipher previously established between General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr, I think it sufficiently proved, at least for the present, although not in the hand-writing of the person to whom it is ascribed.

The conversation stated by General Wilkinson as passing between Mr. Swartwout and himself, so far as it is contradicted by that gentleman, cannot affect Mr. Burr; for this plain reason: the person alleged to have made those declarations avers not only that he never made them, but that he was never authorized to make them; that he never heard from Mr. Burr any sentiment indicating designs against any part of the United States, and never even suspected him of such designs. If, then, General Wilkinson be correct, I must consider the observations he narrates as the conjectures of Mr. Swartwout, not authorized by Mr. Burr.

It is also a circumstance of some weight, that Mr. Burr's declarations at the mouth of Cumberland furnish strong reasons for the opinion that he did not wish those to whom he addressed himself to consider the Washita as his real ultimate object; and the reference to further information from their particular leaders would naturally induce the expectation, that without any open avowal their minds would be gradually conducted to the point to which their assent was to be obtained. We find there were rumors among them of attacking Baton Rouge, of attacking other parts of the Spanish dominions, but not a suggestion was heard of hostility against the United States.

On comparing the testimony adduced by the United States with itself, this is observable. That which relates to treason indicates the general design, while that which relates to the misdemeanor points to the particular expedition which was actually commenced. Weighing the whole of this testimony, it appears to me to preponderate in favor of the opinion that the enterprise was really designed against Mexico.

But there is strong reason to suppose that the embarkation was to be made at New Orleans, and this, it is said, could not take place without subverting for a time the Government of the Territory, which it is alleged would be treason. The Supreme Court has said, that to revolutionize a Territory by force, although merely as a step to or a means of executing some greater projects, is treason. But an embarkation of troops against a foreign country may be made without revolutionizing the Government of the place, and without subverting the legitimate authority. It is true that violence might probably result from such an attempt, and treason might be the consequence of its execution; but this treason would arise incidentally, and would not be the direct object for which the men originally assembled. This treason would attach to those who committed it, but would not, I am inclined to think, infect a previous assemblage, convened for a distinct purpose. If the object of the assemblage at the mouth of Cumberland was to embark at New Orleans for the purpose of invading Mexico, the law relative to that assemblage would be essentially different from what it might be if their direct object was to subvert the Government of New Orleans by force. If in prosecuting their purpose at New Orleans war should be levied, this would be treason at New Orleans where the fact was committed, but it could not, I think, be said to be treason by levying war at the mouth of Cumberland where the fact was neither committed nor intended: It might be otherwise, if at the mouth of Cumberland, the determination to subvert the Government of a Territory by force had been formed.

This opinion may be in some degree illustrated by the doctrine of the English books. Levying war is an overt act of compassing the King's death. So is a conspiracy to levy war, provided the conspiracy be direct against the King or his Government. But if it be a conspiracy to do an act of constructive treason, which act, if done, would support an indictment for compassing the King's death, the conspiracy without the act will not support the indictment. So in this case, if the object be the embarkation of a body of men against a foreign country, in the execution of which war may or may not be levied, the fact becomes necessary to constitute the treason.

It is also a circumstance of considerable weight with me, that the proof exhibited by the United States to establish a general design to dismember the Union, applies only to Colonel Burr and Mr. Blannerhasset. It is not proved to have been ever communicated even to Tyler or Floyd. There is not only a failure to prove that such a design was communicated to or entertained by the men who were assembled at the mouth of Cumberland, but the contrary is in full evidence. The United States have adduced several witnesses belonging to that assemblage, who concur in declaring that they heard nothing, that they suspected nothing, and that they would have executed nothing, hostile to the United States. This testimony cannot be disregarded, for it is uncontradicted and is offered by the prosecution. How can this assemblage be said to have levied war against the United States?

Had Burr and Blannerhasset constituted this meeting, no man could have construed it into an act of levying war, whatever might have been their purpose. Their being joined by others having no hostile intentions against the United States, who were attached to them with other views, and who would not permit themselves to be employed in the execution of such intentions, does not seem to me to alter the case. The reason why men in a posture of war may be said to levy war before a blow is struck, is, that they are ready to strike, and war consists in the various movements of a military force, as well as in actual fighting. But these men were not ready nor willing to strike, nor could their chief be ready to strike without them. He had yet to prevail upon them to come into his measures. This is not a meeting for the purpose of executing a formed design, but a meeting for the purpose of forming a design. It is, therefore, more in the nature of conspiracy than of actual war.

Suppose Mr. Burr had, at the mouth of Cumberland, declared his object to be to seize upon New Orleans and dismember the Union; and that, upon this declaration, his men had universally abandoned him; could this have been denominated an act of levying war? If we forget the constitution and laws of our country, if we suppose treason, like moral guilt, to consist in the intention, and that it may be legally evidenced by words declaring that intention, the answer to this question may be in the affirmative; but if it can consist only in an open deed of levying war, I confess myself unable to perceive how such a proposition can be construed into such a deed.

The case does not appear to me to be essentially varied by the circumstance that this design was not avowed, and that the men followed Colonel Burr with other views. Upon general principles, it appears to me, that unless some act be committed from which a treasonable intent may be inferred, that the treasonable intent must be proved in the assemblage, where that assemblage is composed of free agents, as well as in the person who convenes them, before the law considers war as being actually levied.

This opinion is supposed to be contrary to the decision in the case of the Earls of Essex and Southampton. I have examined that case as reported in the State Trials, and do not think it in any respect contradictory to the ideas I have delivered.

The design of the Earl of Essex was to force his way into the palace and to remove certain counsellors from the Queen, who were his enemies; but he intended no hurt to the person of the Queen. For the purpose of executing this design, he assembled a large body of armed men at his own house, who continued to be embodied after being ordered by the proper authority to disperse; and he also entered the city of London for the purpose of raising the citizens in order further to aid him in the execution of his plan. Several consultations had been previously held, at which the Earl of Southampton assisted, and it is not alleged in the case that he was not fully informed of these projects. He believed that no design was entertained against the person of the Queen; and, therefore, that his acts were not treasonable; but in the law he was mistaken. In fact, no particular design against her person was entertained, and Essex as little suspected as Southampton that they were committing treason: They were ignorant that the law pronounced those facts to be treason, but they were neither ignorant of the facts themselves nor of the real intention with which those facts were committed.

In this case the judges delivered their opinion of the law on two points. The one "that in case where a subject attempted to put himself into such strength as the King shall not be able to resist him, and to force and compel the King to govern otherwise than according to his own royal authority and direction, it is manifest rebellion." The other, "that in every rebellion the law intendeth as a consequent the compassing the death and deprivation of the King, as foreseeing that the rebel will never suffer that King to live or reign who might punish or take revenge of his treason or rebellion."

Under this law opinion of the judges, Essex and Southampton were condemned and executed. The only difference between them was that the quarrel was the quarrel of Essex, and Southampton only adhered to him; but he adhered to him knowing what he did, and the intention with which he acted.

Believing, then, the weight of testimony to be in favor of the opinion that the real and direct object of the expedition was Mexico, and inclining also to the opinion that in law either acts of hostility and resistance to the Government, or a hostile intention in the body assembled, is necessary to convert a meeting of men with ordinary appearances into an act of levying war, it would, in my judgment, be improper in me to commit the accused on the charge of treason.

It is contended that they are not guilty of a misdemeanor, on one of these grounds: Either the United States were actually at war with Spain, or the expedition was dependent on war; and, in the event of peace, was to be converted into a settlement on the Washita.

It is alleged that we were at war with Spain, because a Spanish army had crossed the Sabine, and entered the territory of the United States.

That a nation may be put in a state of war by the unequivocal aggressions of others without any act of its own, is a proposition which I am not disposed to controvert; but I cannot concede this to be such an act. The boundaries claimed by the United States to their recent purchase of Louisiana are contested by Spain. Now if either nation takes possession of the contested territory as its own, it is an act which the opposite Government may elect to consider either as an act of war or otherwise; and only the Government can make that election. No citizen is at liberty to make it, or to anticipate his Government.

But it is alleged that war, if not absolutely made, appeared to be inevitable; and that the prosecution of the expedition depended on its taking place. That the probability of war was great may be admitted; and this may extenuate the offence, but it still remains an offence which is punishable by law. If the expedition was really eventual, and was not to take place in time of peace, then, certainly, preparations might be made for it without infracting any law; but this is a fact proper for the exclusive consideration of a jury, and I shall make no comment upon it which might, the one way or the other, influence their judgment.

I shall commit Aaron Burr and Herman Blannerhasset, for preparing and providing the means for a military expedition against the territories of a foreign Prince, with whom the United States were at peace. If those whose province and duty it is to prosecute offenders against the laws of the United States shall be of opinion that a crime of a deeper dye has been committed, it is at their choice to act in conformity with that opinion.

Israel Smith is not proved to have provided or prepared any means whatever, and therefore I shall not commit him. If he has really offended against the laws, he may be prosecuted for the treason in Kentucky, or for the misdemeanor in his own State, where, if any where, his offence has been committed.

10th CONGRESS.]

No. 231.

[1st Session.]

EXTENSION OF PATENT RIGHTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 7, 1807.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Oliver Evans, of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, reported:

Oliver Evans, the petitioner, has invented a very useful improvement in the art of manufacturing flour and meal, for which he received a patent under the act of Congress, passed the 10th of April, 1790, entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts." This patent was granted the 18th of December of the same year, and expired in 1804. It was drawn up in the usual form of patents issued under that act.

The petitioner states, that many persons, without his license, and contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said act, having constructed and used his improvement, he was induced to appeal to the laws of his country for redress; and, accordingly, in April, 1804, did bring an action against one of the invaders of his rights, in the circuit court of the United States for the Pennsylvania district, where "the court expressed their unanimous opinion that the description of the machines, stated in the patent to have been invented by him, was imperfect and insufficient; and that by reason thereof the said patent, or so much as came in controversy on the trial, was void." This decision was made at their October term of the present year, and the sum in dispute not amounting to two thousand dollars, he is precluded from entering an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Thus circumstanced, the petitioner has applied to Congress for relief, and he prays that the Secretary of State may be authorized to grant a good patent, or that such other assistance may be afforded to him, as the utility of his improvement merits, and the public good shall require.

Understanding that the patent was merely deficient in point of form, the committee applied to the Secretary of State for his opinion on the subject. The Secretary's letter, subjoined to this report, will show that he does not think himself justified in introducing a principle which would admit the invalidity of all the patents issued in the same form since the commencement of the Government; on the decision of the circuit court alone. The alteration in the form of patents took place on the 28th of February, 1793.

No other material facts have come to the knowledge of the committee in this case.

The petitioner alleges that considerable sums of money are still due to him, by those who continue to use his improvement without his permission, and which he is prevented from recovering by the decision of the court.

If the petitioner had not complied with the patent law; if he had not alleged, in his petition, that he had made a new and useful discovery; if his petition had not described his invention to the Secretary of State; or, if he had not truly and fully specified his discovery; if, indeed, in any respect, he had failed to perform what had been enjoined by our laws, the committee would consider his claim as an improper one; but viewing it in a different manner; considering, too, that the defect in his patent was caused by those appointed to issue it, from a misapprehension of the provisions of the law merely, the committee are of opinion that relief ought to be afforded to the petitioner, in some way or other; and no better mode suggesting itself than that of granting him a good patent for a limited time, they have been induced to ask leave to report a bill for that purpose.

DECEMBER 7, 1807.

SIR: COMMITTEE ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, November 19, 1807.

Oliver Evans, of Philadelphia, having applied to Congress to grant him a new patent for his improvements in the art of manufacturing flour, for the reasons stated in his petition, herewith enclosed for your information, I am directed by the committee, to whom this subject has been referred, to ask whether the relief prayed for can be granted by you, as the Secretary of State?

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your obedient servant,

JACOB CROWNINSHIELD.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 20, 1807.

I have duly received your letter of yesterday, on the subject of Mr. O. Evans's application for a patent. As this application is founded on a decision of the circuit court at Philadelphia, against the validity of a former patent for the same invention, a compliance with it would admit the invalidity of all the patents issued in the same form since the commencement of the Government. Such a principle I did not think myself justified in introducing, on that authority alone.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The Hon. JACOB CROWNINSHIELD.

GENTLEMEN: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PATENT OFFICE, November 21, 1807.

Mr. Oliver Evans waited on me this morning with a request that, at your desire, I would furnish you "with the period at which the alteration in the form of patents took place, and the number of patents issued under the old form prior to Mr. Evans's, as well as those issued afterwards." In answer to your queries, I have the honor to state, that the alteration in the form of patents took place on the 28th of February, 1793, in conformity to the law of the 21st of the same month, (see Laws of the United States, vol. 2, page 200,) prior to which 57 patents had been issued, and subsequently to this, above 740; Mr. Evans's was the third patent under the old form.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

WILLIAM THORNTON.

The Hon. the COMMITTEE, &c.

No. 232.

[1st SESSION.]

CONTESTED ELECTION OF WILLIAM McCREERY, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM MARYLAND.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 7, 1807.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was committed the petition of Joshua Barney, of the city of Baltimore, praying to be admitted to a seat in the House, he having, in his opinion, the highest number of votes given to a candidate legally qualified to represent the said city of Baltimore, having examined the facts and allegations on both sides, and the constitution of the United States and the law of Maryland, reported:

That, by an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed 1805-'6, it is enacted that Baltimore city and county shall be the fifth district, which district shall be entitled to send two Representatives to Congress, one of whom shall be a resident of Baltimore city and the other of Baltimore county.

That Joshua Barney is a citizen of Maryland, and has been a resident of Baltimore city for many years.

That William McCreery has been, for many years, a citizen of Maryland, and a resident of the city of Baltimore; but, in the year 1803, he removed himself and family to his seat in Baltimore county; that, from that time, though he himself has occasionally resided in Baltimore city, yet he, with his wife and family, have not made the city of Baltimore their settled residence.

That William McCreery states that his intention was, and still is, to reside with his family on his country estate in summer, and in the city of Baltimore in winter; but that, ever since he has removed his family to his farm, he has been obliged every winter, in the public service, to reside, and frequently with his family, in the city of Washington, which prevented him from removing his family, agreeably to his intention, to the city of Baltimore; but he resided himself five or six days in the city of Baltimore before the election; that he and his family were residing in the same situation when he was elected to serve in the ninth Congress; that, however, not wishing to have been taken up as a candidate at the last election, he expressed to some of his friends an apprehension that exceptions might be made on account of his constant family residence not being in the city of Baltimore.

At the election in the aforesaid district, for the tenth Congress, now in session, Nicholas R. Moore had 6,164 votes; he is a resident in Baltimore county; and William McCreery had 8,559 votes; and Joshua Barney, who claims a seat in this House, and it is admitted is a resident in Baltimore city, had 2,063 votes; and John Seat, also a resident in Baltimore city, had 353 votes. The above statement of facts being admitted by the parties, further evidence was not required. No question was taken on the legal residence of William McCreery in the city of Baltimore. Thus far of the former report is again submitted by the committee.

When the report was recommitted, Joshua Barney alleged that William McCreery had declared himself not qualified to be elected, in terms that William McCreery refused to admit, and proposed to bring stronger proof against William McCreery's legal residence in the city of Baltimore; the parties went to that place to take testimony, which they have submitted to the committee, which is substantially as follows:

Joseph H. Nicholson, in answer to interrogatories propounded by Mr. Barney, viz: Did any, and what conversation pass between you and Mr. McCreery as to his illegibility as a Representative to Congress, or between William McCreery, in your hearing, and what did he say?

Second. Did William McCreery at any time, and when, to you or in your presence and hearing, acknowledge or say that he had not a residence in the city of Baltimore, and did not consider himself eligible as a Representative to Congress, &c.?
